WORK FOR THE YEAR.

HER MAJESTY'S Ministers begin the New Year with every reason for anxious consideration of the work before them, but with absolutely none for want of confidence in their ability to carry it through. A twelvemonth ago the more sanguine spokesmen of the Opposition were openly "giving the Government six months" to lose the support of the Liberal-Unionists, to quarrel among themselves, to see the secession of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL result in a formidable Cave among their own followers, to fail in carrying through their Irish legislation, to fail in every possible and impossible manner. The twelve months have passed, and though there is still, of course, no lack of loudly-professed confidence on the Gladstonian side, not a single one of the prophecies of evil has been fulfilled. Ministers are (within rather less than the usual diminution which the customary wear and tear of bye-elections brings on all Governments) as strong numerically as they were then, and the first election of the new year at Winchester has been a conspicuous triumph for them, while they are infinitely stronger in the fact that twelve months' difficult work and unscrupulous opposition have failed to discover a single weak place. There has been no public dissatisfaction with such prospects of domestic legislation as Lord SALISBURY has been able to hold out, and on the subjects of foreign and Irish policy there has been no sign whatever of discontent with what the Government has done. If any tolerably cool-headed Gladstonian will ask himself what would have been his feelings if the actual results of the last twelve months had been predicted to him twelve months ago, he will probably be able to ascertain (not without the proverbial sense of "cold water down the back") what is the real state of a party which triumphs over the secession of Mr. EVELYN as representing the strength of the Conservative party, and exalts as a memorable victory the polling of one hundred less Gladstonian votes at Dulwich than were mustered two years ago.

If it were conceivable that Ministers, after not too hastily or recklessly putting their hands to the plough, should look back, the last chance of any such conduct on their part should surely be barred by the reported utterances of Mr. GLADSTONE in Paris. So reckless were those utterances that, in regard to Ireland, his own chief supporters in the press indiscreetly asserted that there must be some mistake—that Mr. GLADSTONE could not have said what he was reported to have said in reference to the Irish landlords. Alas! the bounds to what Mr. GLADSTONE could have said or could not are better known to his enemies than to his supporters; and, after the celebrated, the unrevealed, and the impossible "other meaning" which he attached, by his own account, to his unmistakable language about Colonel DOPPING, there can be little doubt as to the possibility of his having said anything to M. HERVÉ. With regard to the not less mischievous, though less categorically disprovable, assertion as to the probable conduct of England during a great war, Mr. GLADSTONE's language simply emphasizes more unguardedly what he had already said at Dover. Both he and his supporters would exclaim in horror or disdain at the suggestion that a great European war would be a godsend to Mr. GLADSTONE, because he could in almost any case make political capital out of the conduct of the Government, and either claim credit for influencing abstention or repeat the tactics of eleven years ago if the Government showed signs of acting. They will find few cool-headed observers of politics to share their horror or their incredulity.

But, however Lord SALISBURY and his colleagues may protest, and sincerely protest, that they will not allow Ireland to stop the way, few people can doubt that the maintenance of the late happy change of policy in that unhappy country will be their chief and most important task. The difficulties in the way will not lie in the direction of argument, for there the Unionist policy is absolutely invincible. They will not lie in the keeping up of a Parliamentary majority, for there is little fear of any more weak brethren following the example of the weakest. Active resistance is as little to be feared in Ireland, despite the wicked attempts of English Radicals to stir it up; and the cool pursuance, without vindictiveness and without relenting, of the policy of reasonably punishing evildoers is sure to meet with that success which even in Ireland has never failed to reward it. The danger is in the endless powers of mendacity possessed and exercised by the Nationalist party, in the absolute unscrupulousness of the English and Scotch Gladstonians, and in the effect which these two things may have on the gullibility and the fickleness—two serious defects—of the English people. When the motives of the unjust judge are avowed openly and almost in so many words by such a man as Lord SPENCER, it would be a rash thing to trust in the resolution and clear-sightedness of the average voter in England. When an evidently well-meaning person like Mgr. O'REILLY writes at enormous length to the Times imploring England to treat his country with "justice," to treat her with "conciliation"—first, as if justice and conciliation were not, in at least conceivable cases, mutually exclusive things; secondly, as if conciliation had not been tried ad nauseam, and with the result of constant failure, for a hundred years; thirdly, as if the present régime were not the first during at least that time under which Ireland has been treated with justice, absolute and even-handed justice, which treats every evildoer without fear and without favour:—when such a person writes in such a way, it may seem rash to trust the average man in the omnibus to see the facts straight and coolly. But, with due trouble taken, there can be little doubt that he can be made to see them. And fortunately, with Mr. GLADSTONE standing by, his sleeve full of over-trumps in the event of any possible attempt at "conciliation," prudence no less than honour dictates a simple adherence to the way of justice.

In the event of that war which Mr. GLADSTONE is doing his best to hasten, but which fortunately seems to be less probable than it was, the path of the Government is not so clear absolutely, and the fact that very conceivably the situation might be such that at the opening England could not strike in either with reason or with effect supplies Mr. GLADSTONE himself with his usual pretext of truth to veil a substance of falsehood. But, as there is no possible doubt what the ulterior objects of the only Power at all likely to begin are, and as these objects clash at once with the interests of England and with her treaty obligations, neither the excuse nor even the possibility of inaction could last long. Purely domestic matters must almost of necessity, and failing some accidental disturbance, be of much less importance. No legislative reform of any magnitude is really wanted; and the only reform of such a kind likely to be tried—innovation in local government—is eminently the kind of thing which is a case for judicious management. By injudicious management the Government might incur a serious check; but the failure to carry any proposed Bill, or the carrying of it in a much modified shape, need involve no disastrous result, and can hardly be otherwise than advantageous, as compared with more sweeping alterations, to the country. It is impossible to say as much of departmental and administrative reform; and here is the greatest, but also the most difficult, chance of the Government. Few people, except Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, expect a positive reduction of expenditure on the army and navy; but what, if not expected, is at least desired, is the provision of more efficiency for the same expenditure. If we can get more guns, more ships, more men ready for use, more forts and ports in a state of defence, at the cost of some reduction in the immense clerical and non-combatant staffs of both forces, and the huge army of persons who are perfectly willing to do something for their pay, and who are at present forced to take pay and do nothing, all reasonable men will be satisfied. With the third great spending service—the Civil Service—it is perhaps different. Between overmanning and corruption there ought to be a mean; but it is notorious that, in the opinion of many very good judges, it is a mean hard to hit. Yet it is here, if anywhere, that the opportunity of retrenchment lies.

WELSH NATIONALITY.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN has published in the Contemporary Review a spirited essay on the Nationality of Wales. A reader who neither knew the political opinions of the author nor had read the newspapers for the last three or four years might fail to discover the practical object of an ingenious and eloquent disquisition. Like other zealous adherents of Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN tacitly declines to join in the demand for the independence of the Principality. He admits that Home Rule for Wales is an idle project, or he suggests, as a mild alternative, that it is at least premature. His complaint that the Welsh members are outvoted on questions relating to Wales is not sufficiently definite. It is not known that the alleged oppression extends beyond the single question of the Established Church. Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN is probably not disposed to identify himself with the anarchic and treasonable language of a few Nonconformist ministers who are also newspaper editors. Insults to the QUEEN, denunciations of landlords, proposals of borrowing the methods and the doctrines of Irish Fenians are as applicable to the rest of England as to Wales. To do Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN justice, he takes no notice of the revolutionary declamation which is habitually used by the professed organs of Welsh nationality. Though he probably intends only to strengthen the case against the Church, he ostensibly confines himself to assertions of the claim of Wales to recognition as a separate political community. He would perhaps be satisfied if Parliament invariably deferred to the majority of Welsh members. In one passage, indeed, he finds a grievance in the supposed discouragement of the claims of Welshmen to official promotion. He says that "he cannot call to mind a single Welshman who is at "the present time a Minister of the Crown, an Ambas"sador, a Judge of the Supreme Court, or a Governor of a "British colony." There was lately a Welsh judge of the Supreme Court, and a Welsh Under-Secretary for the Colonies had previously served as Judge Advocate-General.

It is true that only a few Welshmen have at any time held the great offices of State. Mr. CHARLES WYNN was the last member of a Welsh family who attained Cabinet rank; and it can certainly never have occurred to him or to his contemporaries that his connexion with the Principality had been an impediment to his career. Among possible Ministers no distinction could have even unconsciously been drawn between Welsh and English candidates for office. Competent candidates of Welsh descent must always have been few. It would be found on inquiry that Welshmen have had more than their share of success as tradesmen in great towns, and especially in London. It may be confidently stated that for hundreds of years no prejudice has been entertained in England against Welsh candidates for public or private employment. SHAKSPEARE himself, while he was amused with the peculiarities of FLUELLEN or Sir HUGH EVANS, evidently regarded Welshmen with strong partiality. In many parts of England Irishmen are unpopular, and possibly the success of the Scotch in certain departments may excite feelings of jealousy. Welshmen are habitually regarded as members of the general community. Until lately Welsh farmers, bearing to their landlords precisely the same relations which existed in the rest of England, never thought of agrarian agitation, or of combinations to resist the payment of tithes. It is unfortunately true that when popular passion has been excited by demagogues, the use of a separate language furnishes great facilities for the propagation of discontent and disorder.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN perhaps exaggerates the importance of the vague and varying feeling which he calls "the "sentiment of nationality," but nothing would be gained by a discussion of the force and tendency of an influence which, though real, is indefinite. It is, as Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN admits, difficult to answer the question "What "constitutes a nation?" Perhaps it would be a pardonable paradox to reply that in the world, as it now exists, a million of inhabitants of a small district cannot constitute a nation. It is under English laws, and by unrestricted intercourse with England, that the Welsh people have prospered as fully in proportion to their material resources as the inhabitants of any other part of the kingdom. Their partial backwardness in civilization may be attributed almost exclusively to their use of a language only understood by themselves. Mr. MORGAN truly says that similarity of language does not necessarily constitute a nation. It is also true that community of race and of religion is equally inconclusive. Mr. MORGAN oddly recognizes the independent nationality of the Jews. It seems that "the Hebrew race, "dispersed as it has been over three continents, and per"secuted with unrelenting severity in each of them, still "remains about as much a nation as it was in the days of "the Mosaic dispensation." The history of the Jews is sufficiently remarkable, but in a political sense they cannot be said to constitute a nation. They have no territory of their own, they have no language of their own in common use, and they take an active part in the public affairs of the countries in which they happen to reside. There have been English and French Ministers of Jewish blood. A Jewish family has lately been raised to the highest social rank in the most ceremonious Court in Europe. The Welsh, including an indigenous aristocracy, approach more nearly to the character of a nation than the Jews who are scattered over Europe and Asia. A Welshman may be, or may believe himself to be, enthusiastically patriotic when he thinks of the narrow sphere to which he belongs; but he has another kind of patriotic claim extending to all the rights and privileges of an English subject. When Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN held office, he certainly never suspected that any of his colleagues had inherited a better right to public employment than himself. To have been a Minister in a Welsh Cabinet, if such an office had existed, would have been a poor object of ambition. He is of opinion that the bilingual difficulty may be overcome, so that Welshmen will at the same time communicate with one another in their own language and be on an equality with their English neighbours in the advantages which are derived from free intercourse with the world. It is not known that the popular use of two languages has ever been found possible, except perhaps during a short period of change. However this may be, the bicivic relation, if such a word may be coined, would prove to be wholly untenable. The Welsh members, who at present are almost unanimous in their devotion to Mr. GLADSTONE, can scarcely be allowed to exercise political influence in England and to regulate at their exclusive pleasure all the affairs of Wales. Some of them were, until they discovered at the last election the expediency of changing their convictions, strongly opposed to the disestablishment of the Church. It is not known whether they will, for similar reasons, become members of the offshoot from the Irish National League which has been planted by DAVITT in conjunction with a certain number of Dissenting ministers. Those Welsh members who happen to own considerable landed estates in the Principality may perhaps not be disposed to encourage confiscation of their property, even if they are rewarded by continued possession of their seats in Parliament. Other political adventurers, who are not connected with Wales by birth or property, may perhaps be more conformable, unless they fear that the example of plunder will be followed in the rest of England.

The essay is, as has been said, clearly and pleasantly written; but it is almost exclusively designed to promote the destruction of the Church of England in Wales. It is, of course, certain that the same mischievous measure would be applied to the Church in general as soon as a precedent had been established in Wales; but Mr. Osborne Morgan and his friends are for the present indifferent to the maintenance or abolition of the most beneficent of institutions, except within their own district. Possibly the preachers who support them would see with complacent feelings the temporary inferiority to themselves of their English brethren. One main reason for pushing on the Welsh agitation at the present time is the rapid advance of the Church in popularity and influence. The clerical demagogue who is the principal promoter of the Welsh National League imprudently discloses his bitter resentment at the frequent conversion of the younger Nonconformists to the doctrine and discipline of the Church. To him the resolute or hesitating proselytes are as odious as the clergy, the gentry, the Royal Family, and the other numerous objects of his hatred. Mr. Morgan writes as if the Welsh, like the Irish, had adhered to an ancient form of faith which is opposed to the teaching of the Established Church; yet he is well aware that the founders of Welsh Dissent were, for the most part, ordained members of the Church, and that their secession is little more than a century old. It seems but reasonable that the Establishment, now effectually reformed, should be allowed to try the experiment of reunion. Its enemies, with impartial candour, proclaim their hostility to many forms and institutions which have no religious or sectarian character The landowners, who have hitherto been on excellent terms with their tenants, are to be expropriated by the same agency which has been organized for the purpose of attacks on the Church. It will be interesting to learn whether Mr. Osborne Morgan is disposed to legislate for Wales according to the demands of the newest school of agrarian demagogues.

THE FORGED LETTERS.

THE story of the forged letters from Prince Ferdinand to the Comtesse de Flandre is, of course, sufficiently curious; yet it has in it certain things which are familiar enough to the historical student. To begin with, the fate which seems to rest on all such mysterious documents, from the Liber De Tribus Impostoribus downwards (except that the real Liber De Tribus Impostoribus had the good fortune never to be discovered at all), has attended these epistles. The memoirs which are so anxiously expected, the revelations which are confidently supposed to lurk in archives and muniment chests, almost always turn out to be secrets de Polichinelle, and the really astonishing and significant discoveries are things which were never discussed beforehand at all. In this case it has suited certain journalists, who may have their reasons for not blowing with too eager and nipping breath on the popular tendency to believe in mares'-nests, to talk about the "consummate skill and "knowledge" of the forgers and the wonderful dexterity with which they achieved their object. Now, in the first place, the achievement of that object—the sowing of distrust of Germany in the mind of a strongly anti-German and extremely suspicious prince—can hardly be regarded as in any case a very herculean task. In the second place, the officially published history of the documents is wanting at exactly those most interesting points at which such histories of such matters always are wanting. It is obvious that, if the letters did not come from the persons and were not sent to the persons from and to whom they purported to be sent, their value was, if not nil, reduced to something which it is not very difficult to appraise. But, though we have the highly respectable authority of the Prussian, or rather German, Gazette of the Empire telling us that they were not written by Prince Ferdinand, that they were not written to the Comtesse de Flandre, that the document attributed to Prince Reuss was (by the way, this is an odd form of disclaimer) "never made by letter," and that "the parts ascribed in these documents to other august "personages have proved to be mere inventions," what the Reichsanzeiger does not tell us is the positive side of the matter, which would be much more interesting than these negatives. Who did write the letters? How did the Czar, who, if nervous and suspicious, is not supposed to be either ignorant or unintelligent, come to believe in the truth of an unaccredited tissue of lies? How did Prince Bismarck come to make or sanction a definite, not to say offensive, charge against one of the most illustrious Royal families of Europe—a charge, be it remembered, which, though its precise bearing was then unknown, was insinuated, to the surprise of Europe, long before there was any public talk of the forged letters at all? To know all this would be really interesting, if not really important; and it is here exactly that the official newsman becomes an Official Know-nothing.

The text of the communications will not reward the gobemouche unless the mention of distinguished personages is by itself sufficient to delight him; but it is not without a certain interest to the political student, who will not be long in discovering where the sting, to the Czar, of the correspondence lay. The writer, whoever he was, may have taken the names of distinguished personages as audaciously in vain as the Reichsanzeiger pleases, but he knew what he was writing about; and, leaving out names, special occasions, special personages, and so forth, it would take a great deal more formal and complete repudiation than is at all likely to have come or to come from Prince Bismarck to make us disbelieve in the general accuracy of the view taken by the sender, whoever he was, of the correspondence. It is expressly asserted to have been translated by some one from German into French, a process which would enable expressions to be heightened or softened for the special purpose with great ease; for have not international difficulties turned, or been like to turn, on nothing more solid than the difference of sense of the word "transaction" in two different languages? Indeed, the very frankness and accuracy of the exposition might have thrown doubts on the authenticity. It is true that Prince Ferdinand and Bulgaria itself are "pawns in "Prince Bismarck's game." It is perfectly true that Germany could give no open support to Prince Ferdinand, and yet might secretly consider the Prince's action by no means wanting in conformity to German interests. It is, if possible, even truer that upon "the grave questions of interest "existing between Germany and Russia" depend the utterances rather than the sentiments of the youngest Empire in reference to the youngest Principality. And, if we are confronted with Prince Bismarck's denial (the exact terms of which, be it remembered, no one knows), it is quite clear that this settles very little. We have not the slightest doubt that Poins was quite right in declaring that he "never said so": Sir John was capable of more audacious inventions than that. But Poins himself admitted that he should have had no extraordinary objection to be Prince Hal's brother-in-law. That Prince Ferdinand, for all his shocking actions, "may have no worse fortune" than to get the better of His Majesty the Czar of All the Russias is a wish which most undoubtedly has nothing in it but what is consonant with sound German policy.

If, however, Russia and the Russians are satisfied with the attribution to some persons unknown of a set of documents the authorship of which can fortunately, and no doubt with a good conscience, be denied by persons known, no one else has a right to object. It would seem that the Russian mind is passing through an edifying state of moderation and charity. Germany, it is admitted, has behaved quite charmingly. With regard to Bulgaria, nothing is wanted but a recurrence to the Treaty of Berlin, pure and simple; with respect to England, nothing is wanted but that Lord Randolph Churchill may bring us all to a better mind and to the arms of Russia. These amiable aspirations are too consonant to the season to meet with disrespectful or churlish treatment. It is, indeed, true that the longest and most diligent study of the Treaty of Berlin will fail to discover therein the slightest authorization of Russian preponderance in the Bulgarian Principality. There is no kidnapping there, no mission of General Kaulbars, no "lieutenant-prince," nothing, in short, that Russia has been striving for months and years to obtain and do. But there are provisions which, in private law, would certainly be interpreted by any code or court in any country in a sense unfavourable to Russia's pretension of keeping Bulgaria prince-less. It is also true that, as has been frequently pointed out, it depends solely on Russia whether or no England shall be friends with her. The secret of that friendship is to be found in a single text of Holy Writ:—"Let him that stole, steal no more." We want nothing of Russia's, we do not even demand that Russia shall retire from territory which she has occupied in continuous and flagrant disregard of understanding after understanding with England. The "Russophobia" which is feigned by some interested persons to exist in England is for the most part, if not wholly, a silly fable. It depends absolutely on the conduct of Russia for a few years whether the enmity which at present exists on her side, and the too well-founded distrust which exists on ours, shall be replaced by an understanding at least as solid as that which exists between Great Britain and any other Power whatever. But words will not do it, and nothing that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL or any one else can say will do it. The spectacle of one neighbour imploring another to come and fall upon his neck all the while that the imploror is pulling down fences, and removing landmarks, and enclosing common ground, and diverting watercourses, and impounding cattle, and so forth, is, no doubt, merely, as political comedy, an agreeable one, though it can hardly be exhibited to an admiring world without some loss of dignity on the part of both actors. "If you want good neighbourship from us, "be a good neighbour yourself and have done with it," is the only reply that Lord RANDOLPH or any one else who knows the facts can make to Russian plaintiveness.

A RIGHT PATRIOT.

IT is not an easy thing to be a patriot with sense and grace, and perhaps it is particularly difficult to be a Scottish patriot. Such a one is tempted to show his mettle rather by attacking the adjacent kingdom of England than by peacefully loving his native country. The translator of HORACE who calls himself HUGH HALIBURTON is a patriot of another sort—of the right sort. His little book, For Puir Auld Scotland (Edinburgh: PATERSON), is choicely good, as WALTON says, full of excellent prose, and of tuneful piping on the Doric reed. Mr. HALIBURTON slips, in one piece, "A Holiday in Arcadia," into the faults of the old garrulous Blackwood manner, and he makes KEATS talk of PIZARRO where he really speaks of CORTES. Indeed PIZARRO will not scan in the sonnet on HOMER, as Mr. HALIBURTON will find, if he tries. He has got the whole quotation wrong; and from this, and the style, we may conjecture that the rhapsody above St. Mary's Loch is an early essay, uncorrected. It is when he comes to Scottish rural life, Scottish literature, the Scottish language, that Mr. HALIBURTON will charm alike his countrymen and "the "Puds," as Sir WALTER rather briefly styles persons born south of the Tweed.

Mr. HALIBURTON thinks that the Scottish language is dying out, and that Scottish literature is neglected. For the first complaint we fear there is no remedy. Melancholy it is, if quite true, that the Scotch are beginning merely to talk English with a local accent, and are losing their old words and old idioms. The old proverbs, at least, are likely to survive; no educated Scot will forget them. "I'll "no keep a dog and bark mysel'," is capital; and entirely Theocritean is "The thrift of you, and a dog's woo', would "mak a braw wab." This is exactly in the style of GORGO in the Adoniazusæ:—

> Ἑπταδράχμως κυνάδας, κ.τ.λ.

"He bought what he meant for five fleeces, and paid seven "drachmas apiece for—dogskins." Here is another saw not likely to be lost in the North:—"They speak o' my "drinking, but ne'er think o' my drouth." "Corn's no "for staigs" is applied by the crofters as a Southron pock-pudding might understand it; but "staigs" are not stags; they are colts. "His eggs hae a' twa yolks" is a version of our proverb of geese and swans. Home Rulers do not apply to Liberal-Unionists this—"They are far ahint that "canna follow." It would often have been well for a litigious people to remember this:—"Hame's ay hame-like, "quoth the Deil in the Court o' Session." The language may be wearing away, but the poet is a pessimist when he writes:—

> Oor nationality, oor name,
> Oor patriotic love for hame—
> I 'maist could greet; I can but sigh—
> They're wearing oot, they're a' gaun by.

Not a bit of it! Mr. HALIBURTON's verse and prose prove the reverse; and so do Mr. STEVENSON's Scottish poems, which are, we think, not quite so correct in language, and more resemble compositions in a foreign tongue than this minstrel's artless and candid effusions. He speaks of old times—

> When ne'er a lisp was tolerated,
> And "lock" for "loch" like Satan hated,
> And aye the "r" though crank awee,
> Gaed birlin' aff the mooth-ruif free.

Well, who does say "lock," except the men and women who make Dumfries rhyme to HUMPHREYS? Is Mr. WILLIAM BLACK not in the land? and is his Scotch not good enough? We speak not of Mr. GEORGE MACDONALD, whose Scotch may be excellent "Aberdeen awa," but whose sentiments were never nursed on parritch. The Shorter Catechism, or "Carritch," one cannot pretend to regret, though BURNS taught it to his herd-lads, as Mr. HALIBURTON reminds us; and a funny thing to see must these lectures have been:—

> And aye on Sundays, duly, nightly,
> I on the Carritch targe them tightly;
> Till, faith, wee Davoc's grown sae gleg,
> Though scarcely langer than your leg,
> He'll screed ye aff Effectual Calling
> As fast as ony in the dwelling.

This has a pleasant antique sound, but the Carritch was a frightful nuisance. Either you did not understand one word of it, in which case your condition was the more gracious, or you did understand it, and were possessed by all the horrors of Calvinism, beheld with the distinctness of a child's imagination.

Whatever is wrong is the fault of railways, Mr. HALIBURTON says with perfect truth. And for railways there is no remedy till the Ragnarok of industrial society comes. Other causes, chiefly wire-fencing, have made the herd's occupation gone. The long-legged Highland boy is no longer needed to keep the kye out of the corn. He does not sit and sing "on ilka hillock" as of old. His humble fare of porridge and pease bannocks is not spread for his great appetite. The herd is gone, like the Brownies, and there is less employment, less health, more crowding, more misery. The herd sometimes became a learned man. In a beautiful glen of Galloway, scores of miles from railways, a pillar crowns such a hill as Greece often crowned with an acropolis. It is the monument of MURRAY, who from a herd-boy became a renowned Oriental scholar. FERGUSSON and LEYDEN are other examples of promotion. They met the Muses, like THAMYRIS the Thracian, in the hills; but were more humble and more fortunate than he in this encounter.

As to Scottish literature, we fear that Scots know it but little. DOUGLAS and DUNBAR, LYNDSAY and BARBOUR, at least, are little read. But so, to be sure, is CHAUCER. Mr. HALIBURTON proposes a Scottish Chair in one of the Universities; and, if we have Chairs of Celtic, why not of Scottish? Where is Mr. ANDREW CARNEGIE? Here is his chance. Principal SHAIRP, it is true, nearly turned the Oxford Poetry Chair into a Professorship of Scottish Literature.

THE SUGAR BOUNTIES.

THE controversy on the effect of the sugar bounties has the less importance because the system is apparently about to be discontinued. The delegates who attended the late Congress, though they had no power to conclude a definite agreement, would not have declared their own opinions so distinctly if they had not known that they were expressing the deliberate policy of their respective Governments. In this case the other States are indebted to England for helping them out of a difficulty which they had imposed on themselves. The motives, indeed, of the English Government in procuring the assemblage of the Congress were, as in almost all international transactions, not exclusively disinterested. An important branch of English industry had been in some places destroyed, and elsewhere injuriously affected, by the perverse legislation of foreigners. The sugar refiners and the workmen whom they employed were not the only sufferers by the artificial derangement of the trade. One of the main objects of the grant of bounties was to favour the beet-root sugar of the Continent at the expense of the superior material produced in the West Indies. Both the manufacturers and the sugar-cane growers had repeatedly pressed on successive Governments their claim to redress, and the justice of their complaints had always been acknowledged. It seemed reasonable that the country which enjoys a monopoly of the doctrine of Free-trade should undertake the conversion of other communities, especially when it could rely on the conclusive argument that they were injuring themselves. On the other hand, the Continental States were slow to believe in the sincerity of a competitor who professed to relieve them from an onerous liability. It was only after many refusals or evasions that Lord SALISBURY succeeded in persuading the bounty-giving Governments to discuss the question in an amicable manner, with the hope of arriving at an agreement.

The FOREIGN SECRETARY may perhaps have ascertained that he was preaching to a body of converts who at last understood a few of the rudimentary truths of political economy.

The English proposals were so obviously reasonable and just that the resolutions of the Congress have been generally approved at home as well as abroad. The greatest happiness, or the cheapest supply of sugar, to the greatest number will obviously be promoted by fair and equal competition in the markets of the world. Perfect freedom of trade can never be attained until it becomes cosmopolitan. The universal practice of adjusting supply to demand, and of selling in the dearest market and buying in the cheapest, would increase universal prosperity. At this point some economists have suggested that the interests of a single country in a specified trade or industry are not always or necessarily coincident with the general welfare of mankind. The bounties have had the effect of providing English consumers with sugar at a lower price than the natural cost of the commodity. The artificial reduction of price has been estimated by some writers on the subject at no less than two millions a year, and the professed representatives of national selfishness assert that the boon to English purchasers is worth more than all the capital which was in former times invested in the manufacture. Mr. LEVESON GOWER, who began the discussion, contended that the soundest principles of economy were not inconsistent with the acceptance of a voluntary gift. It was true that the donors of the bounty lost as much as the recipients gained; but Mr. LEVESON GOWER assumed, for the purpose of his argument, that the English representatives in the Congress had no concern with the general interests of Europe. If the bounties had not the effect of cheapening sugar in the English market, domestic manufacturers had no reason to complain of unequal competition. Other disputants on the same side have illustrated their propositions by supposing that foreigners might gratuitously supply England either with sugar or with other articles of general consumption. It would scarcely be suggested that such an offer ought to be rejected because it would indicate absurd blindness on the part of the proposers. Mr. LEVESON GOWER and a "Puzzled M.P." who has taken part in the controversy fail to understand the expediency of inducing foreign producers not to offer a large gift to English consumers. They would be still more confident of the soundness of their judgment if they were not opposed to the respectable authority of Sir LOUIS MALLET. Perhaps he might with advantage have been less contemptuous in his rejection of an opinion which assuredly rests on plausible grounds.

Sir LOUIS MALLET explains in the clearest manner the mischievous results of arbitrary interference with the ordinary course of manufacture and trade. The preference which is given to beetroot sugar over a commodity which is intrinsically more valuable undoubtedly involves a heavy loss to those whom it affects. The bounties are intended to operate as protective duties for the benefit of farmers, and they are of course liable to all the objections which apply to other industrial anomalies. It is only surprising that a dozen civilized States should, in one instance among a hundred, have learned by experience the cost and inconvenience of creating artificial monopolies. It is less easy to follow Sir LOUIS MALLET when he anticipates either the maintenance of present prices or even a reduction in the cost of sugar to the English consumer. If he could establish the probability of so paradoxical a result, his opponents would gladly withdraw their adverse judgment. It is not improbable that the abolition of a vicious system may to a certain extent cheapen production; but, if prices on the Continent maintain their present level, it would seem that the West Indian planter and the English sugar-refiners must be as incapable as at present of sustaining competition with France, Germany, and Belgium. It is true that in the supposed case the Government would be no longer troubled with remonstrances against arrangements which would have become reasonable and just. The Foreign Office and the Board of Trade evidently anticipate a different result. Baron DE WORMS expressed the well-known opinions of Lord SALISBURY as well as his own when he congratulated the Congress on the conclusions which it had formed. It might have been thought that the Government regarded too exclusively the interests of producers, if Sir LOUIS MALLET, who has long been the most orthodox of political economists, had not protested against unfavourable criticisms on the work which has been accomplished. Almost all parties will agree in approval of the avoidance of any reference to import duties which may be imposed. The Continental Governments retain the right of giving their own subjects a total or partial monopoly of the sugar trade. The negotiations would probably have broken down if any attempts had been made to interfere with the exercise of their discretion.

The controversy which has followed the decision of the Congress has been, to the knowledge of the disputants on both sides, only interesting as it turned on an issue of theory or of principle. It was not to be expected that the English Government would repudiate the opinions which it had succeeded in maintaining to the satisfaction of all the foreign delegates. It is possible that Sir LOUIS MALLET may be right in approving of the Convention, though he has not succeeded in confuting Mr. LEVESON GOWER. There was substantial advantage in appealing rather to a body of representatives of the several Governments than separately to each of the Powers concerned. If the sugar manufacture and the West Indian trade can be revived, confidence will be more readily reposed in the Convention than in any commercial treaty which could have been proposed. As between England and the other parties to the agreement the Convention might be criticized as a one-sided bargain, or nudum pactum. Lord SALISBURY would perhaps not have regretted an opportunity of exchanging concessions in a commercial compact; but the country which had offered no bounties or exceptional benefits to any branch of industry had nothing to yield. It fortunately happened that the other States arrived at the sound conclusion that they might as well surrender an obvious disadvantage. The negotiations which are now proceeding at Washington will be much less simple. The chief English plenipotentiary is a sound economist on questions of protective duties. There is no probability of any concession on the part of the United States in the form of a reduction of the tariff. When Mr. CHAMBERLAIN prophesies at a public dinner the future abandonment by the United States of protective duties, experienced politicians reflect that there are disadvantages in amateur diplomacy. A member of the profession might have other disqualifications, but he would not talk so freely or so often. Since Mr. CHAMBERLAIN landed in America he has been too ready to take all the world into his confidence.

Mr. LAURENCE OLIPHANT, in his Episodes of a Life of Adventure, gives an amusing account of Lord ELGIN'S negotiation of the last reciprocity treaty between the United States and England as representing Canada. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN would have little difficulty in reviving the arrangement, but he has neither so simple a policy to promote nor so free a discretion to exercise. Lord ELGIN had no Sir CHARLES TUPPER to consult, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN will scarcely obtain the assent of the Canadian Government to simple reciprocity. Concessions as to the Canadian Fisheries might probably purchase corresponding advantages; but on this point Mr. CHAMBERLAIN will not be at liberty to give way. The main object of the American Government is to establish a Customs Union with Canada, which would involve the imposition of differential duties on English produce. It might have been expected that the proposal would excite strong repugnance both in Canada and in England. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH is the ablest Canadian advocate of a measure which would at once put an end to all schemes of Imperial Federation. In this controversy he seems to assume the position of a colonist; though he would probably not willingly support any policy which he might regard as disadvantageous to England, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has taken more than one opportunity of denouncing a proposal which in his opinion tends directly to the separation of Canada from the Empire. It is strange that Protectionist communities are, for the most part, not unwilling to enlarge the area of internal freedom of trade. A Customs Union with Canada would bring within the provisions of the American tariff a country as large as the United States, though its population is comparatively small. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH declares that the arrangement is consistent with natural and geographical laws. The Canadian Ministers and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN protest against the regulation of Canadian Customs duties by the American Congress. In some respects the issue resembles the comparatively trivial question of the European sugar bounties. It is possible that Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH'S policy may tend to produce the greatest good to the largest number; but the majority of Englishmen will probably agree with Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in deprecating a measure which apparently tends to the disruption of the Colonial Empire.

ODIUM ANTI-MEDICUM.

IT is a great misfortune for the public that Lord GRIMTHORPE is not compelled to write for his living under a vigilant and responsible editor. In that case his exuberant vitality might be turned to good account, and his zeal would not be allowed to run away with his discretion. Lord GRIMTHORPE has been passionately excited by a very commonplace lawsuit decided by Mr. Justice MANISTY at the end of the Michaelmas sittings. In that action Mr. KENNETH MILLICAN obtained an injunction against the Governors of the Queen's Jubilee Hospital, Gloucester Square, to restrain them from dismissing him as one of the medical staff. The ground of Mr. MILLICAN's dismissal was that he had connected himself with the Margaret Street Infirmary, where treatment by homœopathy is practised, if the patients desire it. But Mr. Justice MANISTY's decision, against which an appeal has been entered, was based rather on certain irregularities in the mode of Mr. MILLICAN's attempted removal, which in the opinion of the Court were unfair to him, than on the reasons given by his employers for their conduct. It would indeed be obviously beyond the province of a legal tribunal to decide between homœopathy and allopathy; nor would a judge's view of the matter be worth more than anybody else's. So far as we can understand Mr. MILLICAN's rather confused letters in the Times, he does not practise homœopathy himself, but only maintains that homœopathic practitioners do not get fair play, whatever that may mean. These simple facts, of no particular interest except to the parties concerned, might have seemed rather unpromising material for a fiery controversy, at least to ordinary men. But Lord GRIMTHORPE is not an ordinary man. He is, as Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD says of SHELLEY, though in a different sense, "inflammable," and the fire is apt to kindle before he has mused sufficiently. Lord GRIMTHORPE's rage against the medical profession is probably not inspired by any particular dislike of doctors. The fact is that he hates all professions, except the legal one, and "bangs them most severely," whether they consist of clergymen, doctors, architects, or clockmakers. If Lord GRIMTHORPE ever suffers from the physical ills to which flesh is heir, he may, for aught we know, take his blue pill, or his pink medicine, with Christian resignation. But doctors in the lump he holds to be bad. He denies their right to say that they will not act with homœopathists, he threatens them with an indictment for criminal conspiracy, he would apparently be glad to see the gaols full of orthodox physicians and surgeons. How much law Lord GRIMTHORPE knows is, we believe, a question open to considerable doubt. His career at the Parliamentary Bar did not require much legal learning, and a Vicar-General may, we presume, confine himself to the principles of ecclesiastical jurisprudence. He certainly seems to have missed the point of Mr. Justice MANISTY's judgment.

Lord GRIMTHORPE, however, with all his swagger, sometimes meets antagonists who are more than a match for him. Such, if we are not mistaken, was Sir JOHN HAWKSHAW in the witness-box. Such certainly is "R. B. C." in the columns of the Times. As DRYDEN said of ELKANAH SETTLE, Lord GRIMTHORPE's prose is boisterous, and his style incorrigibly lewd. "R. B. C." writes with composure, and differs from Lord GRIMTHORPE in sometimes pausing to take breath. Moreover, he keeps his temper, and therefore does not lose his head. Lord GRIMTHORPE altogether fails to show, indeed he has made no serious effort to show, why doctors should co-operate professionally with men whom they believe to be dangerous impostors. They may be wrong, of course. But they are bound to act upon their own convictions, and not to trifle with their patients' lives by sanctioning what they regard as a fraud. One instance cited by "R. B. C." will explain the medical standpoint as well as a thousand. "Belladonna," he says, "was adopted [by the homœopathists] as the cure for scarlet fever, because it was said to produce a red "rash upon the skin. Belladonna was also recom"mended by HAHNEMANN as a cure for hydrophobia, "because it produces a dryness of the mouth, which leads "the patient to make efforts to relieve himself from the "annoyance of viscid saliva. But there is no real resem"blance between the belladonna rash and the rash of "scarlet fever, nor between the viscid saliva produced "by belladonna and the condition produced by hydro"phobia. Nor, after the lapse of eighty years, has there been "any instance of a cure of either disease by the reputed "remedy." This is putting the matter plainly, and it ought to be decisive. Either the whole of medical science rests upon nothing, or homœopathy is utter nonsense. In these circumstances it is ridiculous to expect that allopathists will consort with homœopathists. An honest and competent man cannot work with a person whom he believes to be either a fool or a knave. No one objects to the practice of homœopathy by those who put faith in it, and any one may resort to them if he thinks fit. But even Lord GRIMTHORPE can hardly suppose that it is in the power of the Law Courts, or even of Parliament, to make men of scientific training consort with ignorant quacks. It would not be tolerance, but scandalous indifference to truth and to human life, if doctors were to follow Lord GRIMTHORPE's advice and treat homœopathy as an open question. Lord GRIMTHORPE says that homœopathy has never been formally condemned by the medical profession as a whole. We doubt whether the Society of Architects have met together and solemnly affirmed that the law of gravitation is sound. If Lord GRIMTHORPE thinks that any drug which will produce certain symptoms in a healthy person will cure the same symptoms in a diseased person, and that a cough or a rash is always due to the same cause, he is entitled to his opinion. But he cannot make a doctor share it, or force him to pretend to respect those who do.

ITALY AND ABYSSINIA.

THE inevitable consequence of the Italian occupation of Massowah has finally come. It has not been hasty in coming, but it is at hand at last, and Italy has a little war to conduct as the first, and too probably the chief, result of its acquisition of a port on the Red Sea. The efforts which England has made in the interest of both parties have been unsuccessful, and could hardly have been other than unsuccessful. The Abyssinians have been encouraged by the victory at Dogali, and will be satisfied with nothing short of Massowah, which the Italians will not surrender. The adventure of Italy is one which Englishmen ought to take an interest in, not only because it affects them more or less, but because they have both directly and indirectly promoted it. Italy was practically invited into the Red Sea by this country as part of a policy which was neither very consistent nor yet very dignified, but which may be said to be intelligible, on the ground that, since we must have European neighbours in those parts, it suits our book better to have two who can be played off against one another than to be compelled to endure a single rival. The suggestion—or perhaps it was only the ready consent—that the Italians should occupy Massowah was our direct share in originating this little war. The indirect share was contributed by our example. On ordinary business principles it is impossible to justify this Italian venture. It passes the ingenuity of man to show that such a place in such a region can be of any real use to Italy. But, in fact, ordinary business principles have very little to do with this intervention. It can only be politely explained in one way. There are on the continent of Europe many, otherwise reasonable, people who appear to argue in this fashion:—England has a vast Indian Empire, and is vastly rich; Holland has still great possessions in the Indian Ocean, and, though somewhat déchu, it is the more considerable for owning them; therefore, all you have to do in order to become richer and more considerable is to get hold of a spot of ground somewhere in the East, no matter what it is and no matter where, provided only it is large enough to hoist a flag in, and lies conveniently near to still unconquered barbarians. Whether the desired possession is worth having, and whether the barbarians will not give a great deal of costly trouble, and yield no tribute worth having, are questions which these politicians do not apparently ask themselves.

The Italians being a remarkably cool-headed and calculating people, it must be presumed that they have counted the cost before embarking on their little war of conquest. It is true that they protest they are not going to conquer Abyssinia; but a universal experience shows what is the value of protests of this sort when a civilized Power comes in contact with barbarians. Before very long Italy will either have retired defeated or will be engaged in efforts to bring Abyssinia under a protectorate. There is at least some probability that the Italians, being influenced by the delusion described above, have hardly sufficiently considered what this means. If they are encouraging themselves by the recollection of our expedition against THEODORE, they are certainly making a considerable mistake. That campaign was, in fact, much such a raid as the bold BUCCLEUCH executed on behalf of his friend KINMONT WILLIE, though on a larger scale and with a more elaborate apparatus. When once Lord NAPIER had released his prisoners he was at liberty to march back to the coast and sail away with men and stores. Moreover, THEODORE had contrived to make himself so hateful to his vassals that the Abyssinians generally stood neutral in what fighting there was. The Italians will not be able to go away, and there is nothing to show that the present NEGUS is as cordially detested as his very high-handed and violent predecessor. If the Italians will make a slight study of the French occupation of Algeria, or of the Dutch war (still going on, we believe) in Acheen, or even of our own recent troubles with Upper Burmah, they will see that it is one thing to march into a savage country, fight a battle and come out, and quite another thing to occupy it seriously. As things stand with them, they must occupy Abyssinia, or at least a considerable part of it. The country is a difficult one to operate in, the natives are exceedingly courageous, and, as the Italians had occasion to learn at Dogali, their tactics are not the most barbarous thing about them. We would wish to be polite, but after all it is a fact that the Italians have not shone as a military people at any period of their history, though they have been abundantly clever as officers. On the whole, when the nature of the country, of the enemy, of the invader, and of the problem to be tackled are considered, it seems at least probable that the Italians are undertaking an enterprise which will require the employment of some fifty thousand men first and last to supply the army in the field, the necessary reserves, the indispensable garrisons, and the equally indispensable protection of convoys and the communications. Of course the expense will be in proportion. Our expedition cost a number of millions which is disputed according to different systems of calculation, but which has never been put lower than nine, and has sometimes been put as high as twenty. The Italians may be more economical, but if they go through with their enterprise, which is from the nature of the case larger still, they will have to spend at least as much, if not more, before they are done with it. To foreigners it appears a piece of dubious wisdom to put such a burden on the already heavily-weighted Italian taxpayer.

THE SHOW AT PORTUMNA.

NOTHING seems to have been wanting to the completeness of the performance just given by Mr. WILFRID BLUNT and his travelling company in the Courthouse at Portumna. The manager's own "get-up," with the "green favour" in his button-hole, is described by good judges as faultless, and the pose of another member of the company, in an attitude understood to have been studied after a well-known historical picture, was universally admired. The mere presence of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE and Mr. EVELYN constituted a dramatic "point" of the highest value; and, though some think that the speech of the gentleman from Colchester who took the opportunity of informing the public that he was "an "English lawyer" was somewhat in the nature of "gag," it would be hard to deny an innocent opportunity of self-advertisement to a meritorious member of the troupe whom his ill-luck had fitted with too insignificant a part. We have all heard of the actor who, having announced that the carriage was at the door, proceeded to add that "the man "who would lay his hand upon a woman, save in the way of "kindness, was," &c.; and it was perhaps this spirit that impelled the gentleman from Colchester, dissatisfied with the task of merely introducing a deputation to Mr. BLUNT, to declare publicly that the Irish constable who laid his hand upon a crowd, save in the same way, was unworthy the countenance and approval of an English lawyer with an Irish name. Anyhow, his interruption was not more absurd, from the theatrical point of view, than the whole proceedings at Portumna, of which it is difficult for any one who has not gone as mad with childish vanity as the whole company of actors and actresses themselves to regard with any other feeling than that of disrespectful mirth. That it may please the Irish themselves, who are always acting even in their most serious moments, is likely enough; but if the average Englishman, with his inbred disdain of attitudinizing and his keen eye for exaggeration, be moved by it—we care not whether he be Radical or Tory in his sympathies—to anything but contemptuous laughter, we can only say that all the healthier and manlier qualities of the race must have undergone a most unhappy change.

For what, apart altogether from the political rights and wrongs of the case, does Mr. BLUNT's exploit at Woodford amount to? What was there in the least degree heroic in the matter? A body styling itself the English Home Rule Union—and the proper sphere of whose operations therefore would, one might have thought, have been England—announced on the 23rd of last October that an indignation meeting would be held "to protest against the cruel and "heartless evictions to be carried out on the property of "Lord CLANRICARDE" during the ensuing week. This meeting the Irish Executive promptly, and, in our opinion, most properly, proclaimed; and upon that there were two courses, and two only, open to a man of sense and self-respect, as distinguished from self-esteem. He might have bowed, with or without verbal protest, to the orders of constituted authority, and issued notice that no attempt would be made to hold the prohibited meeting. Or—a much less becoming course, but still one which could with a certain amount of plausibility be defended—he should have presented himself at the appointed time and place of the meeting for the purpose of formally attesting the fact that he was prevented from holding it by force majeure. It might be difficult to do even this in certain cases without some risk to the public peace; but, assuming that the convener of the meeting succeeded in inducing it to disperse quietly, his action would perhaps be held justified by its results. These two alternatives exhaust the courses open to an orderly and law-abiding citizen. Still, it is, no doubt, possible for a man to incur disapproval as a disorderly citizen without forfeiting all the sympathy which attaches in most minds even to a mistaken exhibition of tenacity and courage. But whoever would retain this sympathy must show that he really has the courage of his misguided resolves. If he calls the attention of the world to the fact that he is about to run his head against a stone wall, he must really perform the feat. To interpose a buffer of some soft material at the last moment, and to endeavour to gain the applause of hardihood—or hardihead—while clinging to the undoubted comfort of a whole scalp, is to put himself in an ignobly ridiculous position. Yet this is precisely what Mr. WILFRID BLUNT did. Having written to Mr. BYRNE to inform him that he intended to hold the meeting in defiance of the prohibition of the Executive, he added that extraordinary warning, worthy to stand in history as marking the lowest descent of the business of "patriotism" in Ireland to the contemptible, that "there will be ladies as well as gentlemen present on "the platform." After which warning Mr. BLUNT went to the meeting, and when the police interfered and forbade him to address it, lay down, and kicked, his wife disposing herself in an effective attitude between him and the officers of the law. And then, after a few stage-whispers to each other—a proceeding which one of the police witnesses regarded, and recorded, with not unnatural surprise—Mr. BLUNT allowed himself, or was allowed by his wife, to be taken into custody, and secured his selection by the Deptford Caucus as Gladstonian candidate for that constituency. So many performances, similar in spirit to this, if differing from it in circumstances, are to be witnessed daily among us, in that eager pursuit of notoriety which seems to be the most marked characteristic of our time, that even people who are not given to practising these arts themselves have learnt to regard them with a sort of contemptuous toleration. But out of Ireland, or at any rate outside that circle of English politicians who are just now swelling with a sort of flatulent Pharisaism of benevolence towards a people who they hope will help them back to office, and whom they have consequently just discovered to be their brothers, is there any one who can possibly look upon this cheap posture-making as heroic?

We deal thus freely with Mr. WILFRID BLUNT's case, the result of which is not yet known, because the nature of that result has no business to affect any sensible man's view of Mr. BLUNT's action. Even assuming, what we have no reason whatever to expect, that on some technical ground or other the defendant's conviction should be quashed, the fact would remain that an English gentleman who should know better has placed himself, for the mere ends of self-display, in a position which only "fools or fanatics," to quote a classic classification, of perverted intelligence can regard as other than ridiculous. We say for the mere ends of self-display, because the pretext of public purposes which has been put forward by Mr. BLUNT in excuse for his Woodford escapade is so preposterously flimsy that, without ascribing to him that inordinate vanity which makes the desire of self-display unconscious, we cannot believe him capable of being deceived by it himself. To suppose him capable of believing—like men more foolish, or, as in the case of the patrons of metropolitan disorder, more evilly-disposed than himself—that the right of public meeting was seriously endangered by the prohibition of a public meeting at Woodford on the eve of an eviction is impossible. He must know perfectly well that the circumstances of that and similar cases in Ireland are, so to speak, indigenous to that country; and that to the general question of the right of public meeting and its limits they have literally nothing whatever to say. And as to his contention that his object in wishing to address the Woodford tenants was to exhort them to be patient and to refrain from violent resistance to the officers of the law, it is simply amazing that he should think it capable of being entertained by any Executive Government alive to its duty with respect to the maintenance of the public peace. If Mr. BLUNT had preached obedience to the Woodford tenants—and, as he tells us that he meant to do so, we accept his assurance—it is as certain as anything can be that many, if not most, of his colleagues on the platform would not have confined themselves to that text. But, even if they had, what then? Can Mr. BLUNT really expect us to believe that, if the Woodford tenants meant throwing boiling water on the sheriff's officers and the police, they would have been dissuaded from doing so by the eloquence of Mr. BLUNT and his friends? And if they did not intend any lawless proceedings of this kind, what would have been the use of addressing to them dehortations which, if they were not altogether superfluous, might very possibly have been accepted as hints at earnailing accompanied with sidelong glances at the pump? "Is it not a queer country," asked The MACDERMOTT, the other day, referring to the "Island of Saints"; "the con-"stable got a blow for his success in courtship, and Mr. "ROCHE was sent to gaol for his success in keeping the "peace?" Yes, The MACDERMOTT, it is a queer country, but it is not as queer as the last part of your question would imply. People who profess anxiety to keep the peace are, indeed, sometimes sent to prison, but only when their method of keeping the peace is calculated, if not designed, to provoke disorder. And, whatever may be the case with Ireland, England has not yet become so queer a country as that one of the QUEEN's regiments should co-operate, as Dr. TANNER seems to have expected the 4th Hussars to do, with the Irish practitioners of a system which the QUEEN's Government in Ireland are using every effort to put down. If Dr. TANNER's constituents can succeed in stopping the sport of the Hussars' Hunt, as a certain number of them have now pledged themselves to do—why, so it must be. But Captain KINCAIRD SMITH did no more than his duty as an English officer in curtly, but politely, declining on behalf of the regiment to enter into any negotiations with Dr. TANNER on the subject.

MR. STANHOPE ON THE COLONIAL DEFENCES.

IT is with the most entire sincerity that we express our sympathy for Mr. STANHOPE. The position of Secretary of State for War, when he happens to be a modest man, is not in all respects pleasant. He is compelled by official decency and the rules of the game to take it for granted that he is really engaged in supplying this Empire, on which, as we have been informed, the sun never sets, with an efficient army and adequate defences. It is also one of the rules that he must talk as if his department is to be perfectly trusted, and is entitled to be left alone to go on doing good work undisturbed by critical and inquiring outsiders. But, unfortunately, these two conventions are very hard to maintain. Something is always happening to show that our army is badly in want of this or the other necessary, and as for our defences, they may be coming, but it is like Major DALGETTY's promotion, "slow dooms slow." When attention is called to these facts in some noticeable way, the Secretary for War is in a disagreeable position. To confess the truth is painful, to deny it with any chance of success nearly impossible, so that the poor gentleman is reduced to the painful necessity of getting up, and asking the public to show him a little consideration and give him a little time. When the Secretary is gifted with the necessary nerve, he can brazen it out, of course; but then it is not every Minister who has the aplomb of ROBERT MACAIRE, and there are times when nothing else will do. Mr. STANHOPE has certainly not enough of the quality of the hero immortalized by DAUMIER; and when he is compelled to speak for the army his utterances are wont to be decidedly more of the pathetic than of the audacious order. It would be unfeeling to jeer at his difficulties, and so, as we said before, we regard him with a certain sympathy, and rather wish that the War Office were different than that the War Minister were.

The speech which Mr. STANHOPE has just delivered at Spilsby is very characteristic of the unreformed War Office. Lord BRASSEY has been going to and fro, and increasing his knowledge of the state of the coaling-stations. He has come back, and said his say about them in a letter to the Times, which received its due allowance of comment. Like every other witness, Lord BRASSEY had to report that the coaling-stations were partly unfortified and partly insufficiently fortified; that in most places the works were not finished; and that where they were ready, or nearly so, the guns had either not been supplied, or, when guns were sent out, they were not the best weapons science has invented. Lord BRASSEY also noted that in some places where fortifications seemed likely to be necessary there was not even a beginning made in supplying them; and he, in common with many others, did not quite see how garrisons were to be found at need. These are very plain matters, and important too. A Secretary of State for War in the reformed War Office of the future will doubtless make answer to their like plainly and to the point. Mr. STANHOPE answered in what is still the recognized style. He said in so many words that it was very rude of Lord BRASSEY, an ex-official person, too, to come and spoil the fun. Obviously Lord BRASSEY's duty was to remember that a Secretary for War is liable to be upset and unnerved when indiscreet tourists blab in the newspapers. But even Mr. STANHOPE felt that this would not be enough. The War Office must do something more than merely express its dislike of inquiring ex-official persons in yachts. So he did the traditional thing. He assured his hearers that the War Office has a plan, and that all will be well in time. We do not know what they thought about it at Spilsby; but, for our part, this famous plan for the proper protection of our trade routes reminds us of nothing so much as of a certain General TROCHU of whom Mr. STANHOPE has heard. There are good reasons at times why a Ministry should not publish information for the benefit of all the world; but we can see no reason why the War Office should be afraid of saying what it is going to do to secure the coaling stations. The fact that fortifications are being raised cannot be concealed; neither can the fact that they are not being built. If foreign War Offices want to know what ought to be done, they have no need to come to ours to ask. All they have to do is to consult a map; and, if they have not a sufficiently good one at hand, their military attaché in London can buy one full of the most instructive information as to the course of maritime commerce in Cockspur Street for a sovereign. With that before them, the War Offices and Admiralties of the Continent can easily learn where we are vulnerable and where we ought to be protected. We do not ask Mr. STANHOPE to publish minute accounts of the construction of the proposed forts. On such points the War Office can be as silent as it pleases. But, if it were to let everybody know what points it proposes to fortify, and what regular progress it intends to make, it would teach the foreigner nothing which he cannot easily learn, and it would secure a degree of confidence it does not at present enjoy. If we had such a statement to refer to, we could see, for instance, whether the War Office has or has not a fair excuse for neglecting Port Darwin. As it is, the famous unpublished plan has a very ugly resemblance to a mere stock excuse for doing as near as may be nothing.

BUNYAN GONE FANTEE.

JOHN BUNYAN has "gone Fantee." People who do not know what this means cannot have read the deplorable falling-off of the Rev. JOHN CREEDY, B.A., Oxon, as narrated by precious Mr. GRANT ALLEN. Mr. CREEDY was a second-class man, of Exeter, we think, a Fantee by birth, and a great student of Mr. HERBERT SPENCER. In consequence, perhaps, of these readings, he relapsed into heathendom when he went out to convert his benighted brethren, he discarded trousers, and danced through the kraal with a brandy bottle in one hand and a serpent in the other, shouting "Evohe" and similar pious ejaculations.

This was called "going Fantee," and a daring philologist has hence derived the obscure performance spoken of in Pickwick as a Fanteague. But the Fanteeing of JOHN BUNYAN is a much more respectable affair. The Pilgrim's Progress has been rendered into Fantee, "under the superintendence of the Rev. W. M. CANNELL and Mr. ANAMAN, "a native teacher." The Religious Tract Society are the publishers, and we sincerely congratulate the Fantees on this edifying and humorous addition to their literary resources. Concerning native Fantee literature we have no information; but it is not bad if it is half as good as the ballads and tales of Senegambia, lately translated into French. The idea of translating our European literature for savages in general is full of charm. We rather think a Cafroc would relish Candide, and the Ovahereroes could not but take pleasure in the Waverley Novels. The subtly metaphysical Maori may soon be poring over the Pensées of PASCAL, and the untutored Murri would welcome The Cricket-field in Kamilaroi. Here, indeed, is a field for missionary enterprise. Why stop short at The Pilgrim's Progress? The Fantee who has thoroughly mastered it will be ready to appreciate Vanity Fair. A Zulu edition of King Solomon's Mines would be cordially welcomed by the countrymen of UMSLOPOGAAS. The Zunis, who have lots of leisure, might get through Through One Administration, and the Solomon Islanders would never go about except with MARRYAT in their breech-cloths.

The truth is that we have hitherto given savages too narrow a view of our literature. The poor black man has abundance of excellent stories and songs of his own. For all exchange, we give him a Bible—and tracts. The Maoris were very fond of the Old Testament, and started a new religion of a military character, based on the exploits of JOSHUA. But secular literature is no less a need of savagery than of civilization. The rendering of The Pilgrim's Progress is a step in the right direction. Why not SHAKSPEARE next; or, if SHAKSPEARE be too difficult, why not Tom Jones? English life in FIELDING's time is quite as like society in Fantee as English life in BUNYAN's. It may be urged that Tom Jones is not essentially a religious work. But all religion and no literature maketh SAMBO a pot-house haunting loafer very often. He loses his native virtues, he acquires European vices, and he thinks that as long as he snuffles a few stale bits of the patois of Little Bethel he is a highly moral character. All black converts are not like this; but who will deny that very many are? This is the place where literature should step in. The missionary often discourages the old traditional mythical literature, of which Dr. CALLAWAY found so much in Zululand, and Sir GEORGE GREY in New Zealand. If that is taken away, the savage needs something else. A Fantee translation of GRIMM's Kinder und Haus Märchen would be the very thing for him to begin on, when he has finished the Pilgrim's Progress. Then he might rise to SCOTT, DUMAS, and even VIRGIL and HERODOTUS. The Religious Tract Society is in the right path, and we soon hope to welcome a Choctaw version of Treasure Island.

THE WHOLE DUTY OF TRADE-UNIONISTS.

LORD MACAULAY, after quoting a violent Scotch Highlander, put an aggravating little note to express the satisfaction it gave him to reflect that in these days such angry passions as filled the bosom of his author could lead to nothing worse than scolding. A similar comment may be made with some, though not absolute, confidence on the paragraph of his monthly Report, in which Mr. W. CRAWFORD, M.P., states the whole duty of a good Trade-Unionist towards his neighbour who is not in the Union. If Mr. CRAWFORD could have his way, the Durham mines would soon be regulated by a very thorough system of boycotting. He recommends the use of this Irish weapon, and that in very good Irish rhetoric too. There would seem to have been some difference of opinion among Mr. CRAWFORD's constituents and paymasters as to the proper line to be taken with non-Unionists. More would need to be known than has as yet appeared in London papers to make clear what it is that the dispute is about. In a general way, however, it is certain that some Unionists complain that some non-Unionists are not made to suffer sufficiently for their contumacy in refusing to come into the fold. Mr. CRAWFORD explains how this is to be amended; and, as it is his explanation, and not the difficulty, which is the interesting point, this last may be left among the things not worth knowing. The Secretary of the Durham Miners' Association and member of Parliament for Brancepeth, then, recommends boycotting in its most thorough and scientific form. He has observed that, though Union men refuse "to descend and ascend" with outsiders, yet they will not refuse to walk home with them, to pray with them, and to eat and drink with them; nor do they altogether decline to receive them as sons-in-law or other connexions by marriage. Now Mr. CRAWFORD thinks it time to cease "playing at shuttlecock in this important portion "of our social life." "Either," he goes on, "mingle with "these men in the shaft, as you do in every other place, or "let them be ostracized at all times and in every place. "Regard them as unfit companions for yourselves and "your sons, and unfit husbands for your daughters. Let "them be branded, as it were, with the curse of CAIN, "as unfit to mingle in ordinary honest and respectable "society." That is how you should treat these "goats of "mankind." If you do not, then you have no right to complain "as to any results that may arise from their "action."

Unquestionably, if this language is to be taken seriously, it is ugly enough. If Mr. CRAWFORD is to be treated as the laws of his country require, and supposed to intend the consequences of his acts, he must be supposed to recommend the use of the proper sanction to boycotting. How is the decree of "ostracism" which he talks of with characteristic preference for a fine word to be enforced? Is the Union man who walks home with his non-Union friend to be shot in the legs? When the daughter of an orthodox Trade-Unionist father takes for lover a heterodox non-Union sinner, is she to be carded or pitch-capped? Boycotting which is purely voluntary has been found to be inefficient even in its native land. In Durham it would be even less formidable. If the Trades-Unions really mean to act on Mr. CRAWFORD's recommendation, they must, of course, be prepared to do all the things which it implies. But it is not too optimistic to believe that Mr. CRAWFORD is not to be taken too seriously, or that the Trades Unions are neither able nor willing to follow in the footsteps of the Land and National Leagues. His advice may be taken to prove two things of much less gravity. Firstly, we conclude from the fact that it has had to be given at all that the Trades-Unions are by no means such admirable organizations for the regimenting of humble servants of wirepullers as the persons who would like to use them for political purposes could wish. Englishmen, even when they do belong to a Trades-Union, prefer to retain a certain amount of freedom, and do not take kindly to being dictated to in the choice of friends to walk with, and share a pot of beer withal. The Committees of the Unions have occasionally shown a very good will to employ Irish methods, but they have uniformly aroused a determined, and generally a successful, opposition. Then Mr. CRAWFORD's little bit of truculent fustian proves another thing which has an importance of a more limited kind. It shows that he personally is a humble, though worthy, member of the now great and influential sect of shriekers, whereof Mr. WILFRID BLUNT is an eminent and Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM a supereminent leader. His "goats "of mankind," and so forth, are not quite as good as Mr. GRAHAM's remarks in the famous blethering letter to the electors of Winchester; but, though inferior in degree, they are the same in kind. He, too, is one of the numerous persons of these times who seem to have taken Mrs. JOE GARGERY as a model. It would be a mistake to underrate the Salvation Army of politics. There are a great many of them, and they scream very loud, and that too in a time when there is a tendency to believe that capacity to yell is a proof of sincerity, and that all sincerity, even a sincere desire to do mischief, is respectable. As a member of that force, Mr. CRAWFORD has a certain importance.

SIR CHARLES DILKE ON THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

MUCH more interest will probably have been aroused by the reference to a personal matter with which Sir CHARLES DILKE prefaced his speech at Hammersmith the other night than by the political observations which followed it. Sir CHARLES, he informs us, has no present intention of returning to public life. He "has not yet in "any degree relinquished the hope of vindicating his honour "completely by law, and"—even should he be unable to obtain justice by such means—"he will still look forward "with confidence to the day when his fellow-countrymen "would discover the character of the odious fabrications by "which they had been misled." Nothing could more effectually hasten the arrival of this day than the complete vindication of his character by law; but we are not ourselves aware of any legal means by which he can reverse the judgment pronounced in his case after a very full investigation of it before a singularly able and thoroughly impartial judge; and we have, therefore, no clue whatever to the grounds of the "hope" which Sir CHARLES tells us he has not yet in any degree relinquished. Meanwhile we can only applaud the resolve not to consent to serve his countrymen in Parliament "until they have learnt to trust his word," especially as they are not, it appears, to be deprived, pending their conversion, of his services as an outside critic of Parliamentary measures.

His opinion, however, on the character and prospect of the forthcoming Local Government Bill would be of more value if he or any one else outside the Cabinet possessed at the moment any definite information on the matter. In default of this information, the "greatest authority on the "subject" of Local Government, as Mr. COBB, with perhaps a slight touch of exaggeration, described him, is reduced to much the same shifts of speculation and conjecture as those to which the mere ignoramus is compelled, in similar circumstances, to have recourse. To express a fear that the preparation of the Bill may have been delayed by "the "struggles of some members of the Cabinet to retain ves- "tiges of an anti-popular system which the House of "Commons would reject" is to hazard a statement which it is as impossible for any one else to contradict as it is for himself to prove. We can only reply to this as to all other anticipatory criticisms of a measure which has not yet got beyond the walls of the Council Chamber, by reminding Sir CHARLES DILKE that Mr. GOSCHEN, whose official acquaintance with the principles and details of the question is in no way inferior to his own, has a seat in the Cabinet, and that a Local Government Bill which meets with his approval is, at any rate, not likely to contain any provisions which will be seriously objected to by the Liberal section of the Unionist party. Sir CHARLES DILKE remarks, with a certain satisfaction, that Mr. RAIKES, a member of the present Government, has apparently "given his counte- "nance to the view that it was very probable that the "Bill of next Session will fail to pass." But it does not follow from this that Mr. RAIKES thinks that the Bill would not deserve to pass, which is the construction that Sir CHARLES DILKE probably desires to place upon his words. His meaning may very well have been that the measure ran a risk of being shelved, like several other important legislative schemes of last Session, by the combined efforts of Gladstonian and Parnellite obstruction. That, however, will greatly depend on the amount of time which may be occupied on the work of Procedure, and on the degree of thoroughness with which that work will be done—a question which we are glad to notice that Sir CHARLES DILKE discusses in a very creditable spirit. Procedure changes, he said, would not be generally opposed by the organized party of opposition; and, if opposed at all, would be opposed by a small number of men, and thrust through by means of the existing powers to close debate. We can only hope that the open opposition of the small number of men will not receive the covert support of a much larger number of men who are able, by affording them a mere passive assistance, to add considerably to the difficulties. But, though we hope this, we cannot pretend to anticipate it with any sort of confidence. Things move very fast in these days, unless, indeed, their movement is deliberately obstructed; and the temper and behaviour of the organized party of opposition have undergone a serious change for the worse even since Sir CHARLES DILKE last sat in the House of Commons.

THE TIMES' CENTENARY.

CENTENARIES, if in any sense observable, are of necessity infrequent, and it is only human to make much of them. The centenary of the Times on New Year's Day is certainly a most interesting event, and it was commemorated on Monday in a most interesting fashion. Curious and instructive is the reprint of the very spirited document in which the change of title was announced on January 1, 1788. Pleasant, also, are the extracts that testify to infant rectitude and high-toned principles, or illustrate the first faint essays in the paths of light and leading that have since produced mighty results. The account of the patent "logo-types," the whole story of the vicissitudes of the Logographic press, is singularly interesting, whether we regard the tenacious faith of the inventor or the perils in which the invention seems to have involved the journal. To the philosophic mind the survey of the century involved in the retrospect of a great career is even more fruitful. At the outset a pretty hesitancy is shown between the natural inclination to exult and the excellent desire to maintain a chastened reserve. It suggests a child looking through an inverted telescope, marvelling at the littleness of things it is conscious ought to appear large. To use an Irish metaphor, the telescope is, let us say, a century in length. At the extremity of the prodigious vista the serenity of earth and heaven is something oppressive. There was nothing, in truth, to mark the day the Times was born. There was no comet at blaze by night, no milder portent by day, nothing to assist the cunning augur, and never a hint of the new power that should one day perplex Ministries with fear of change. In 1688, as in 1588, as the Times, with inconceivable pathos, reminds us, things were less unkind. But 1788 seems to have been a barren year. PITT was wooing peace, or contemplating reform. Whigs followed their wicked ways, unmindful of the advent of their future mentor, and Tories were untroubled with visions of their new tutor. NAPOLEON was only a lieutenant of artillery, unknown and unregarded. ROBESPIERRE, in some obscure office, mended bad quills or worse oratorical exercises. The King of France was firmly seated on his throne, and statesmen were satisfied with the condition of France—"even France," the quietest country, by the way, for many previous centuries among the leading Powers of Europe. These things being so, the historian is compelled to find in the establishment of the Times the most memorable event of 1788. There is no help for those who regret the lack of competitors for this honourable distinction. After all, is it not ever thus, vulgar superstition notwithstanding, that greatness is ushered into the world? The state of Europe in 1788 affords only one instance among many of the good fortune that awaited on the Times. Had it been a year later, then our retrospect were less suggestive. Had it been but one year antedated, the memorable celebration would have occurred last year—the year of the Jubilee of HER MAJESTY—and what that conjunction would have produced in eloquent and world-moving retrospect is beyond the most fervid imagination to picture.

Leaving the tripod of exaltation, and considering the Times' centenary as the most notable event in the history of the press, sympathy with its review of the past is as easy as congratulations are natural and pleasurable. There is always something contagious in admiration of success, especially when success is of an imposing kind; but no Englishman who respects his birthright is other than an admirer of the Times. The sources of its success are not, on the whole, difficult to trace, though of course there are certain elements that elude the calculation of all. We do not learn much, from the interesting history of its early years, of the more secret causes of the remarkable advance of the journal in the years before the Reform Bill. To be high-toned is an excellent thing in newspapers; but a rigid adherence to an ideal, be it political or not, has before now proved fatal. This has certainly never been a defect in the conduct of the leading paper. Nor is the mystery of success in the least solved by vague talk about high aims and immaculate principles. Those endowments are generally accorded by common consent or a polite convention. The most noisy pretenders to virtuous principles are journals that claim a few years of raw apprenticeship and yet outrage every decency of life. The success of a newspaper depends, in a great measure, on the skilful practice of the art of inspiring public confidence. Sagacity, energy, and enterprise, qualities valued by all business men, have never been wanting, as all the world knows, in the proprietors of the Times. The history of Parliamentary reporting is but a part of its own history. In the art of obtaining news from all quarters with the utmost despatch and accuracy it has been, as we are reminded, the pioneer of the whole press. And this is the most important and obvious desideratum in a daily paper. Whether all other journals have followed in its mighty wake with the obsequious docility and the silent ingratitude that seem to have so tried its magnanimity is, perhaps, a matter it might be permissible to debate. A newspaper is a commercial enterprise, let its principles be what they may. The simple receipt for success appears to be easy enough, if not particularly satisfying to curious inquirers. With independence and foresight, and a dozen equally obvious gifts of intelligence, it must minister to public requirements and follow the times—not the Times—for this, as has already been affirmed in that journal, is a recognized practice, and vain repetitions are hateful.

"THIS DAY'S WEATHER."

THE professors of the infant science of political meteorology have just received a most interesting and valuable report from their "station" at Winchester. It is true that the meteorological facts and signs which it records are rather difficult to fit in with certain previously framed forecasts on which the professors were pretty generally agreed; but it is by triumphing over difficulties that a science grows. Still there it is. All the best meteorologists, with the founder of the science at their head, concurred in assuring us that the "temporary depression," over what may be called the Gladstonian quarter of the political weather-chart, would be certainly found in their last report to have disappeared, though the barometer might not prove to have actually risen throughout the whole region of Liberalism. And even those who disagreed with the forecast, as a whole, were almost universally inclined to believe that the best report they themselves could possibly hope for was one of "no change "since the last reading." But what both parties have actually learnt from the last advices is that, not only has the depression not disappeared over either region of the political weather chart, but that it has actually increased to an almost alarming extent over both. In other words, the result of the Winchester election is, on the principles of the "sophisters "and calculators," inexplicable, and to their theories absolutely disastrous. The one thing has happened which they thought so improbable that they had not prepared themselves with any argumentative subterfuges in advance. If Mr. Moss's majority had ever so little fallen short of that of Colonel TOTTENHAM at the election of 1886, they would have said that the constituency was gradually recovering from its "scare" over the Separation Bill, and reverting from its extreme anti-Gladstonism of that year to the moderate anti-Liberalism of the year before. Even if Mr. Moss had succeeded in maintaining Colonel TOTTENHAM'S majority, they would have been prepared to argue that for the cause of Unionism "not to advance was to re-"cede." What they hoped for, and at the last even expected, was that Mr. VANDERBYL of the "chequered history" would succeed in knocking off half the '86 majority of 336, and reducing it to the '85 majority of 171. What has actually happened is that the '86 majority has increased by more than sixty per cent., while the '85 majority has more than quadrupled. In other words, whereas Colonel TOTTENHAM won by only 171 votes in the earlier of those two years, and by only 336 in the later, Mr. Moss has now been returned by a majority of 515, and this upon a larger total poll than on either of the two former occasions.

We are, of course, well pleased with this proof, so far as it goes, that the cause of the Union has gained ground in Winchester, and that, so far as this constituency is concerned, Mr. GLADSTONE'S prospects of regaining ascendency there are more remote than ever. What, however, we are even much more disposed to welcome in this signal victory is its disconcerting effect upon the silly study to which we referred at the outset of these remarks. For it is, of course, obvious that the political meteorologist cannot minimize its significance without discrediting the very basis of his own puerile speculations. Either it means what it appears to mean—that the Union is really more than sixty per cent. stronger in Winchester (and, therefore, according to our foolish friends' theory, in England) than it was when a Unionist polled more than half as many votes again as his opponent, or it does not mean what it appears to mean; and, if so, why doesn't it? In the former case the result is disastrous to the political hopes of the Gladstonians; in the latter it is destructive of their credit as meteorologists. Of course we should like to embrace the former conclusion if we could; but, as we cannot, we may be well content with the issue of an election which establishes the latter. We cannot profess to think it probable that Unionist principles, already very strong in Winchester at the election of 1886, have since gained over sixty per cent. in numerical strength of support; and, even if we did think so, we should not be ready to jump from that point to the conclusion that this distribution of opinion in Winchester is a natural and infallible index to the distribution of opinion throughout England. We admit, with these figures so strongly in our favour before us, that such an inference would be quite unwarrantable, and we shall expect the same candour from the Gladstonians hereafter when the situation is reversed. They are in a sufficiently ridiculous situation as it is. Do not let them provoke more ridicule by first agreeing with us that the very extravagance of occasional successes in by-elections is destructive of the theory of their significance, and then attempting hereafter to make out that the most extravagant success may mean a good deal when it is on the right side.

ALL SOULS'.

THERE is no part of the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church which moves those who cannot accept its dogmas so deeply as the repeated references to the dead which it contains. One need not accept the doctrine of purgatory to be touched by prayers that awaken the tenderest of memories; and the invitation to associate what has been saddest and holiest in our own lives with all that has been purest and noblest in the history of the Church is one that both soothes and elevates the grief of mourners. Hence All Souls', the day which is specially set apart for such services, possesses a peculiar sanctity for all who have ever felt the poetry which underlies the doctrines no less than the rites of the Church, and from which both alike have sprung. In the toil and struggle of life we too easily forget the dead, or remember them with a sense of loss only, instead of gratitude; it seems well that once in the year an opportunity should be afforded for dwelling on memories of them in a different way, for recalling all that endeared them to us, which often means all that has lent our past life its emotional value.

In nothing does the strange contrast between Southern and Northern modes of feeling appear more strongly and more to the advantage of the latter than in the different ways in which this day is celebrated in countries which are equally Roman Catholic in their profession of faith. In all the religious services are the same; masses for the dead are read, the "Dies Iræ" is sung, and the prayer, "Eternal rest grant to them, O Lord, and let perpetual light shine upon them," rises from thousands of hearts as well as lips. But outside the church nothing can be more unlike than the bearing of the worshippers.

In Naples the day is regarded as a holiday, and the visit of the families to the churchyard for the purpose of decorating the graves degenerates into a pleasure party. Metal garlands are chiefly used for the purpose; and, though they are more durable, they hardly possess the charm of real leaves and flowers. They may, however, be regarded as symbolic of the behaviour, if not always of the feelings, of those who offer them. On the way to the cemetery a decent sobriety is observed, and the various families usually remain separate; but on the return general sociability and mirth are the rule. The roadside is lined with inns, which are better filled on this than any other day in the year; and from all of them the sound of singing and dancing may be heard. Indeed, it is by no means uncommon for a young Neapolitan to say to a friend, "We are going to visit our mother's grave to-morrow, and on our way back we shall stop at such or such an inn"; which means, If you like to come there, you can dance with my sister. To an Englishman no celebration of the day seems a better thing. If we forget our dead, we do not make their memory the excuse for a jollification.

It is not, however, in this point alone that a difference of sentiment exists. The whole way in which the Neapolitans treat the bodies of the dead fills us with disgust. To exhume a corpse a year or two after it has been buried, to have the skeleton taken to pieces and the bones carefully cleaned, would seem to us a wanton outrage; the wealthy Neapolitan who neglects to have this done for his kindred is regarded as heartless. To carry about the prepared bones of a pet child, and to place them in a sealed casket on the drawing-room mantelpiece, seems to us simply shocking; in Southern Italy it has been regarded as a most pathetic expression of sorrow. But the height of what appears to us grotesque horror has been reached by a widower, who has the embalmed corpse of his wife dressed anew once a year in fresh and gorgeous apparel, and seizes the opportunity to present it with a new ring or bracelet.

We need linger no longer on a repulsive subject, but simply remark in passing that the system of double burial, to which reference has been made, accounts, to a certain extent, for the peculiar character of the Campo Santo. It is situated on the side of a hill and resembles a city more than a graveyard. The paths, or rather streets, pass between stately buildings, which in some cases might almost be mistaken for chapels, and in others for palaces. In these the bones of generations of noble families lie entombed as their bodies could not do. The whole place speaks of solemn pomp rather than affectionate remembrance. It is the grandeur, not the sadness, of death which is embodied in these edifices, and yet, in spite of the incongruity of many details, it makes a strong impression upon the mind. The awe excited by the mystery we are daily approaching is here the predominating sentiment; not either heartbreak, dread, or gloom.

A day set apart to remember death rather than the dead in this spirit might not be unimproving, though it could hardly find a place in any Christian calendar; but the Campo Santo is never less impressive than on the day when it is thronged by the relations of those who are buried within it. In the villages, too, where the day is observed with a certain seriousness, grotesque incidents are apt to mar, for the stranger at least, the sense of mournful calm which the religious services excite. In one of the churches of Ravello, for example, a disgusting effigy is placed before the high altar, instead of the shrouded structure in which, during the funeral service, the coffin is placed. The very skill with which it is made renders it the more repulsive. The fallen cheeks and livid hue are rendered with what seems, in the half light, a frightful realism; and it is clad in the court dress of some former century, in a suit embroidered with gold, red stockings, and pointed shoes. Or is it perhaps a real mummy? The writer did not pause to inquire. In fact, the South Italian seems to be utterly destitute of the feeling which prompts us to conceal as far as possible, even from our imaginations, all that is revolting in death.

All Souls' in a Catholic Alpine village is very different from anything hitherto described, and often more touching in its simplicity than the elaborate ceremonies of cathedral towns. As soon as the mass has been heard on All Saints, the women of the family busy themselves with weaving wreaths of evergreens, into which any flowers that are still hardy enough to blossom are eagerly worked. In the afternoon these are carried to the churchyard, and laid upon the graves with almost silent reverence; and in the evening a lamp is placed at the foot of the last resting-place of every departed friend. At such a time the cemetery is a strange sight, with the garlands, the lights, and the groups of mourners kneeling, often in the snow; and when one passes an untended grave it seems sadly desolate. Are those who lie within entirely forgotten? one wonders; or are hearts in the wilds and cities of distant lands at this very moment yearning towards the spot that seems so deserted? We cannot tell; nor does it matter. In a few years the graves of even the best and wisest must be forgotten, or excite only the idle curiosity of the tourist, since personal affection cannot outlive a single generation. But while we continue to consider natural piety a good thing, and think it well that our present and future should be linked to our past by other than purely material bonds, we cannot regard the celebration of All Souls' as wholly evil and superstitious.

THE SEAMY SIDE OF CHEAPNESS.

IN the empty, vast, and wandering mass of correspondence about Fair-trade and Free-trade and dreadful trade of all kinds, there is one point which has been left almost alone by those persons who rush in where no angels (except Lord Grimthorpe and Mr. Goldwin Smith and a very few other very peculiar angels) care much to tread — the ground of the said correspondence with newspapers. It is needless to say that the considerations which we are going to put have nothing to do with the economic and political aspect of the question; except, indeed, that they rest on a very solid economic basis, the proposition that it will always, if other things do not interfere, pay better to sell a large quantity of commodities without much trouble of preparing and keeping, and at a low price, rather than to sell a small quantity of commodities expensively prepared and, it may be, long kept, at a high price. All men—all commercial men—know this, and have acted on it for many years. But the effect of it has never, that we know, been taken note of by "eminent hands." We are "eminent hands," and we are going to take note of it—for the benefit of the public.

There are some branches of the subject on which we have already spoken, such as cheese; following therein the lead (which we are always glad to acknowledge) of Archdeacon Denison, a person whose opinions are nearly always sound, though sometimes fantastic, whether the subject be cheese or Latin pronunciation, rhubarb tart or Mr. Gladstone. Nor do we for the present care to go into the crucial question of wine—that also we have touched on and may touch on again. The great subject of the present paper is sugar—of sugar the Muse shall speak and Mr. Speaker shall bear. We know a man who, in avowed emulation of the compagnon miraculeux Jules Vabre, has had in hand for many years a treatise "On The Unsugarliness of Sugar." But we do not intend to take that scholastic form. The immediate starting-point of the present discussion is a remark made by some one in the late or present discussion on bounties, that since the talk of their abolition he has had to pay a halfpenny a pound more for sugar. Put in other words, the remark is only another form of the frequently made remark that sugar was never so cheap as it has been in the last few years. Granted. We are going to supplement that proposition with an interrogation—Was it ever so bad?

It will be understood at once that we are not talking of adulteration. There was a time when "Have you sanded the sugar?" was a good joke; if it were risked at present its reception would be like the reception of those jokes about the defunct Lord Ringwood, Mr. Thackeray's account of which is one of the truest and most terrible things he ever did. Why should any one sand sugar? There is no bounty on sand, and you would have the trouble of collecting it and the expense of carrying it up to London. Nothing, not even arsenic, is so cheap as sugar now. It is popularly reported that jerry-builders would realize the dream of childhood and use sugar instead of bricks, but that the one characteristic which in its modern form it retains is a faculty of being ill suited to a rainy climate. Except the youngest of us, all can recollect what sugar was. In the first place, though that is a detail, it was sugar; made of the sugar-cane. It was either brown or white. If it was brown, it was somewhat too sweet for anybody who had a not very "sweet tooth," and the bottom of the cask (called "foot-sugar") was a sort of confection of sugar and molasses, uncommonly bad for toothache, gout, and other things, and naturally not very welcome to persons like ourselves (this makes the point and weight of this paper) who do not care for sweets of this kind or of any kind, but of its kind perfect. If it was white, it sparkled when it was broken or cut, and sweetened in any circumstances. At the same time the inferior nations—France and others—had a white beet sugar (necessity, as history told us, having been the mother of invention during the great Continental blockade) derived from indigenous roots. It was not very sweet; it had no sparkle; and it was as inferior to English sugar as all foreign things ought to be inferior to all English; but it was not unpleasant to eat, it made capital eau sucrée, and it merited the bland indulgence which a well-bred Englishman always extends to things which (by no fault of theirs) cannot be English.

Turn that page, and come to the present, indifferently represented in all countries of Europe, where sugar bounties and the infernal scientific man have reduced all sugar to a dull uniformity. The proceeds are as unlike the pure beet of old days without the scientific man as they are like the pure cane. To begin with, there is no brown sugar. You sometimes meet somebody who says he knows a shop in the City where you can get it; but he never tells you where. It is all whity-brown or dirty drab. There is no molasses in it, no sweetness; it grits in the teeth, being definitely crystalline, instead of, as in the old case, powdery. There is no white sugar either. It is not crystalline, but conglomerate; it is not sweet, and, if you put it into hot water, a strange phenomenon appears. For the purposes of what a degenerate Scotchman ("May God assoil him, therefore!" is the prayer even of the cold-blooded pock-pudding Englisher) calls "the barbaric observance of whisky toddy," it is, or ought to be, known to all men that you dissolve the sugar in the hot water before adding the whisky. The experiment is crucial with modern sugar. In at least the vast majority of cases a dirty, cloudy solution is the result, bringing sometimes most unjust accusations on hapless servitors. As used in tea, coffee, and other opaque and deeply-coloured mixtures, this abominable characteristic of modern sugar, of course, escapes observation. But let anybody try his sugar in the colourless solution, and if he does not see a soapy cloud diffuse itself he is a lucky man. The scientific person whose aid has been called in to screw the last gramme of sugar, or so-called sugar, over the legal amount out of the harmless beet, so as to secure profit, best knows what obscene means he takes to secure this obscene result. We only know the fact, and the further fact that of sugar-taste in modern sugar there is about as much, let us say, of as whisky-taste in raw grain whisky or cheese-taste in American cheese.

Now let us talk of figs. Here, again, we are quite free from a personal prejudice. The figs of auld lang syne might be venal at the nearest stall without our troubling the stall-keeper; we do not know that a sovereign, or a Jubilee five-pound piece, per fig would induce us to consume the thing at its very best. But the difference here, though less noted (for the consumers of that which is, or is not, sold "in the name of the Prophet" are rarely critical), is as great as in the other case. Years ago figs were of two kinds; now they are practically of one. There was the large, carefully dried, square or flattened sort, the skin of which was tender and candied, and the flesh (except that it was more solid) not very different from that of a well-ripened hot-house fig unpreserved. There were also the small thick-skinned fruits, which children did not exactly mind eating. The last class has been a little improved, and is obtainable at any price that any one likes to give. The first class has disappeared altogether. Personally, as we have said, we do not care; only very wonderful people, with exceptional constitutions, care for any of these things when they have come to forty year. But it is disagreeable to think that quality in anything should cease to be a subject of consideration. If there must be Mr. Gladstones, we should, for our part, prefer a

Mr. Gladstone Gladstonically perfect at Doppingers and other weapons, to a maimed and stunted Mr. Gladstone with scruples of conscience, and a floating idea that he might possibly be sometimes in the wrong.

Passons. The decadence of the sardine who shall fitly sing? It may possibly still be good enough for schoolboys—a blessed dispensation of Providence has made this age, in at least most instances, without taste, as without pity. But how is it changed, not from the sardine which we remember as schoolboys—that would be introducing an entirely illegitimate and uncritical standard of comparison—but from the sardine of a very few years ago, when certainly we had put off schoolboyish things. Some say that the capricious fish has forsaken the shores of Britanny, and has had to be replaced; others, that a new and unsatisfactory style of bait has been introduced; others (and we hold with them) that lower prices have made the manufacturers less careful in preparation, and that worse oil, probably machine-made, greater haste in tinning, and so forth, account for the falling off.

But in truth the particularization of such things does little good. Wherever there is an enlarged supply of anything, the production of which is not purely mechanical, quality is certain to be sacrificed to quantity. It is certain that the enormous majority of consumers do not know good things from bad, and perhaps it is unkind to wish that they did. Their state in an age of products for the million is the more gracious. But still it is rather hard on those who can distinguish—not that they should have to pay more for the good (we take it that none of them has the slightest objection to that), but that the good should become gradually unobtainable. "It is never asked for," "It does not pay us to produce," "None of our customers make any complaint," are the invariable answers when a person tormented by the thirst of perfection points out to the modern tradesman or man of business that any particular ware is, let us say, a good way off perfection, and that he would like something better. And so the dreary pessimist in the dead unhappy night, and when the rain is on the roof, looks at the fire (they haven't yet altered coals, but that is doubtless coming), and thinks of a time when all books will be sewn with wire, when all wine will be made by strictly mechanical and chemical process, when it will be impossible to get cheese more than six weeks old, when the appearance as of dirty water will be taken as a natural consequence of the solution of sugar, and when everything without exception will be cheap, plentiful, and nasty. In one very celebrated country they seem to have reached something like that happy condition already (except the cheapness, which is perhaps not a necessary concomitant). And they say that it is the Englishman's "incurable tendency to think crookedly" which makes him dislike the idea of a similar consummation on this side the water. Well! well! at any rate those of us who are not quite chickens have had their day. We have seen when, if Mr. Dillon or Mr. T. P. O'Connor had ventured into Oxford, he would hardly have left it, we do not say untarred and unfeathered, but without equally distinct and less barbarous marks of disapproval. We have seen when the phylloxera was not. We have eaten sugar that was made of the authentic cane. Let us be grateful for mercies received.

THE POPE'S JUBILEE AND THE TEMPORAL POWER.

THE various solemnities connected with the Jubilee of Leo XIII. will no doubt continue for many weeks, but the central act of the celebration—corresponding to the Queen's appearance in Westminster Abbey on June 21, 1887—took place on Sunday last, being New Year's Day. On that occasion his Holiness, surrounded by all the splendours of the Papal Court, celebrated the first Pontifical Mass witnessed in St. Peter's since the beginning of "the Captivity," using on the occasion the magnificent golden ewer and basin presented by Her Majesty for the Lavabo. It appears indeed from the description in the newspapers to have been a Low Mass only. But that was probably in order to save fatigue to the venerable personage who had to take the principal part in the ceremony; and if his Holiness is correctly reported to have twice fainted, while robing for Mass, the precaution was evidently not uncalled for. But in all other respects the ceremony lacked nothing of the traditional grandeur of Pontifical functions at St. Peter's. It was solemnized in presence of 48 Cardinals—three-fourths of the existing Sacred College—238 Archbishops and Bishops, and a congregation of over 30,000 persons, who broke into loud applause as his Holiness was borne into church on the sedia gestatoria, with the ostrich feathers, and the thrilling accompaniment of the silver trumpets in the dome to the Tu es Petrus, the matchless Sistine choir being reinforced by 600 boys' voices in the galleries of the dome, and the vast assemblage joining in the alternate verses of the final Te Deum. He received the homage of his Court according to the prescribed usage, and gave the solemn benediction urbi et orbi, though from the interior instead of the external balcony, wearing the triple tiara presented for his Jubilee by the Emperor of Germany. The spectacle is reported by those who witnessed it to have "baffled all description." And it was impressive not only for the scenic effect, which always made the triennial celebration of the Papal Mass at St. Peter's under the old régime an imposing sight even to those who felt little appreciation of its strictly religious significance, but because it symbolized and represented something beyond itself. Pius IX. also kept the jubilee both of his priesthood and his episcopate, but no great interest was excited by either, except from what may be termed the Cook's Tourist point of view, among any but zealous Roman Catholics. The Jubilee of Leo XIII. has evoked a genuine, and for many reasons a gratifying, expression of sympathy not only from his own religious disciples but from the outside world generally. He has received messages and tokens of regard from Protestant as well as Catholic Sovereigns, including our own Queen, and even from Eastern potentates who do not profess any form of Christianity at all. And Queen Victoria struck the true keynote of that universal sentiment of sympathy and regard when she instructed her envoy to assure his Holiness that she not only desired to acknowledge his courtesy and good will towards herself as shown by the mission of Mgr. Ruffo Scilla on occasion of her own Jubilee, "but also to give expression to her feeling of deep respect for the elevated character and Christian wisdom which you have displayed in your high position. The temperate sagacity," the envoy was directed to add, "with which your Holiness has corrected errors and assuaged differences from which much evil might otherwise have arisen inspires Her Majesty with the earnest hope that life and health may long be granted to you, and that your beneficent action may be long continued." No words could indicate with greater felicity what has been the growing and general conviction among "men of good will," as well within as without the Roman pale, who have watched with interest the policy steadily pursued, under very serious difficulties—not the least of them arising ab intra—by Leo XIII. during the nearly completed ten years of his pontificate. It is the prevalence throughout Christian society of the feeling for which Her Majesty has found such apt and timely expression that gave to this his first celebration of Mass in St. Peter's much more than a merely formal or ceremonial significance.

So far there is real ground for satisfaction in which Catholics and Protestants may alike heartily unite. But unfortunately, as so often happens, there is here too "a little rift within the lute," and it even seems not improbable, though all sensible people will trust that the risk may yet be averted, that this general festival of reconciliation may give birth to an angry recrudescence of the standing quarrel between the Papal and Italian Courts. Of religious bitterness there has been, so far as we are aware, no sign anywhere. For the first time since the ill-starred mission of James II. the English Sovereign has accredited an envoy to the Pope, and no murmur of disapproval has issued from England, which less than forty years ago was convulsed by a frantic and unreasoning paroxysm of anti-papal hatred and alarm. But in Italy which, in spite of all asseverations of friends or foes to the contrary, is still at heart a Catholic nation, there are ominous signs of a revival of political strife against the Papacy. And this time, we are bound to say, so far as an outsider may presume to judge, the fault does not lie mainly on the papal side. On Christmas Eve the Duke of Torlonia, as Mayor of Rome, paid a formal visit to the Cardinal Vicar, and requested him, on the part of the Municipality, to convey to his Holiness the congratulations of the city on his Jubilee. For this act of courtesy he has been summarily dismissed from his office by the Government, and it is said that the Municipality is to be dissolved and the city of Rome governed henceforth by a Royal Commission. To English apprehension this procedure does certainly look passing strange in every way. Even supposing the Mayor's act to be an unwise one, his dismissal would according to our notions be an arbitrary and illegal method of correction. It is much as though the Lord Mayor of Dublin had been—not imprisoned by a judicial sentence for a legal offence, which is quite another matter, but—dismissed by Government and the Corporation dissolved, because he had entertained Mr. Parnell at a public dinner. But moreover, considering that the celebration of the Pope's sacerdotal Jubilee has no relation direct or indirect, except such as may be deliberately read into it on either side, with the pending dispute between the Vatican and the Quirinal, it certainly appears at first sight perfectly natural that the Roman Municipality, which is an elective body returned in great measure by Catholic votes, should seize the opportunity of offering its religious homage to the Holy Father, who neither could nor would have attached any ulterior meaning to a graceful exhibition of dutiful and courteous respect. We are not surprised to learn that "many even of the Liberal organs consider the act of the Government as erring on the side of harshness." Be that as it may, there can be no doubt at all that in censuring and punishing the Mayor for what he has done the Italian Government are directly playing into the hands—we do not say of the Pope, for we can readily believe that no one views the incident with more genuine regret on all accounts than his Holiness—but of the irreconcilables who stand behind the papal throne, and by whose persistent and meddlesome opposition the "beneficent action" of Leo XIII. has been constantly thwarted and curtailed. One of their organs is already reported to have avowed the characteristic wish that some such imprudence might be perpetrated every week. It supplies them with a specious text, which they are quite sure to make the most of, for expounding the impracticability of any modus vivendi, and enables them to argue with much plausibility that the King's Government has itself gone out of its way to demonstrate the hollowness of the Law of Guarantees, and to show how impossible it is for Pope and King to dwell side by side in peace in the same city. And what makes the action of the Government the more inexplicable is that the King of Italy had only about a month before publicly referred in a tone of respectful sympathy to the approaching Jubilee. The Duke of Torlonia might not unreasonably have thought he was acting in the spirit if not with the express sanction of his Sovereign.

That Leo XIII. himself will suffer his mind, or—so far as his hand is not forced—his policy to be permanently affected by this untoward occurrence we do not believe. A good deal of nonsense has been talked about his reply last Tuesday to a deputation of Italian pilgrims, including some hundred bishops, when however he simply repeated what he has often said before, and what any Pope as matter of course would say, that the real interests of Italy and the Papacy are identical, and that the latter, as representing the Church, which is "a divine and universal institution," must be independent of all secular authority. So much no Roman Catholic would dream of disputing. Even in the extremest version of the words imputed to him by the plusquam-ultramontane Univers—which must of course be accepted with great reserve—he is only made to speak of the Papacy being "restored to the true condition of sovereignty and independence which are in every way due to it." That again need mean no more than what every Catholic would admit, and is a very long way indeed short of formulating a claim for the restoration of the Temporal Power in any shape, to say nothing of a restoration of the status quo. That however is precisely what is demanded in no uncertain tones by many of the most ardent papalini, who will make what capital they can out of this infelicitous confirmation of their favourite plea. To take but one example. Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Salford, is one, not certainly of the ablest but, from family connexions and from his having been under the last pontificate a persona grata at the Vatican, of the most prominent of the English Roman Catholic bishops. He contributes a paper on this subject to the current number of the Nineteenth Century which is a curious mixture of feebleness and force, the force being expended on establishing the truism that the Papacy ought to be independent in its spiritual capacity of the civil power, while nothing can be feebler or more unhistorical than his attempt to show that this independence can only be secured by the possession of a civil princedom. His palmary argument is an appeal to the familiar story of Pius VII. and Napoleon, whose scheme he boldly asserts "has been accomplished under a King of Italy. The Law of Guarantees of 1871 has thrown into legal form the plan sketched out in 1810." The merest tyro in history must know that no two things could well be more unlike. Napoleon's "plan," as he frankly explained it afterwards to O'Meara at St. Helena, was "to take away the Pope's temporal power, make him my almoner, and make Paris the capital of the Christian world." He said at the time, and said repeatedly, that "the Pope can never have so much power as my policy leads me to desire for him." And his idea was exemplified in the high-handed and unprecedented stretch of arbitrary despotism which he forced on Pius VII. in causing him by a stroke of the pen to abolish and reconstitute the whole French hierarchy. Napoleon's ideal in short was to revive in his own person the old Roman Empire with the Pope for his head chaplain, whose autocratic and infallible authority, guided by imperial inspiration, was to become his catspaw for commanding the moral as well as the civil allegiance of a subject world. God, in the person of His vicar, was to be always and visibly enlisted on the side of the heavy battalions. Such a position no Pope who respected himself or his office could for a moment think of accepting. But it will be time to urge the analogy in connexion with the present Italian complications when King Humbert betrays any design of aspiring to a cosmopolitan dominion, with the Pope for his spiritual mouthpiece. For the present it is sufficient to remark, if so vast an influence for good, far beyond that of any of his predecessors for many years past, has already been exerted by Leo XIII., in great measure through the skilful use of his diplomatic intercourse with different European States, that only serves, valeat quantum, to prove that the highest aims of the Papacy can be at least as effectually realized without as with the aid of the Temporal Power.

WIRE.

MEN who have hunted much and ridden hard are acquainted with many premonitors of a fall. There is the heavy, unyielding rap on stiff timber; there is the loud crash and splintering of rotten timber; there is the sudden disturbance of the equilibrium, when a horse strikes a high fence as he is in the air; there is the quiver in the quarters when he has not quite cleared the ditch on the further side; there is the sliding, sideways motion, when his legs slip, and the scrambling stumble when he "pecks" on landing. Every one of these sensations may be the precursor of a spill. But there is yet another prelude to a fall, which is far more dangerous than any of these. It is noiseless; at first it seems but a slight hindrance—nay, it appears to yield. And then——But we will not enter into the horrors that follow a fall from wire. It will be sufficient to say that if the victim gets off with broken bones he is very lucky; if he gets locomotor ataxy, it might be worse; and if he is killed, no one can be astonished.

There are four ways in which wire may be used in fences. The first consists in running it through a weak hedge. This is by far the most dangerous method of all, for when riding fast at a fence a man cannot see it. If his horse clears the fence, well and good, but if he should brush through it, the chances are that he will get one of the worst of falls. A clever, cunning old hunter is very likely to get caught in a trap of this kind. A second way of using wire is to fill up gaps with it. A sharp-eyed man can generally see it then, but to short-sighted people this is very dangerous, nor are those endowed with the best of visions much safer, when on a pulling or rushing horse, who makes for a wire-stopped gap. A third arrangement is to place a row of posts, with a wire on their tops, alongside of a growing fence, in order to keep cattle from eating it or breaking it down. Sometimes this wire can scarcely be seen from the opposite side, or only when it would be too late to pull up an impetuous horse. It is needless to point out that this is excessively dangerous. The fourth plan is wire-fencing, pure and simple. There is no particular danger in this, as any one can see it. The only objection to it is that it spoils sport. You may get the best of starts, and yet lose a run by one long wire fence crossing the line of the hounds.

We can see no possible excuse for the first-mentioned system. The insidious and possibly fatal wire concealed in a fence is, in reality, more dangerous than the old mantraps and shot-loaded spring-guns, now forbidden by law. Whatever may be the illegalities of riding over other people's land after hounds, it seems hard that the lives of poachers, orchard-robbers, and burglars should be protected, while those of foxhunters are not. Whether the second and third methods of using wire in fences ought to be made illegal may be somewhat more open to question. As to the fourth, it would simply put a stop to hunting altogether if it were to come into general use, which seems a far from impossible contingency. Here, however, there can be no excuse for suggesting legislative interference. On the contrary, we are constrained to admit that in these days of agricultural depression it is difficult to blame farmers for wishing to use a kind of fencing which some of them, rightly or wrongly, consider ninety per cent. cheaper than wood. Nor is this all. Hunting-men, and even masters of hounds, very often, if not generally, use wire fences (or iron hurdles which are just as bad) in their parks and home enclosures; to run near a country-house or large park throws out hard-riding men more than anything, except a railway or a river, for this very reason; yet the owners of these wire-girt demesnes are generally the very first people to abuse the unlucky farmer who ventures to divide any of his inclosures with a wire fence, or to substitute one for an untidy straggling hedge and ditch which demanded everlasting labour and wasted many yards of valuable land.

We now come to another kind of wire, which may be used for either of the four purposes already enumerated—we mean barbed wire. It is difficult to write, or even to think, of this sort of wire with patience. As to its inventor or the place of its invention we never have had much doubt. We do not for one moment dispute its effectiveness. No cattle or horses will willingly approach it twice. It is exceedingly cheap, handy, and portable. It serves equally well when slackly hung by a common farm-labourer as when tightly fastened by a blacksmith. Like many other things which are attributed to the same origin, it is admirably adapted to its object. Nor are we at all certain that a horseman would be more likely to break his neck if his horse were to catch his leg in a barbed wire than in an ordinary wire of equal strength. On the other hand, the injuries which it inflicts upon horses as well as hounds are simply ghastly. There is no other word for it. Whether this cruel contrivance deserves the attention of the Legislature is a question on which we do not wish to express an opinion at present; but there can be no doubt that things far less dangerous are forbidden by law. Its accompanying perils are by no means exclusively confined to sportsmen. A trouser-clad vulpicide himself might under conceivable circumstances find it injurious, poor children may be terribly hurt by it, and even the economical farmer who uses it is not unlikely to find one of his colts or cattle minus an eye. That, however, is his concern.

Never, within the memory of foxhunters, has wire been so prevalent as in the present season. In the very best of the grass countries it has sprung up in all directions. Early in the season Lord Cholmondeley's request to his tenants to take up every piece of wire-fencing upon lands in their occupation, and "to do this at once," attracted considerable attention among agriculturists, and was the cause of some breaches of the Ninth Commandment among Radical journalists. As he offered to supply the place of the wire with posts and rails at his own expense, his tenants had not much cause for grumbling. In the opinion of some hunting-men, the provision by landlords of timber as a substitute for wire is the best means of checking the practice of wire-fencing. At a hunt meeting held lately at Atherstone, it was unanimously resolved that landowners should be requested to offer wood for this purpose to their tenants. Direct appeal to the farmers by members of a Hunt has already answered very well in some cases this season. Funds have been raised in certain countries for defraying all expenses of taking away the "summer wire," and replacing it in the spring; districts have been mapped out, and volunteer agents have been appointed to apply to the farmers for leave, and to see the work carried out. This is, unquestionably, a step in the right direction. Nevertheless, with regard to foxhunting and wire, the future looks decidedly gloomy.

THE MONEY MARKET.

THE rates of interest and discount continue to fall, and the expectation is general that money will be both cheap and abundant for a considerable time to come, so much so that a reduction of the Bank rate of discount on Thursday was commonly looked for. The Directors, however, properly decided to make no change. Money market expectations are peculiarly liable to disappointment at the present time, when the stock of gold held by the Bank of England is dangerously low. The Bank holds less than 20 millions of the metal, which is considerably under the amount held by the Imperial Bank of Germany and the Imperial Bank of Russia; is less than half what is held by the Bank of France, and is not much more than a third of what is held by the United States Treasury. Our readers will recollect that the Bank of England holds the ultimate banking reserve of the whole United Kingdom, and that the reserve depends upon the stock of gold in the vaults of the Bank. When the gold diminishes, the reserve itself must diminish. While the Imperial Bank of Germany is increasing its stock of gold at every favourable opportunity, the Bank of England has either been doing nothing to replenish its stock or has been allowing it to grow smaller. At first sight it appears scarcely intelligible that the Directors of the Bank of England should so act. The explanation, however, is not far to seek. The Bank of England is not a State bank, as the Bank of France and the Imperial Bank of Germany are. It is not even a Government bank, except in the sense that it acts as the banker of the Government. It is a private trading Company, and its Directors regard as their first duty the promotion of the interests of their shareholders. To keep a large stock of gold always is a costly enterprise, and the cost of course falls upon the shareholders. There is a strong inducement, therefore, to allow the stock of gold to run low; and in ordinary times the Directors—or at least some of them—not only yield to the inducement, but contend that they have no obligations towards the public, that they are simply the trustees of the shareholders, and bound to consider their interests alone. When very critical times arise, however, they never venture to act upon this contention. They always recognize then, not only that they have a duty towards the public, but that in self-preservation they must fulfil the duty. Of recent years, however, the Directors seem certainly to have allowed their stock of gold to run too low. The matter is the more serious because the times are peculiarly dangerous. If a great European war should break out such as the Bourses of the Continent are and have been apprehensive of for the past twelve months, it is certain that every money market in Europe would be more or less affected. It is quite possible that there might be a financial crisis in the principal cities, and that a serious drain of gold from the Bank of England might set in. The Bank could not part with much of the small stock of the metal it now holds. It would be obliged, therefore, to adopt decisive measures to protect itself, and in so doing it would disturb the whole trade of the country. Even a much slighter matter than the outbreak of a great European war would compel the Bank to adopt measures which would put out the calculations of the whole commercial community. Should fears of a financial crisis in the United States revive, a drain of gold from this country to New York might begin and assume very large proportions, and such a drain the Directors of the Bank would be compelled to prevent, at whatever cost. Even the revival of trade itself, by increasing the coin circulation of the country, will withdraw gold from the Bank, and may compel the Directors to take measures which will have a depressing effect upon trade, unless in the meantime they can materially replenish their stock of gold.

Just at present the Directors are not in a position to act effectually upon the money market. They might have done so advantageously some months ago; but in January they lose all command of the market, the payment of the interest upon the National Debt transferring so large a sum of money from the Bank to the outside market that the latter becomes for a while quite independent of the Bank, and thus the latter can only follow where at other times it leads. But in February it will begin to recover control of the market. In the last quarter of the financial year by far the largest proportion of the revenue is collected. The result is that unusually large sums are taken out of the market, and placed to the credit of the Government in the Bank of England. The outside market thus is poorly supplied with loanable capital, and is compelled to follow more obediently than at other periods of the year the lead of the Bank of England. In view of this the Directors have acted wisely in not lowering their rate, and their object should now be to obtain as complete a control of the outside market as is possible in the early part of February. In the latter half of March the expenditure of the Government becomes so great that the sums paid out of the Bank of England nearly equal, and sometimes exceed, the sums paid into the credit of the Government. Consequently, the Bank begins to lose control of the outside market early in March. There are only about six weeks, therefore, in which the Bank can act effectually upon the outside market; and the Directors should not only bear this in mind, but should so shape their policy that they may be able to raise the value of money in the outside market to the official Bank level, and thus attract gold to this country. Usually the value of money upon the Continent and in the United States is lower in the early part of the year than towards the end; while the fact that so large a proportion of our own revenue is collected in the January-March quarter tends artificially to raise the value of money in London. The result is to make the rates of interest and discount somewhat higher usually in London than abroad, and, therefore, to make it possible for the Bank of England to attract gold to itself. In order to do this, however, it is necessary that the Directors should frame a policy, and should consistently carry it out. It is, of course, possible that this year a fear of war may artificially raise the value of money upon the Continent. As yet it is quite true that the fear of war has not had much influence upon the money market anywhere, and as it is probable that some of the great Continental Governments will require to borrow, the likelihood seems to be that everything will be done to keep the money market quiet. Assuming that no war scare arises and that the borrowing Governments adopt the precautions to which we are accustomed when borrowing is going on, the money markets of the Continent may be expected to be easy for the next two or three months, and thus the opportunity of the Bank of England will be created. In the United States, again, there seems no danger of a sudden rise in the value of money. Were the fears of a financial crisis to revive the whole complexion of the American money market would rapidly change; but at present such a revival does not seem probable. It is generally expected that Congress will adopt some measure to not only lessen the accumulation of unemployed money in the Treasury, but to prevent the accumulation in the future. If it does so, the measure will undoubtedly reassure the American public, and therefore restore ease to the American money market. There would in that case be no danger of a serious drain of gold from London to New York, disturbing all calculations, and the Bank of England in consequence would be free to frame a policy with the intention of attracting gold and to carry out that policy consistently.

The immediate cause of the unexpected cheapness and abundance of money is the paralysis of speculation due to the apprehensions of war. Trade unquestionably is improving, and the tendency of a trade improvement is to withdraw gold from the Bank of England, for an improvement in trade implies the more general employment of the working classes; consequently larger wages bills on the part of employers generally, and therefore more coin to pay those bills. Goods in larger quantities are also moved over the country, and the payment for goods, for wages, and for moving goods tends to expand the coin circulation. A withdrawal of gold from London naturally tends to decrease the reserve of the Bank of England, and therefore to raise the rates of interest and discount in the short loan market. But the improvement in trade has not proceeded far enough to act in this manner upon the short loan market in London as yet. In the year upon which we have now entered it may be expected to do so, unless the outbreak of a great war or continual war scares should check the improvement; but some considerable time will have to elapse before the expansion of the coin circulation will reach the point at which the London money market will be affected. In the meantime the fear of war has kept in check speculation both in the stock markets and to a large extent also in commodities. The slackness of speculation decreases the usual demand for loans from the banks, and therefore tends to lower the rate of interest. The anxieties upon the Continent, too, tend to transfer capital from the Continent to this country. In the early part of last year there were undoubtedly large sums transferred from France to London for safe keeping; and, although just now the transference is not as great as it was then, there is little doubt that many quiet investors in the countries likely to become the theatre of war are anticipating eventualities. They may not perhaps believe that war is about to break out; but, since rumours of wars are continually recurring, they think it as well to be secure against accidents. Beyond this, it is to be recollected that the Continental banks generally like to hold large amounts of bills upon London sterling bills, as they are called. Such bills are payable in gold, and therefore give the holders command of gold if it should be required. The Continental banks are always, therefore, active competitors in the London bill market, and the employment of Continental money in this way tends artificially to depress the rates of discount in the London short loan market. Over and above all this, the revival of confidence in the American money market has sent down rates in the London market. As long as fears were entertained in the United States of a financial crisis through the accumulation of money in the Treasury, apprehensions existed here of a drain of gold to the United States, and consequently the value of money here was artificially raised. Since the fears of a crisis have died out in the United States, and the rates of interest and discount there declined, there has been a very marked decline in London. And as it seems probable that the American money market will now continue easy for several months to come, the tendency to lower rates is becoming more and more marked in London. But, as we have pointed out above, the appearance of the London money market is exceedingly deceptive. The condition of the market depends upon the reserve of the Bank of England, and that is regulated by the amount of gold held by the Bank. At any moment that amount may be materially decreased by a demand either for the Continent or for the United States, and, therefore, the future of the market depends mainly upon the course of politics upon the Continent.

THE ACADEMY AND GROSVENOR EXHIBITIONS.

At the Academy this year we see but little of an art that was planned by the old masters as a fitting accompaniment to scenes of courtly pomp and magnificence. We have little sympathy nowadays for decorative work that harmonized with gold and rich hangings, polished floors, carving, and stately columns.

We not only cannot do that sort of thing, but find it difficult enough to keep in mind that a picture should at least be suitable to some sort of house, and should look at home in some sort of surroundings. The Academy, however, is pretty well off in more intimate kind of work—work to sit beside, to live with comfortably, and to take in unconsciously at meals and at various odd hours. We will dispose first of the noble and palatial—an easy enough task. The "Apotheosis of the Duke of Buckingham" (148), a joint work of Rubens and Jordaens, though distinctly an example of the style, has little or no beauty about it, except in the figure of Fame. A shockingly jaundiced man and a woman the colour of a shaved pig wallow in the left corner; the sea and sky are of vicious tint, and the handling in many places, such as the horse's legs, is common and mechanical. A fine Titian, "Europa" (134), as regards colour and general aspect, would make an admirable design for a piece of sumptuous tapestry; but the workmanship is far too free and suggestive. There is, indeed, something quite impressionistic about the romantic coast-line vaguely peopled with deploring figures. Salvator Rosa's big landscape, with figures, "The Baptism in the Jordan" (126), belongs to the class of showy and palatial pictures; and we may put in the same category Sir Joshua Reynolds's large group, "The Marlborough Family" (120), and two dark and noble Van Dycks, "Philippe Le Roy" (149) and "Madame Le Roy" (147). Perhaps Murillo's "Virgin and Child" (131) should also be included. Its style is dignified, its colour warm, even, and agreeable; but if it be compared with a picture near at hand—"La Femme à l'Eventail" (132), by Velasquez—a want of force and subtlety in its modelling will easily be noticed. Velasquez's picture, a portrait, is a good one among the smaller and more intimate works, yet it has as much breadth as Murillo's specimen of the grand style, while its play of surfaces is infinitely more varied, as may be seen by comparing the gradation of light on the two foreheads. "Don Balthazar Carlos" (137), with a sky and distance silvery as a Corot, and a richly coloured small canvas, "St. Sebastian" (143), are also the work of Velasquez. It would be impossible in any age to find a more splendid piece of naturalism than Ribera's "St. Jerome praying in the Desert" (140). No amount of elaboration and process could express details of texture and close realistic modelling so marvellously as this dexterous straight-off handling. Two Rembrandts are full of interest—"A Young Man" (51), bearing the date 1646, shows the careful unimpulsive style of the "Lesson in Anatomy"; "An Old Woman" (109), dated 1660, the warmer colour and miraculous workmanship of the late portraits. The first, though smooth, is neither narrow nor niggled in its carefulness, and the modelling of the mouth and cheeks is astounding. The second has been done rapidly and suggestively, with superb dexterity and freedom, and yet with masterly precision. Different as they are, both give an equally accurate and finished account of form and light, both are equally aerial, both will bear a searching study of their planes, when looked at from the right distance. Yet, while the "Young Man" affects one as the most lofty prose, "The Old Woman" has all the effect of real poetry. It is a grand example of a kind of modelling which many seek to revive at the present day. It would be well if some of them remembered that pictures like this, in spite of their fascinating aspect, would be worse than tamer ones if they did not equally well express all the underlying realities of form. This dashing cleverness only scores when it goes further than any amount of cool deliberate labour. "A Dutch Gentleman" (146) is a bolder, broader, and more solid Frank Hals than the somewhat facile and shallow "Laughing Cavalier" (75). "Thomas Wyck" (61) and his Wife (65), by J. Versprouck, both of them cold and slatey in colour but full of gesture and expression; "A Dutch Lady" (72), a good Ferdinand Bol; a romantic portrait of "A Sculptor" (119), by Dobson; "Dr. Ash" (39), a Reynolds with splendidly painted accessories; and "W. Esdaile, Esq." (6), a well-preserved Wilkie, in which the bitumen still seems fresh, are the most notable of the portraits. Many excellent Dutch figure pictures by P. de Hooghe, N. Maes, D. Teniers, A. Van Ostade, and Jan Steen, will be found in the second room. "A Music Party" (53), by P. de Hooghe, is the largest, perhaps the most interesting, and certainly the most charming in colour. We have not many landscapes by the Old Masters to speak of, but one or two are of the highest order. Few Claudes, if any, surpass "An Enchanted Castle" (138) or "Europa" (130). The first is perhaps the better; one would never tire of looking at the ingenious architecture, the lovely sea, and the beautiful warm passage from yellow to blue in the sky. Rembrandt's "Mill" (74) is a very different matter, and much more solemn and much more modern in feeling; one seems to discern in such a work a probable source of Millet's inspiration. Other Mills by Hobbema (71) and Jacob van Ruysdael (111) are not more than ordinary specimens of these painters. In the third room hangs a bright solid Canaletto "View in Dresden" (145); near it hangs a curious little G. Poussin (144), as fresh as the day it was painted; and not far off, a somewhat sloppy sunset, "Landscape" (151), by Rubens. W. Van de Velde, A. Van der Neer, Van de Capelle, and others are represented. A most splendid array of Renaissance work in sculpture, bronzes, medals, &c. has been set up in the water-colour room. It comes chiefly from one or two private collections, and is so important as to demand a separate notice, in which it can be treated at some length.

Such a full illustration of English painting may be seen at the Grosvenor Gallery under the title of "A Century of British Art," that we will mention the few landscapes of the Academy in that connexion. To give a list of all the good things in the Grosvenor would take too long, so we can only point to the main groups. Two great schools of landscape, the Northern and the Southern, have ever been popular in England. Many Englishmen, indeed, show the influence of both the classic and the realistic, the Flemish-Dutch and the Italian-French. Something original, however, will always be seen in the work of the best painters. Wilson, whether he got it from Titian or elsewhere, has at times a breadth that seems to forestall some of the effects of style of the French Romantiques. This may be seen in two noble examples in the Grosvenor, "View on the Tiber" (79) and "View of La Riccia" (175). Neither Claude nor Poussin, though his superior in so many points, could envelope ordinary things in the romantic mystery of air and shadow which enwraps the avenue of trees in the latter picture. The "View on the Tiber," a grand blaze of colour, is scarcely a classical composition, in spite of its cypresses and stone-pines. It seems to give one hand to the Italians, and hold out the other to the modern French. Turner could be just as observant and quite as broad as Constable. We have only to look at "Mouth of the Thames" (111), a splendid piece of poetical realism. His various ideal styles are also represented. "Vintage at Macon" is a dark, heavy, but noble essay in the manner of Claude; "The Wreck of the Minotaur" is a fine idea much, though very ingeniously, overworked. This may be seen by comparing it with the far simpler and more effective sketch for this picture (301). There are no very good examples of Thomson of Duddingstone, who, if inferior to Turner in technical ability, knew quite as well, if not better, what a picture should be. The work which represents the Norwich school is not very characteristic; it is too much in slavery to the Low Countries. Nevertheless, such examples of Crome as "The Beaters" (53), "A Cottage and Trees" (129), or "A River Scene and Boat-house" (12), even if they have not the force and breadth of some of the National Gallery Cromes, cannot fail to please if looked at merely as pictures. By taking into account "Landscape" (36) at the Academy, we shall have a specimen of Crome's really personal style of landscape. Constable, however, is the most fully represented of any landscape painter. At the Academy we have his "Brighton: Beach and Ch in Pier" (48), a truly realistic study; and his "Sea Piece" (44), a little picture, not unlike Turner's "Mouth of the Thames" before mentioned. At the Grosvenor the most important out of a long list are "Hadleigh Castle" (7), "The Glebe Farm" (46), "Arundel Castle and Mill" (47), "Barge and Lock Gates" (51), "View of Dedham Vale" (161), "Salisbury Cathedral" (173), and from its size and as an example of inartistic elaboration—"Salisbury" (142). Constable's firm determination to try to paint whatever he liked may be seen in the heroic attempt to render dewy sparkles (47) on the last canvas he touched. He succeeds only in spoiling his picture, and destroying the value of the water which gushes out from the mill. The further experience and the more complete art of Corot were necessary before such an effect could be rendered artistically. "Hadleigh Castle" may be taken as an example of what Constable did achieve in the way of novelty in landscape. Here are shimmering lights, a moving sky, distance on distance really modelled, true shadows, and a natural composition. We cannot mention all the many fine landscapes which show, some a classic feeling, some a Dutch feeling, some a mixed feeling. We have work by De Loutherbourgh, Sir G. Beaumont, B. Barker, Gainsborough, De Wint, Morland, Wilkie, Copley Fielding, Collins, Cotman, Linnell, Callcott, Bonington, Stark, Vincent, and others. It seems scarcely necessary to say much about the figure-painters, their work is so well known, and nothing of really remarkable importance appears this year. We may mention Romney's refined "Lady in a Blue Dress," Gainsborough's charmingly unaffected "Miss Nancy Parsons," Lawrence's pompous "Hon. Mary Frederica Seaforth," and Reynolds's elegant group, "Mrs. Thrale and her Daughter." Portraits—Turner at Twenty-five, by himself (137); Wilkie, by himself (133); and Wilson, by himself (128)—will naturally awaken interest. Many good portraits by Hogarth hang in the place of honour at the end of the West gallery. Amongst these are "Mrs. Hogarth" (24), "Mrs. 'Peg' Woffington" (26), "Garrick as Richard III." (28), "David Garrick and his Wife" (27). England cannot be said to have shone in subject-painting, and what she has been most noted for in that direction is the anecdotic or programme picture. It is a danger of the genre that, however badly it may be painted, a picture of this sort can hardly fail to please the public if the artist has the talent of illustrating his subject. Several Hogarths, and a really artistic modern specimen, "The Widow" (49), by Mulready, prove that the high and serious fashion in which the Dutch told their stories was an example not always thrown away upon their English followers.

THE PERSONAL ELEMENT IN MONARCHY.

THE usual newspaper guesses which precede the meetings of Parliament are taking paragraph form. The first of a series of Cabinets in preparation for the coming Session will, it is said, be held next week. The habitual rumour that the Queen will open Parliament in person has been followed by the habitual condo not think this particular piece of work has been attempted before; we are pretty sure that it has never yet been executed with such conscientious diligence and in so judicial a temper. In this book the author's principal object is always to do justice. Not that he is without individual liking and disliking, or pretends to suppress them. If, indeed, there existed an ideal critic whose judgment were always the expression of universal reason, without right-hand excess or left-hand defect, the absolute equity of his criticism would probably make it very dull. Mr. Saintsbury does what is possible for mortals; he has opinions, tastes, or even whims of his own, but he is careful to distinguish them from those grounds and principles of literary judgment which are the common possession of scholars, and not reasonably disputable.

The self-denying caution used by Mr. Saintsbury prevents his book from being exactly an amusing one. A reader who wants the sharp seasoning of controversy or the sugared raptures which announce the disinterment of a new minor poet must go elsewhere. There is no want of savour, but, as in good French cookery, it is evenly diffused. Mr. Saintsbury will not entangle himself in the quarrels of modern editors and commentators. Where he has profited by their work he makes brief and fitting acknowledgment; he expresses next to nothing concerning their faults, and implies as little as possible. He refrains himself even from good words in all things that might lead into digression. Another piece of commendable self-denial is in the matter of extracts. Mr. Saintsbury purposely does not give specimens of the great masters whose work is or ought to be in the homes and hands of all people who read English at all. To reprint Lycidas or the dirge from The Tempest in a volume of historical criticism would be no less idle than it would have been inexcusable to omit them from The Golden Treasury. There is danger enough without this of critical works being used by idle or intellectually dishonest readers as substitutes for the literature itself, instead of guides and companions to it. In Mr. Saintsbury's case the danger is perhaps made as small as it can be; and in this respect even Mr. Saintsbury's besetting faults of manner will have their uses. Those faults (for they must not be overlooked) are an unrestrained propensity to use foreign terms and phrases, or forms of speech on the outermost verge of accepted English, an excessive indulgence in remote allusions, and a consequent disregard of the reader's convenience. Mr. Saintsbury is too apt, in one word, to talk to himself in print. It is a tempting practice, and on occasion may be justified and more than justified. Some of the most delightful literature in the world has been produced in that way. But it is not the appropriate way for expounding a period of literature to readers who are presumed to be of fair intelligence, but to know a good deal less than the writer, and to need things being made plain for them. Mr. Saintsbury writes not merely for scholars, nor for English scholars, but for educated readers of English books everywhere, and those who wish to become so. His constant esoteric allusions, his experiments in classicism and Gallicism, are therefore in this place mistaken both in substance and in art; and we feel bound to say so on behalf of the public, though we have ourselves enjoyed many of them. It is a kind of constantly recurring aside, addressed now to the student of Greek, now to the student of French, in short, to the imaginary reader who in one or another direction has gone as far and learnt as much as Mr. Saintsbury himself. But a Græcism like xenomania will be Hebrew to a good half, we should say, of the readers who ought to profit by Mr. Saintsbury's learning; and this even if we allow, with Mr. Saintsbury, that English ought to receive xenomania because Karl Hillebrand has made it pass in German. Again, French critical phrases like excentricité voulue will convey the right shade of meaning to only a small minority; and to call Ireland the El-Dorado-Purgatory of Elizabethan adventurers, if it be admissible in English at all, will do no good to young persons who are forming their style, or to their teachers. Along with these asperities of foreign bodies we find allusions so local and insular that not even English-speaking readers outside England can be expected to make anything of them. No doubt we are criticizing Mr. Saintsbury by a high standard. His learning and material competence, and the high object of his work, demand it. We should have liked to see in his book not only a sound exposition, but a model of exposition. However, the quaintness and hardness to which we take exception have, as we said, their good side. There will be very little chance for idlers or impostors of any kind to pass off Mr. Saintsbury's knowledge as their own.

It might be significant praise for some writers, it is hardly praise at all for Mr. Saintsbury, to say that in his own case the work and the knowledge are all his own. For the reader, however, it may be useful to know that he may always count on the materials being used in a workmanlike manner. Mr. Saintsbury has two great qualities of sound criticism; he gives the means of verifying everything, and he does not dogmatize. His deliberate passing over of certain kinds of details as unverifiable, or for the purpose in hand not worth verification, is in our eyes another merit. We do not always agree with his particular opinions; it would be strange if any two readers who read for themselves did agree in all points of so large a field. We are inclined to think that Mr. Saintsbury does not give quite enough weight to what he has himself aptly called sustained excellence on a certain level. It is true that a man of letters is entitled to be judged by his best work; otherwise it would go hard not only with many of the second, but with some of the first rank. Wordsworth and Victor Hugo are obvious examples in their widely different ways. But this does not mean that one or two brilliant hits or accidents are to be used to force up our estimate of the inferior mass out of which they came. It is enough that these live. Yet Mr. Saintsbury himself has once and again justly pointed out that the occurrence of such unexpected felicities in our Elizabethan literature, sometimes in authors generally incapable of them, or, at any rate, capable of things strangely worse, sometimes not even claimed by any certain authors, is fit to be borne in mind, mainly as showing the vigour and fertility of the age as a whole. Our precise estimate of Carew or Wither must be to a great extent an affair of individual taste. We could have borne with less of Carew's doubtful raptures and more of Wither's unconscious humours, such as are exhibited in his special hymns for the use of divers sorts and conditions of men. There is a delightful boldness in offering a hymn to tailors, weavers, and millers, with the remark that "most men of these trades are either greatly slandered or very guilty of deceit and falsehood." But whether Mr. Saintsbury does or does not make something too much of Carew and something too little of Wither is not very material. He puts the reader in the way to form a rational judgment of his own.

When we come to distinguish the merits of Mr. Saintsbury's work in different regions, we think, on the whole, that he is at his best among the lyrical poets, and least sure-handed in dealing with prose. It is in prose that we find the two surprising omissions of the book. One is the omission to mention in any way Raleigh's splendid pamphlet on the Last Fight of the "Revenge," which is fairly well known by Mr. Arber's reprint and through Lord Tennyson's ballad, but is hardly so familiar that knowledge of it can be taken for granted in a book of this kind. The other is that Mr. Saintsbury has nothing to say of Shakspeare's prose. We are aware that it has lately been proved to be verse in disguise; but we continue to believe that the prose passages of Shakspeare are very admirable prose, and not less individual in their universality of manner than his verse. It would be interesting to consider why they had not more influence in their own age on English prose writing in general; and we looked for this from Mr. Saintsbury's hand. As to Mr. Saintsbury's treatment of Shakspeare in general, he spurns, like a true scholar, the rubbish-heaps painfully piled up by the folk named of Mr. Swinburne finger counters and figure-casters. At the same time he sweeps with too masterful a broom, for his words leave it open to be supposed that he thinks it futile to pay the same kind of critical attention to Shakspeare that is paid to the Greek and Latin classics. Now it seems to us that either the scholarship of three centuries has been wasting itself on things not worth doing in Greek and Latin (which, we conceive, is not Mr. Saintsbury's mind), or the reverent criticism, textual and illustrative, of Shakspeare is justified on exactly the same grounds as the reverent criticism of Æschylus. No doubt it is easier to write nonsense about Shakspeare than about Æschylus, and, what is more, to find some one to take it seriously. That cannot be helped. If, again, Mr. Saintsbury really thinks that there is, in fact, not much to be done, or even that the text of Shakspeare is in a quite satisfactory condition, we must definitely differ from him. We are apt to think that Shakspeare has often suffered from the worst form of corruption, the worst because the least reparable: namely, the perverse emendation of small-minded people—in this case actors, printers, or both—who alter a passage they do not understand, or else go about by hasty conjecture to repair some mechanical error of the copy in their hands. In either case the evidence of the true reading is destroyed.

There is another point not made about Shakspeare, and though in strictness it is a point of language, it is also of importance in literature. We mean the power which Shakspeare has had to preserve forms of speech that were on the point of becoming obsolete, besides enriching the language with his own inventions. The same thing may be said of the Authorized Version of the Bible; but Mr. Saintsbury, though he is more nearly enthusiastic over the Jacobean translators than over any other author or group of authors whatever, does not credit them with this; and, by neglecting the archaic or archaistic character of the Version of 1611, we think he indirectly does some injustice to the earlier versions which—with the single but important exception of the Psalter—were superseded by it. In any case, it appears from Selden's Table Talk that the Authorized Version was not in its own time received as an example of current English prose. It seemed archaic and violently Hebraistic. The triumph of the translators was a greater matter than simply writing the best English of their time; they developed a new style which, by its combined power and opportunities, imposed itself on English for all time to come. Many Scriptural expressions which are now part of our common stock were, we believe, uncouth to Bacon and to Selden. Something might be said, too, of the differences of style in the Authorized Version itself; as when we compare, for example, the Wisdom of Solomon and Ecclesiasticus with the canonical books most like them. But this would, in a general history of literature, be to consider too curiously. Neither must we stray out of bounds. It is time to withstand the many temptations of pleasant places, and part. We take leave of Mr. Saintsbury as a scholar whose work we must always respect, can with few exceptions praise, and, for our own part, do almost always relish.

NOVELS.*

It is not without a struggle against the tenderness of old associations that A Prince of the Blood is considered to be something of a mistake. It is a stirring tale of adventure, and it is dominated by a persuasive tone of reality which takes the reader out of his armchair, right away from his club or his placens uxor, and sets him down among the people of the story. The prodigality of incidents and the skilful boldness of the narrative make a sufficient answer to the inanities who declare that all the stories have been told. Murder by land and sudden death by sea, shipwrecks and hairbreadth escapes, an undiscovered island, a mutiny and an execution, a fight with savages and a rescue from sharks—these are but a few of the leading events in a tale of unflagging energy and unbroken interest. To say that a book is written by Mr. James Payn is to say that it abounds with quaint ideas and honest humorousness. Here, for instance, we are told of a Hindoo "whose nature was so gentle that he was ready to curry favour with anybody for an allowance of rum." Now and again the fun is Wellerish, as when an Eastern executioner who is engaged in racking his mother-in-law is said to have remarked, "Our relations are getting a little strained." On the supposed vis medicatrix naturæ Mr. Payn quotes the opinion of a doctor friend:—"There are plenty of people who will be found to tell you 'leave things to Nature,' but the simple fact is that what she's after is just this, sir—Nature wants to kill you." There is a lively scene in which Mr. Bates (second villain) is being held by Prince Tarilam (second hero) over the edge of a precipice. "Let him go, let him go!" shouted the midshipman. "Mr. Bates, when he heard that phrase, reflected with a pang on the indefiniteness of the English tongue; the Prince might very well have taken the words as an encouragement to drop him, instead of pulling him up." All the men and women in the book are "good company," especially the midshipman already mentioned, an impudent, plucky boy, who talks about "men of his own age," and a delightfully comfortable, commonplace aunt who rises with unexpected dignity to the requirements of some very embarrassing situations. The hero is an enterprising young barrister, who faces with equal adroitness the scoundrels who attack his life and the wicked uncle who refuses to bestow on him the girl of his heart. He does his love-making manfully; and against Mr. Payn's own wish, so it seems, he completely cuts the other lover out of the reader's sympathies. Like other lawyers destined to achieve professional distinction, Charles Layton does not appear to have very deeply studied subjects not likely to "come in useful," as may be seen from his retort in this dialogue:—

> "If you persist in your infamous pursuit of my ward [says the Wicked Uncle], the consequences will be on your own head. I am not one to threaten in vain. When I meet an adder I avoid it if I can; but if I cannot avoid it——"
> "Just so; admitting for the sake of argument that I am invertebrate," interrupted Layton scornfully, as the other hesitated, "what then?"
>
> "Why, I set my heel on it!"
> There was a contemptuous laugh, and then the cabin-door slammed; the interview between these two unflinching antagonists was over.

Hitherto Mr. Payn has been remarkably successful in his portraits of Nice Girls, and at the beginning of this book we are ready, like everybody else who knows her, to admire and adore Miss Edith Norbury. But her odious conduct forfeits the sympathy aroused by her charms and sorrows. Her lover being lost at sea, and the ship's company being cast upon an undiscovered land (the Isle of Flowers), where they are visited by a tribe of friendly and very amiable savages, she drifts into an engagement to marry the Prince Tarilam. To be sure, he is a particularly nice savage; he is brave, clever, and refined; if he had nursed an unspoken and unavailing passion, we could have sympathized very heartily with his disappointment. But it is an unhappy idea to make him the accepted lover of an English lady.

It would not be correct to call Pine and Palm a novel of adventure. It does describe a number of lively scenes and stirring events, but the narrative is sometimes overlaid with a heavy stratum of moralizing and sermonizing. It is a story of life in the Southern States in the good old slavery days. There are two heroes, and Mr. Moncure Conway is not quite up to driving a pair, so the story oscillates between them, sometimes in a perplexing manner. But, if they are taken one by one, the chapters are pleasant to read and some of them are cleverly written. Mr. Walter Wentworth becomes a little tiresome when he turns amateur school-teacher and shows how the thing ought to be done, and anybody would be considerably bored who read conscientiously through the description of tableaux and theatricals which were performed for the moral uplifting of the plantation niggers. These parts are best taken by a skip, and the rest of the two volumes may be recommended. Randolph Stirling and Walter Wentworth are fellow-students and bosom friends; but they quarrel at a debating club over the nigger question, and a duel is arranged for them by their high-spirited friends. By the intervention of accident and lovely woman the encounter is averted—a result which is to be regretted, as no harm could have come of a duel in which both combatants were determined to fire into the air. But, in spite of his moral courage, Randolph Stirling is a bold and dashing young fellow. After all his perils and troubles, including a romantic marriage with a girl whom he did not love, it is only right and proper that he should be finally rewarded with the hand of a very fine and very large young lady, who had helped to rescue a fugitive negro by assuming the necessary complexion and habiliments. Of the old life on the plantations Mr. Moncure Conway has drawn an amusing and apparently a truthful picture. It is not a pleasant representation, but he shows the bright as well as the dark side. The conversational part of the book is readable. This extract gives a fair sample of its merits and faults:—

> "Papa lately read me something about the ancient wager of combat, out of which duelling arose; it was supposed that in the combat God would protect the right, but was abandoned because He did not seem to attend duels regularly. But now there is a wager of wits. It depends on a trial of wits between Mr. This and Mr. That whether Mr. The-other shall be strangled or some baby's estate be devoured by a cormorant."
> "One of these days we may have female lawyers, and then—"
> "The legal devices will be more—more devicious than ever (a pun, I'll tell Doug that). Portia used to be my goddess, but I've lived to discover that her law was as bad as the sneak she pleaded for and the fortune-hunter she married!"

"Story, God bless you, I have none to tell, sir." That is the cry of many a needy novel-grinder; but in the art of writing a great deal about next to nothing Mr. Frank R. Stockton has achieved an unqualified success. The cleverness which is shown in The Hundredth Man cannot be denied.

A quotation may be allowed, because it will introduce all the more important prigs of the story. The scene is a croquet lawn:—

> "Gay and Mr. Thorne will play together," said Mrs. Justin; "leaving you and me for the other side."
>
> Stratford smiled. "That will be a most agreeable arrangement for me," said he: "but I am rather sorry for Miss Armatt and Thorne."
>
> "That is true," said Mrs. Justin. "I remember now that Gay said she had not had a mallet in her hand since she was a little girl; and you and I are both good players."
>
> "Thorne tells me he knows but little of the game," said Stratford. "Shall I take him on my side, and coach him?"
>
> "Of course not," answered Mrs. Justin. "We won't divide in that way. You must take Gay, and I will play with Mr. Thorne."
>
> The game proved to be a very long one.

And so on, and so on, almost for ever.

Miss Gay Armatt, the rich Mrs. Justin's protégée, is a "young girl" with intellectual aspirations. She is engaged to a Mr. Crisman, who is shown to be unworthy of her by his opinion that, when she is married, she will be too much occupied with domestic duties to go on reading for college distinctions. Mr. Stratford takes it upon himself to break off this unsuitable match, and explains to Mrs. Justin that the best method will be to induce Gay to compare the homely Crisman with his brilliant self. Mrs. Justin declares that he ought not to do anything of the kind, especially as he does not intend to marry the girl himself. He persists and succeeds in his purpose; but Miss Gay Armatt sickens of a mysterious disease:—"Her soul ceased to be hungry and her body followed the example of her soul. . . . What was left of her was a half soul, and girls like Gay with half souls die." Luckily, Thorne, though an indifferent croquet player, is able to supply the missing dimidium animæ; and Stratford finds that he has scorched his own wings. "Serve him right for a Marplot!" would be the verdict of an ordinary person; but Mrs. Justin calls him a hero for his pains. His intellectual measure may be taken by his theory of life:—

> It had come to him in the course of his reading and thought that, in every hundred books on a kindred subject, in every hundred crimes of a similar kind, in every hundred events of a like nature, and in every hundred men who may come within one's cognizance, there is one book, crime, circumstance, or man, which stands up above and distinct from the rest, pre-eminent in the fact that no one of the others is or could have been like it.

He is now engaged in looking for The Hundredth Man. Mrs. Justin points out that he is himself the object of his own researches. For the credit of humanity it is to be hoped that it contains a much smaller percentage of faddlers and meddlers. In justice to Mr. Stockton's book it should be added that a slight human interest is given to it by interweaving an account of the falling and rising fortunes of a New York eating-house which has been boycotted by the discharged waiters. There is even some fun in the position of Mr. Stull, the proprietor, who sees his business going to ruin, but cannot openly interfere to save it because he would lose his position in society if it were known that his income was derived from so humble a source. This part of Mr. Stockton's book is moderately amusing; but its only connexion with "the Amours of the Prigs" is that Mr. Crisman, after being jilted by Miss Gay Armatt, consoles himself with Matilda Stull, the vulgar daughter of a vulgar father.

If Mr. Stockton does uncommonly well what is not much worth doing, the author of Mrs. Sharpe does it very badly. But even this tiresome book shows that the person responsible for its existence is a reader; and accordingly all the dummies who go through their performances in these pages are very gifted beings. Mrs. Sharpe is a meddlesome and mischievous, but apparently not an evil-intentioned, woman. She sets her cap at the Squire, and nearly marries him. He is a widower, devoted to the memory of his lost Janet, and proves his devotion by philandering with a young girl and twice proposing marriage to Mrs. Sharpe. He is the most anxious and affectionate of fathers, as he shows by going on his travels and leaving his children in the charge of a woman whom he does not trust and by carrying about unopened the letters which would inform him of their condition. He is a miserable, vacillating creature, who richly deserved to become the henpecked husband of an odious widow.

The author of Dr. Edith Romney has written a very pleasant and amusing novel. An Old Man's Favour is full of pretty love-making and pleasant conversations. The plot turns first upon sudden poverty, and afterwards on the desire for revenge, and both "motives" are worked with considerable skill and power. It would be unfair to spoil the market for an honest novel by analysing the story. It may be recommended to anybody who likes a novel which stimulates without fatiguing the imagination. Perhaps it would not quite stand Mr. Darwin's test of being read aloud, as it is spun a little too thin. Without being childishly innocent, it is absolutely pure of offence. Ida Leigh is a very nice girl; but she was evidently not suited to pushing a young ladies' school, or doing battle with importunate tradesmen; and we are very glad to see an easier path opened for her. The struggling musician, her faithful and persistent lover, is an attractive character, with all his eccentricity and impetuousness. The most powerful and the only disagreeable conception in An Old Man's Favour is that of Mrs. Dering, the ruined merchant's wife, who pursues her husband's enemy and her own old lover with an unrelenting hatred that does not even recoil from using the charms of her own daughter as the instrument of her revenge. Not having aimed too high, the author of An Old Man's Favour is to be congratulated on having hit the mark.

EPIPSYCHIDION.*

EPIPSYCHIDION is probably the most Shelleyan thing that Shelley ever wrote. It has all his music in it, all his mysticism, all his metaphors, all his Theory and Practice of Flirtation, all his beauty, a good deal of his obscurity, all his power, and all his weakness. Epipsychidion would thus be a capital "paper" to set before candidates for the Shelley Society. If they are sound on Epipsychidion they must be sound all round. The Shelley Society has published the piece separately, edited by Mr. Potts, with an introduction by Mr. Stopford Brooke, and with some remarks borrowed from Mr. Swinburne's Essays.

The influence of Societies like the Shelley and Browning Societies appears to us rather deplorable. Sometimes they set one against poetry which one heartily admires as long as no Society annexes it and puts up placards every here and there, till it is no more like what it was than Wimbledon Common is like the > isle under Ionian skies,

> Beautiful as a wreck of Paradise.

Till the present moment he who has turned away his eyes from beholding Mr. William Rossetti, who has abstained from Mr. Buxton Forman, and shunned the path of Mr. Swinburne, has been able to find in Epipsychidion a paradis artificiel more beautiful than the dreams of haschich or of opium. One vaguely knew that Miss Viviani was a real young person "kep' out of her own," and in a convent. But this circumstance did not interest one more than the precise geography of Xanadu and its chances of being annexed to the Russian Empire. One no more thought of looking for actuality or a reasoned philosophy in Epipsychidion than of asking how far Alph, the sacred river, is navigable. Certainly Shelley himself meant Epipsychidion to be read in this dreamful and uninquiring manner. His little preface about the death of the author, just as he was going to one of the wildest of the Sporades, proves this. The Sporades would not have suited Shelley at all, as any one can see who reads Mr. Theodore Bent's account of them. Even in Delos an English artist, storm-stayed for three days, would have starved if he had not shot the local pig with a revolver. "The present Poem," Shelley wrote, "is sufficiently intelligible to a certain class of readers without a matter-of-fact history of the circumstances to which it relates." Quite so; but now comes Mr. Dowden with his disenchanting light on Miss Viviani, on Mrs. Shelley, and on Shelley; and then Mr. Stopford Brooke analyses the philosophy of the piece, very sensibly, but very much with the result of breaking the magic wand and burying the magic book. Lastly, fate sends the volume to be reviewed, and all the bloom is smirched off the butterfly wings of Epipsychidion.

Emilia Viviani was a pretty girl, with a jealous stepmother. She was sent to a convent school, where she was not at all comfortable. Her confessor and tutor, who must have been a most amiable man, told Shelley that she was "made for love." Shelley was made for love, too, and went, and saw, and admired, and adored, and rhymed, and rode away. Apparently, if one may judge from Mr. Dowden's book, he (and still more Mrs. Shelley) began to wonder what he could have seen in the girl. This was the very most disagreeable thing in Shelley's character. It was not only that, as Thackeray says all men do, he worshipped a woman on his knees, and, when he got up, he went away. He used to blaspheme the idol as soon as he ceased to adore it. This may have been a sacrifice on the altar of Hymen, and an atonement to Mrs. Shelley. But one does not want to think of such conduct when one reads Epipsychidion. "A matter-of-fact history of the circumstances" destroys its charm. Shelley knew this perfectly well. His editors are less acute, and now, in addition to "chatter about Harriet," we have gossip about Emily. What says the poet, goaded into verse by indignation:—

> O ladies many, ladies fair,
> O Mary, Harriet, and Claire,
> O Jane, and Emily!
> Your conduct's neither here nor there,
> We do not know, we do not care
> What kind of characters you were;
> Or how you lived, or when, or where,
> Or married folks or free!

After all that has been written what do we know, if we wanted to know, about Emilia Viviani? She must have been very pretty. Before "a portion of" Shelley "was already dead," as he told his publisher, Shelley thought her very clever. Then he mixed her up with his Ideal, and wrote a poem in which it would have been for the Court of Probate and Divorce to decide whether the Ideal or the Real was being asked to accompany him to some isle in the indiscoverable seas. Then he tired of her, and laughed at her, and she married, and led her husband "a devil of a life," as Shelley feelingly remarked.

That is the long and short of it, when once our attention is invited to a matter-of-fact history of the circumstances. Mr. Stopford Brooke does not say much about the character of Shelley's performance, so it may not be superfluous to remark that his behaviour was neither manly nor even gentlemanly. A married man should not flirt, as he did, with an inflammable schoolgirl, and say that he wished they had been twins, or that polygamy was the rule of modern life, and then turn away (when he has made "copy" out of the affair) and laugh at his victim. "I am deeply interested in her destiny," he wrote, "and the interest can in no manner influence it." Probably the "interest" influenced it very much. If Emily had the heart which was conspicuous by its absence in the poet, the remainder of her life must have been extremely unhappy. But there is no sign that Shelley ever gave the subject a thought. She was the ideal for a week or two, and she inspired an immortal poem, and then the philanthropist appears to have regarded her as a second-rate sentimental schoolgirl. He himself had behaved exactly as young women of that class do. Mr. Stopford Brooke compares Dante and the Vita Nuova. But the Florentine did not throw over Beatrice in a fortnight. To be respectable, the ideal should be permanent. Whereas of poor Emily Mr. Stopford Brooke remarks, "As Shelley warms in his effort Emilia is neglected. She has done her work." She has supplied "copy," in fact. Mr. Brooke remarks that Shelley's habit of looking for the ideal among real women left him "no peace." He had a good deal more peace, apparently, than the girls on whom he experimented. Mr. Brooke discovers that Mrs. Shelley "did not completely satisfy his heart." Whether the heart was the organ in question seems rather doubtful. He was always faithful to Mrs. Shelley, Mr. Brooke says; and again we fail to see it. It was rather Mrs. Shelley who displayed a constancy worthy of Mrs. Micawber. Mr. Stopford Brooke observes, with perfect truth, that Shelley takes us into regions of poetry where we are taken by nobody else. "And the solemn persons who do not wish to come, but stay only among the other regions of poetry, need not grudge us our charioteer, nor our course in the æther with him." We may be solemn, but we do wish to come, and we do not grudge Mr. Brooke his course in the æther. But we don't care for going in a van and in the company of the Shelley Society for a day out in the æther. And we wish that Mr. Brooke, and still more Mr. Dowden, could have taken the charioteer without inquiries into character. The charioteer himself asked as much when he published Epipsychidion. It was published "simply for the esoteric few," and the Shelley Society is neither few nor esoteric. Indeed, thanks to Societies, nothing is esoteric any more. We shall have essays about Emilia's stepmother, inquiring whether she really was jealous of her husband's children, and who her cavaliere was, and whom Biondi married after Emilia died.

Any one who has cared for Shelley's poetry, and who regrets the curious inquiries of his biographers and Societies, must feel doubly glad that Shakespeare's Sonnets remain a sealed book to literary gossips. But it would be unfair to leave an impression that Mr. Stopford Brooke's Introduction to Epipsychidion is all, or mainly, gossip. He seems to us rather hard-hearted about Emilia, not even bestowing the humble meed of pity granted to the sex by Guy Heavistone, who, when women were mentioned, would say, "Poor little beasts!" adding "Egad!" "In herself," Mr. Brooke writes, "she does not deserve this interest. She was intelligent, passionate, beautiful, unhappy, capable of small literature; but of this type of women there are thousands in all classes." The Census has not investigated it, but we doubt the accuracy of Mr. Brooke's statistics. Even if they are correct, even if Emilia was only a pretty Miss Bunnion, she deserves the meed of a melodious paragraph, such as Mr. Brooke could have written very nicely. He may be thought a little mixed when he says in one sentence that Mrs. Shelley II. (Mary Godwin, he calls her) was the Moon of a passage in the poem, and, in the next sentence, that "she is of the earth, and not of the ideal region." The Moon is not of the earth, earthy, and has been thought ideal enough for most purposes. In fact, Shelley all his life was crying for the Moon, and when he got it, he was not contented. But Shelley's philosophy, as expounded by Mr. Brooke, is that we love Ideal Beauty, and that alone. Human beings, women at least, we only love "that we may pass beyond them to the spirit they partially express. They are steps in a ladder by which we reach the perfect reality." Tant pis pour l'escalier.

If this was Shelley's case, we are solemn enough to hold that it is a mere philosophy of philandering. Nay, we are unromantic enough to prefer that foolish old chivalrous ideal of Sir Thomas Malory and Sir Lancelot, and that sinful example of Queen Guinevere, who was a true lover, and therefore she made a good end. But Shelley holds it true that we may rise on stepping-stones of our dead loves to higher things. How high he might have risen, and in whose company, but for the shipwreck of his yacht, is a question for Shelleyans rather than for the friends of poetry.

WILLIAM BARNES.*

ALTHOUGH we can by no means endorse the extravagant praise which has since his death been lavished upon Mr. Barnes, nor, with a certain Oxford oracle, claim for him among Victorian poets the highest place below Lord Tennyson, there is no question that he possessed a very original and charming talent, or that he will hold, as long as English literature exists, a niche in it that will be all his own. He was, in short, a figure of sufficient magnitude to claim the honour of biography, and we have not had long to wait for his memoir. He died little more than a year ago, and now his daughter, whose hand is by no means a 'prentice one, presents us with a volume of his sayings and doings. We are bound to say that we wish she had taken a little more time over her task, or had given the form of it a little more consideration. She has produced a pretty book, and one that will be indispensable to readers of Barnes, but she has not made an ideal biography of a poet. Very little happened to William Barnes during his long life, and, short as Mrs. Baxter's memoir is, it is too long. We hesitate to say what may seem unkind, but the fact is that she has taken up her butterfly in clumsy fingers, and has quite unwittingly rubbed a good deal of the gold-dust off his wings. We thought of the aged poet, sequestered among his apple-trees, in some flushed and misty valley of Dorsetshire. She has shown us something more like an aged pedagogue, sequestered among not altogether wisely understood books. The gift of good biography is rare, and it is not every daughter, even though she holds the pen of a ready writer, who can reach excellence at a bound. But Mrs. Baxter might have mentioned, or in reading her proofs might have noticed that she had omitted to mention, the date of her father's birth; she might have arranged her material so as to present a more coherent picture of his life; and certainly, if she printed a few of his miscellaneous letters, she might have embodied them in the work, instead of consigning them to an appendix. But it is vain to sigh over the might-have-been, so we will be thankful for what Mrs. Baxter has given us, and appreciate her good intentions.

William Barnes was born in 1801 in the very heart of the county he was to immortalize, in a hamlet by the "clotev Stour," in the beautiful Vale of Blackmore. As early as 1820—that is to say, in the lifetime of Shelley and Keats—he had published verses, and Mrs. Baxter tells us of a volume of verse, Orra: a Lapland Tale, published in Dorchester in 1822. What she does not appear to mention is that Barnes was at least as early as this spelling out for himself in the Greek the Pastoral poets; and that it was in emulation of Theocritus and Bion, and of no more modern master, that he was already sketching the earliest of his Dorset poems, the Eclogues. It is interesting to learn, as a fresh example of the activity of his mind, that Barnes was anxious to become an engraver, and that Orra was illustrated with tailpieces cut on wood by the poet himself. But who among the living has ever seen Orra? Mrs. Baxter confesses that she has searched for it in vain. The Dorset poems proper first struggled to light in the poet's corner of the Dorset County Chronicle. They were collected in a little volume, now very rare, published in Dorchester in 1844, and it is amusing to learn that they were at first attributed to Lord Sidney Godolphin Osborne. We learn that the members of the Sheridan family were among the first to be captivated by their idyllic charm, and that, in particular, it was the generous and beautiful Caroline Norton who first urged them upon the attention of literary London. Barnes, who touched all the arts, had set some of Mrs. Norton's lyrics to music; and when, in 1844, he made what was (or appears to have been, for Mrs. Baxter is very inexact) his first trip outside his native county, the poetess showed him some of the lions of the capital. The Dorset poems awakened some curiosity; and the critics, in the priggish manner of that age, extolled them as likely to assist the poor to "appreciate more fully the blessings they enjoy as class members of the Church and State." On no one, not even upon Mrs. Norton, does it seem to have dawned that such lyrics as "The Cleto" and "The Meäd a-mow'd" possessed an artistic excellence which, in 1844, they shared with no work of any living poet, save that of Mr. Tennyson, since in those days Mr. Matthew Arnold was still an undergraduate at Balliol and Mr. Rossetti meekly trudging to and from a day-school.

It is rather a doubtful question whether Mrs. Baxter has done right or wrong in dwelling at such great length as she has done on her father's philological attempts. No doubt she will be blamed for this, and we confess that what she says on this subject does not add to the attractiveness of her book. But we do not feel inclined to blame her. We do not know how she could have acted otherwise. It is notorious, as she says, that Mr. Barnes's "most earnest studies and greatest aims were in philology," and it is evident that he died without ever suspecting that he was but an amateur in the science of language. To those who see clearly that he was noteworthy because, and solely because, he was a poet, if not of high, yet of special, rank, the other occupations of his mind will not prove irritating, but amusing and interesting. His character was pure, delicate, and honest; there is no ostentation, no shadow of unworthy vanity, in his persistent eagerness about his "Redecraft" and his "Tiw." We are glad to possess this record of his life, even if it be a little less perfect than we had hoped; and we turn back from it, with no sense of disillusion, to the "hwomely rhymes" of Dorset.

THE ARNISTON MEMOIRS.*

IT is often said that, in competent hands, any family history may be made interesting. If even "the short and simple annals of the poor" have been found capable of treatment, the history of a great house, like that of Dundas, a house which has given, both to Scotland and to England, eminent politicians, administrators, judges, and officers, is worth detailing; and Mr. Omond has succeeded in the handsome volume before us, in telling the story clearly, simply, and not at too great length. His materials have been gathered chiefly from the family papers, preserved at Arniston, where the junior branch of the Dundases has been seated since 1571. These documents, which seem to be unusually complete, narrowly escaped destruction when the Charter Room of the house was dismantled many years ago; but they were at length arranged and calendered by Dr. Fraser; and from them omitting, as worthy of separate treatment, the letters of Henry Dundas, Viscount Melville, Mr. Omond has made up his book. The illustrations are numerous and pleasing, especially one, a copy of a portrait of Katharine Oliphant, second wife of George Dundas of Dundas, who purchased Arniston. This very shrewd and determined looking old lady is variously estimated by the different branches. At Dundas Castle she is, or rather was, for the old family residence has been sold, looked upon with aversion, as "having damaged the family estate to obtain an inheritance for her son," while at Arniston her descendants describe her as a prudent dame who hoarded her pin-money and provided well for her children. There is still preserved at Arniston "a Venice glass, said to have been Katie Oliphant's wineglass, to which the tradition is attached that its breakage would be followed by dire misfortune." At the end of the first chapter we see facsimiles of the autographs of "G. dundas of y' Ilk" and of "Katharene olyphant, lady dundas." The first Dundas of Arniston was Sir James, Governor of Berwick; the second was "Senator of the College of Justice," with the title of Lord Arniston. This personage, who lived through the troubles before and after the restoration of Charles II., took a prominent part in politics. He resigned his office rather than renounce the Covenant, and died in retirement in 1679, before the passing of the Test Act, which would probably have driven him into exile. His son Robert also rose to the bench in happier times, and was called the second Lord Arniston. His son was also a judge as Lord Arniston, but rose to be the President of the Court of Session in 1748. This high office he held till his death in 1753. His son Robert obtained the same post in 1760. So many Lords of Session never in all probability succeeded each other. Two were judges, two were Presidents of the Court, and, to make the strange tale stranger, another Robert Dundas, the son of the second President, became Lord Chief Baron in 1804 and his brother Lord Clerk Register; while Henry Dundas, the second President's brother, was the great supporter of Pitt, and was made Lord Melville in 1802. There were many other legal luminaries in the family, but it would hardly be worth while to enumerate them all, especially as the absence of a tabular pedigree from Mr. Omond's otherwise carefully edited volume would make it a very arduous task, and, as we have seen, Mr. Omond himself is obliged to leave Lord Melville for separate treatment.

We have seldom met with a book more full of what may be called antiquarian and historical "pickings." There is very little about either the '15 or the '45; but there are so many small notes of local and family life at the time that it is difficult to select. The ravages of the small pox in the winter of 1733-34 seem all the more shocking when we remember how many among us are striving their best to bring about their renewal. A series of letters written in those years "show in a striking manner the fearful mortality arising from that disease previous to Jenner's discovery of vaccination." The "small pox" is spoken of in the plural in a letter from the President to his son, a student at Utrecht:—"Poor James Stewart, Garlie's son, died of them"; "they are raging in all this country." George, the writer's son, died "of them" in November 1733. "Susie" and "Annie" died in January; we may presume they were daughters, but the aforementioned want of a table of descent leaves it doubtful. In February the wife, Elizabeth Watson, died, to her husband's great grief, which, we may suppose, was fully proved by his marriage, a few months later, to Anne Gordon. The woodcuts are very pretty, especially those representing interiors; and many people will be glad to see the sketch on p. 211, where we have a corner in the dining-room at Arniston, of which Sir Walter Scott wrote in his diary in 1828:—"I am always happy in finding myself in the old Oak Room at Arniston, where I have drunk many a merry bottle." The panelling in the Library, as represented at p. 220, must be very good. There is something very fascinating in the history of a race which influenced the destinies of the nation by a kind of hereditary right—a race of lawyers, of country squires, who, whether by innate capability, or by some accident of personal manner, or by a habit of learning, or of governing, which unquestionably has been known to run in more than one family for several generations, kept themselves at the head of affairs in Scotland for nearly three hundred years.

THOMAS À KEMPIS.*

ALTHOUGH Dr. Cruise disavows all claim to originality, his work on Thomas à Kempis is no mere pièce of book-making; it embodies the results of a long course of reading undertaken as a relaxation in the midst of the pressing engagements of a physician's life, and as the labour it demanded was reckoned a pleasure, nothing has been scamped, and the volume contains a summary of all that is, and probably all that ever will be, known of his subject, excellently arranged, and in a convenient form. The ground has, indeed, already been pretty fully occupied by the two learned works of the Rev. S. Kettlewell, and Dr. Cruise is too thorough a student to slight labours by which he has profited. As a Roman Catholic, however, he has been moved to publish his present book by a desire to give the members of his own church an account of Thomas à Kempis and the De Imitatione Christi that would be free from the "Anglican bias" he regrets in Mr. Kettlewell's writings, an account that would not represent Thomas as a "potential precursor of Martin Luther and his so-called Reformation." It is not our purpose to enter on what Mr. Kettlewell has or has not said on this matter, but we fully agree with Dr. Cruise as to the folly of instituting any comparison between men so wholly unlike both in work and character as à Kempis and Luther. To claim an author as a "precursor" of the Reformation because his religion was pre-eminently spiritual is simply a manifestation of the ignorant Phariseeism which leads people to talk as though it was a strange thing to find that any one loved and studied the Bible or lived in close communion with God before the sixteenth century. That there is nothing in the De Imitatione that breathes the spirit of a religious revolt surely does not need pointing out; while, on the other hand, it is equally certain that its spirit is far removed from any extravagant exaltation of human authority. Indeed, no uninspired book of devotion has better claim to be left alone by religious partisans; it belongs to all Christians alike, and a man who can study it with the hope of finding some weapon to use against any followers of the Divine Master will meet with well-deserved disappointment. Dr. Cruise should, however, have compared the society that gathered round the suspended mission-preacher, Gerard Groot, at Deventer, with the early disciples of Wyclif; for, though we do not say that there was any striking resemblance between the two men, the movements they set on foot should be viewed side by side, especially as regards their effect on the popular estimation of monastic life. Unfortunately Dr. Cruise appears to know nothing about Wyclif, and has merely given an allusive and obscure notice of the attack upon the Brethren of the Common Life at the Council of Constance; in short, he has failed to treat the institution of the brotherhood with reference to the history of the Church at large. After some considerations in praise of the De Imitatione, mostly taken from the works of others, he gives a clear account of the early days of the little Society at Deventer, traces its development under Groot's successor, Florentius Radewyn, who placed it under the guidance of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, and records the foundation of the monastery of Windesheim and the rapid expansion of the movement. Another chapter is devoted to the life of Thomas à Kempis and to notices of his companions largely gathered from his own works, and from those of other members of the "spiritual school" of Windesheim. Dr. Cruise next proceeds to discuss the authorship of the De Imitatione, collecting and arranging the results arrived at by the ablest advocates of each theory. Taking the claim of Thomas à Kempis first, he shews that several of his contemporaries, three of them personally acquainted with him and two members of his order, plainly declare that he was the author, and that a critical examination of manuscripts, and the internal evidences afforded by the book itself—its style, the frequent occurrence of Dutch idioms, and the like—lead to the same result, though there is reason to believe that, while it is the work of à Kempis, it embodies "not alone his own ascetical knowledge, but also the accumulated wisdom of the 'Circle of Windesheim,' from which he borrowed largely." On the other hand, he points out that no contemporary witnesses, no actually contemporary manuscripts, and no internal evidences can be adduced in favour of the claim of the Chancellor Gerson, that the very existence of Gersen, abbot of Vercelli, is something worse than doubtful, and that no one else has any claim to the authorship worth considering. The last part of the book contains the "notes of a tour" through the places connected with the life of Thomas à Kempis. Dr. Cruise visited Kempen, Deventer, and Zwolle, which is only some two miles distant from the site of the monastery of Agnetenberg, with all the enthusiasm of a pilgrim. Finding that he could not get the photographs he wanted, he returned home, learnt photography, and on a second visit took the views which he has had reproduced as woodcuts in the volume before us. They are well executed, and add to the pleasure of reading the account of his tour. He photographed the skull of Thomas à Kempis, and found that his brain must have been of more than ordinary size, and he also handled his other relics, which he naturally regarded as "a priceless treasure," and made a calculation as to his probable stature.

SOUTH AFRICAN BUTTERFLIES.*

THE monograph of the extra-tropical species of South African butterflies, upon which Mr. Trimen is now engaged, is not, as he is careful to inform us, merely an enlarged edition of the useful "Catalogue" which appeared with his name some twenty or more years ago; it is rather to be regarded as an entirely new work, embodying the results of the wider knowledge he has gained during a lengthened residence at the Cape, while in its production he has been largely assisted by the researches of Colonel Bowker and other friends, whose qualifications for the task and whose valuable contributions he generously acknowledges. The extent to which this monograph is in advance of the Catalogue which preceded it may be estimated by the fact that, whereas in his earlier volume he was able only to record the occurrence of 197 native species, he can now describe no less than 380, enriching his pages with minute details of the larvæ, the chrysalids, and the perfect insects, their life history, their habits, and distribution, which twenty years ago would have been impossible.

But Mr. Trimen has not contented himself with the enumeration and exhaustive description of the various forms of South African Rhopalocera ("clubbed-horns," or butterflies having the antennæ knobbed or thickened at the top), their classification, and their relationship; he has prefaced his work by an introductory essay upon the general structure and habits of the class Insecta and of the sub-order Lepidoptera, which, though primarily intended for the guidance of entomologists in the South African colonies, deserves from us more than a passing notice. It is not every writer who can repeat the familiar and oft-told tale of insect metamorphoses, of their mimetic resemblances, and of their singular and unexpected habits in clear and fitting language; and English readers, who are never likely to meet with a single living example of the genera he describes, may yet turn with interest to Mr. Trimen's Introduction to this monograph to find in it a history of transformation peculiar to the whole order which, if now related for the first time, would excite unbounded astonishment, even if it were not received with absolute incredulity.

An insignificant worm-like object of smallest dimensions, yet with well-developed jaws and voracious appetite, is seen to emerge from an egg no larger, it may be, than a pin's point, which with hundreds of others was months ago, perhaps in the last year's early autumn, glued to the bark or rind of some twig or plant, to remain till spring-time unaffected by rain or frost. No sooner is it liberated than it hastens to its proper food, and so well employs its time and powers that, with rapidly increasing bulk, it speedily demands release from its too limited skin; secreting from its tissues one of greater capacity, it strips off that which had enclosed not its body alone, but its head and legs, discarding in some instances even the delicate membranes of its internal organs, as if, imposing intolerable duties, it had strained and worn out even its own digestive apparatus. Again and again, three, five, seven, in some cases even ten times, is the process repeated, until the time approaches for a second change; the caterpillar then ceases to feed, and wandering in search of a suitable retreat, enters the chrysalis or pupa stage; in some cases enclosing itself in a silken cocoon spun from glands within its own body which diminishes in size as the task proceeds; in others constructing for itself a sheltering case from particles of earth, or sand, or wood; perhaps weaving its own cast-off hairs into a protective covering; or, strangest of all, neglecting all methods of concealment, attaches itself by its hindmost segment to some fixed object, and becoming shorter and thicker, withdraws the projecting head and legs, until, its last larval skin thrown aside, it assumes a new and abnormal form, whose prevailing tints by some occult influence accord often in a very marked degree with the coloration of the object to which it has become affixed. The final appearance as a perfect insect is not so marvellous as the changes wrought during this intermediate or pupa stage. The once nearly uniform grub-shaped body is divided into three—head, thorax, and abdomen—the six or more minute eyes are enormously enlarged and developed, a long spiral sucking-tube (haustellum) takes the place of the active and trenchant jaws, which are now reduced to the merest rudiments, the pro-legs disappear, the true legs and the antennæ are lengthened and altered, to the back of the thorax are attached closely-folded wings covered with scales, while the internal organs undergo changes equally mysterious and profound. Not until the metamorphosis is complete does the imago, released from its closely-fitting case, unfold and distend its wings and launch itself into the air, gifted with powers of flight seemingly out of all proportion to the slight wing-muscles and the slender thorax to which they are attached, and presenting an appearance which bears no recognizable likeness to the sordid larval form in which it had passed the earlier stages of its existence.

An unsolved problem in the economy of the Lepidoptera is the exact purpose and office of the antennæ. Varying greatly in form, and in some genera unusually long and conspicuous, it is difficult to explain their use, since they do not seem to be employed, as in other insects, as feelers or organs of touch; the extraordinary powers of smell possessed by the males of certain night-flying moths have long been recognized by collectors; and Mr. Trimen's suggestion that the antennæ are olfactory is at least worthy of more extended investigation.

The Introduction to the Rhopalocera is arranged in sections, each having its special interest; thus under Section 2, Classification, we notice a reference to what might be regarded as an instance of "correlation." An important feature in the classification of the perfect insect is the condition of development of the first pair of legs; we have remarked above that, in entering the pupa stage, in some cases a silken protective covering is formed, in others only a silken attachment to some inanimate object. It is remarkable that just in proportion to the atrophy of the first pair of legs in the mature insect is the extent to which these silken threads are absent or present in the pupa. The forelegs of the Hesperidæ (represented in England by the "Skippers") are fully developed, the pupæ are attached by the tail, secured also by silken thread, in some cases protected by a slight cocoon. The Papilionidæ (swallow-tail, whites, &c.) have also the forelegs perfect, their pupæ are attached by the tail, and are to a greater or less extent girt with silk; in the Lycænidæ (coppers and blues) the forelegs of the male are partly atrophied, the pupæ are attached by the tail, but firmly; in the Nymphalidæ (Fritillaries, White Admiral) the forelegs are atrophied, and the pupæ, though attached by the tail, are suspended freely and loosely.

A further section is devoted to Geographical Distribution. Though the flora at the Cape is unusually beautiful and varied, yet, with the exception of the Eastern coast-belt from about the Kei river to Delagoa Bay and Inhambane, South Africa does not seem to be a paradise for butterfly-collectors. Within the Cape peninsula, and an area of twelve miles to the North and East, Mr. Trimen in his twenty-five years' residence has only succeeded in recording some 47 species; British Kaffraria has yielded 94; beyond the Kei river Colonel Bowker has collected 117; while at Durban, on the coast of Natal, 206 species have been taken, Mr. Trimen himself in ten weeks securing 134. The most productive region in the world in Rhopalocera is undoubtedly tropical America. Mr. Bates, in his book on the Amazons, records the capture of no less than 700 species within a short distance of Pará; Europe and the Mediterranean islands have yielded about 500; the British islands, less favoured than the Continent, 63; while New Zealand, lying wholly in temperate latitudes (33° to 53° S.), with an area not much less than that of Great Britain and Ireland, possesses only 16 species, of which six at least are Australian. The sections on Differences in the Sexes, on Habits, and on Protective Resemblance and Mimicry, the latter especially, will very well repay perusal. The careful description of each individual species which forms the bulk of the work, and in which lies its true value, can only be properly treated in the pages of a scientific review; but we need not hesitate to express our opinion that Mr. Trimen's volumes will rank with the best handbooks of English or foreign butterflies which have their place upon our shelves.

NOVELS AND STORIES.*

An Exile's Romance is a story of Australian life, which, however, begins in London—as is natural in novels, at all events—for the unsuccessful plunger of romance invariably gravitates to the antipodes, and usually makes a fortune superior to anything he would ever have been entitled to in the old country. But, if the adventures of Arthur Dacre run in general on pretty well-worn lines, the details vary at times freshly, and he is a good fellow even when he discovers that his dearest friend has betrayed him. For the heroine we are devotedly grateful, because, having with her eyes open (at least she believes them to have been so) taken a man for better and for worse, she holds her vows honestly binding even when she finds them to be very much for the worse. Who will say the age of romance is past when such adventures as Dacre's, in the French penal settlement at Nouméa, were possible? We confess to a little mild wonder as to how the hero contrived to secure his money in such fashion as to escape the search of the runaway convicts of New Caledonia, or the curiosity of the subjects, jaunes et bleus, of the ex-Comte de Deauville; but the account of that feathered potentate reads as if it were at least founded on fact, and one feels almost sorry at the way the worthy gentleman is baulked of his revenge, even though presumably he did not hear of it. The worst of Mr. Keyser's book is his tendency to analyse his characters' feelings, and also at exciting moments to ask his readers conundrums, such as "Will he ever get there? Would the canoe live? Would it capsize?" &c. which becomes exasperating after a couple of pages when one is interested and wants to get on with the story. But Mr. Keyser knows the wild life of the country he describes thoroughly and loves it; moreover, he can invent, or introduce, characters with a fair amount of life in them, and if he would only avoid "padding," his book, good as it is, would be infinitely better and decidedly more amusing.

Environment is, we learn on the author's authority, "a story of modern (American) society," and before committing oneself on the subject one would very much like to have the opinion of some of Miss (or Mrs.) Florine Thayer McCray's countrymen on the likeness. It begins in the orthodox way at a summer resort, when the heroine, the New York girl, "was boarding up Elm Street for the summer." The hero, at least one of them, is introduced in a sidewalk "as a sturdy Saxon," whom, had his hair "been allowed to flow over his shoulders, and his muscular limbs, set free of the ugliness of modern gear, been in tunic, cloak, and leggings, one would have rubbed his [whose?] eyes, and greeted him joyously as Cerdic or Harold or Hereward the Valiant." The characters all talk with the easy freedom which prejudiced old-world readers would call "vulgarity" did they not content themselves by the apology that it is "so American." The book throughout is in the style of a very third-rate country newspaper; the various personages indulge in the smallest jokes, which always evoke sympathetic, if unintelligible, roars of laughter; they discuss music as follows:—"How wonderfully he plays," said Beatrice. "It is something beyond mere technique, though he seems a master of it. The exquisite colouring and modulation and the perfect rendition of the most intricate phrasing is so smooth and delicate, it makes me cry. Why, he handles Bach with the confidence of a lion-tamer!" (No wonder the hero dubiously remarks, "Well, now you are getting a little beyond my depth.") Another, a gentleman this time, replies as follows to an inquiry as to how he had enjoyed a party to which à la mode Américaine he had chaperoned the fair inquirer:—"I am never bored, Miss Merton, and, though I seldom attend such affairs, I feel myself so comfortable and pleased with every one that I fear I shall henceforth plunge into the maelstrom of society with abandon." We share the astonishment of this sententious gentleman on one point, that "it is a marvel to see a woman bred to a retired life come forth in perfect self-possession and confidence, and do the correct, the charming thing every time." Well may the heroine remark that "You little fathom the resources of our sex!"—at any rate in America, we add. One often hears Americans bewail the ignorance of their English cousins when the latter betray astonishment at the former's knowledge of the ways and manners of decent society; but really, as long as such books as the present are offered to us as fair specimens of modern American society, they have no more right to complain than we should if we suffered foreigners unchecked to study the London Journal or Bow Bells as a guide to the best society in England. In addition to its other merits, Environment is on decidedly strict "teetotal" lines, favouring us with a horrible warning in the beautiful Mrs. Meredith, whose extraordinary fall is certainly calculated to increase our admiration for and astonishment at American society as depicted by Florine Thayer McCray. After adding that the author's pet adjective is "queenly," one can only wonder, when reading pp. 374–5, how Environment got itself published after the criticism passed by the author through her heroine on "the promulgation of lessons by means of the sugar-coating of a story."

Another specimen of the horrors of drink is given in Hatred is Akin to Love, of which it is almost sufficient to say that it would be utterly repulsive were it not utterly silly. It is impossible to feel the slightest interest in any one of the characters; and, so far from having any sorrow for the death of Mrs. Newland, to look on it as anything but a happy release from such an intolerable entourage—which is evidently not quite the sentiment Mr. Ptolemy Houghton intended to inspire.

Of Could He Do Better? one's first impression is, "Very decidedly, even had he done nothing!" for the young gentleman who leads to the question is a prig of the first water, and little deserves the love of Judith Topham. But Heaven help the man who only gets his deserts in such matters, and as the young lady herself is more than satisfied, there is not much reason for others to complain. Certain it is that the womankind as pourtrayed by Mr. Arthur A. Hoffman are far beyond the men, even than "the useless unpractical dreamer" (as that very high and mighty young person, Ambrose Jackson, contemptuously describes him), Will Sutton, who, with scheming old Aunt Bobby, is sure to become a favourite with the reader, and his unselfish devotion to Judith is very prettily told. At all events, Mr. Hoffman's characters, both male and female, whom by the way he pairs off all round most conscientiously, in the good old fashion in the last chapter, are a distinct gain on the terrible specimens of American and English country society in Environment and Hatred is Akin to Love. All the same, the reason of Judith's curious conduct at the election is hard to understand, especially as the author takes pains to show that it is not utter jealousy, which would at all events have been an intelligible and, under the circumstance, a pardonable motive.

FRENCH CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

II.

It is difficult to avoid a certain amount of repetition in noticing the volumes of the sumptuous edition of M. Duruy's Greek and Roman (speaking chronologically, Roman and Greek) Histories which have now for a considerable number of years been issued, one after the other, as livres d'étrennes. It may be said of the new volume (Vol. II. of the History of Greece. Paris: Hachette), as of all of them, that the letterpress, if not extraordinarily brilliant, original, or judicial, is well informed and sensible, while the illustration is something like a liberal education in itself. A purist may, indeed, object that there is often no very obvious reason why the particular engravings should be attached to the particular text, but that is a reproach to which this style of illustration is always open. On the other hand, it may be said that the text sometimes throws light on the illustration, or vice versâ, and that the illustration is always a pleasant companion to the text. Not merely have admirable maps been provided, but cabinets of coins, museums of sculpture, and all other archæological treasure-chambers have been ransacked to supply the materials of the imagery. As usual, also, there is particular interest in the chromolithographs, which, to the number of some half a dozen, provide the principal illustrations hors texte. Once, and only once (in the plate representing the statuette of a tragic actor), does the greasiness which is the curse of this kind of work appear, while such a plate as that of the restored chryselephantine Athena simply could not have been done satisfactorily by any other method, and is extraordinarily successful in this.

We have some handsome books, both for very young and for older children, from the Librairie Delagrave. Among the first class the palm must be given to L'éducation du petit Pierrot. There is very little letterpress, but the engravings are conceived and executed with much comic force. The astonished and delighted discovery by a Pierrot, who is very like Mr. Dick, and a Pierrette, who is like an ex-crowned head of no matter what day, of the infant in full costume under the traditional cabbage-leaf is good. His association with a large and healthy family of forerunners, his display of sad juvenile vices—a dislike to washing, gluttony, idleness, thievery, and even the atrocity of pinning "tyran" on to the coat tails of Maître Pierrot (a delightful person), his condign punishment, and his repentance, are all excellently depicted. This is said to be by "Tante Nicole." The companion volumes, by "L'Oncle Gustave," entitled "Toto et Toinette" and "Serpolet et Coincoin," though coloured (the Pierrot story is in the appropriate black and white), are also good, but not quite so good. Larger volumes in crimson and gold cloth are Un an à Alger, by M. J. Baudel, with a selection of capital illustrations, many of them after Fromentin; L'Afrique pittoresque, a volume selected by M. Victor Tissot from various travellers, dealing, of course, chiefly with French Africa, and illustrated in the same way, and a more ambitious and original effort written by M. Frédéric Dillaye, illustrated by M. Sandoz, and called Les héritiers de Jeanne d'Arc. The two first require little notice, though they are good specimens of their kind. The third is a very praiseworthy effort to make an historical romance out of the little known, but finally successful, efforts of the Norman peasantry to throw off the English rule. M. Dillaye has studied his originals well, and has too much sense to represent even Formigny as a French Poitiers or Agincourt; but he is perhaps not quite successful in his archaic style. Fifteenth-century French is much more difficult to imitate than thirteenth, and an imitation of any old period, no matter what, which, after laborious efforts to be archaic, interpolates such a perfectly modern phrase as "Le comte a violé lâchement des droits sacrés des parlementaires," is but a left-handed thing. Fortunately the probable readers of Les héritiers de Jeanne d'Arc are not critical. M. Sandoz's illustrations, though rather too much smelling of their Gustave Doré, are good.

The two yearly volumes of the Journal de la jeunesse and the Tour du monde (Paris: Hachette) always form a considerable part of the Christmas books of the year. The first-named has its usual complement of stories and of instructive articles. The Tour du monde, as usual also, renews the regret and surprise which must be felt that the most globe-trotting nation in the world cannot support anything that in the least rivals this collection of the most recent geographical investigations, popular and scientific, of all parts of the globe. The present volumes contain the latest results of the indefatigable Colonel Prjévalsky, a further instalment of Mme. Dieulafoy's Persian Travels, some work of the great M. Savorgnan de Brazza, an unpublished journey in the interior of Tunis, M. Charnay's last travels in Yucatan, and shorter articles devoted to parts of France itself, to Lapland, the Faroes, and where not. The whole is illustrated admirably and profusely.

A History of the Academy of Sciences, by E. Maindron (Paris: Alcan) may seem an odd thing to include among Christmas books. M. Maindron, however, has testified silently but eloquently his approval of the preference of the modern sportsman for double-barrels. For bringing down the learned he has elaborate précis or procès-verbaux of séances, lists of members, reports, documents of all kinds. For the more frivolous public he has reproductions, some on a large scale and very curious, of early paintings dealing with the subject, engravings of portraits, even caricatures. The reproductions first referred to, especially the frontispiece, where the remarkably buxom and attractive Athene of Coypel supports on her knee an oval half-length of the Grand Monarque, are particularly good.

If there is anybody who does not love Peter Schlemihl, let such a one know that he is a bad person. But for those who do love Chamisso's book, it may be agreeable to know that M. Fouquier has edited and that M. Myrbach has illustrated a gorgeous edition of it (Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles). We are not sure that M. Myrbach's elaborate compositions seem to us to suit the subject so well as the crisp and half-grotesque silhouettes of the edition most familiar in England for many years past, but that may be prejudice. At any rate, they are very good in themselves. It is perhaps necessary to say that the French text is not a translation; for Chamisso, though he had completely adapted himself to the land of exile, had even Germanized his Christian name, and had written his masterpiece in German, retained facility enough in his mother tongue to reissue Pierre Schlemihl in what we are glad to see that native authority confirms us in regarding as French quite independent of his own modest apology for it.

It is a common and obvious remark enough that few people who have been long acquainted with any book, and who are fond of it, are quite fair judges of new illustrations thereto. They have their own ideals, and it is almost impossible that they should not be a little biassed by the agreement or disagreement of the artist's conceptions with theirs. However, it is possible to guard against this, and we do not think that we have failed to do so in looking over the designs of various artists to the new issue of Mérimée's Nouvelles in M. Jouaust's exquisitely-printed Bibliothèque artistique (Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles). Of the book itself there is no need to speak. "L'enlèvement de la redoute," "La Vénus d'Ille," and the rest, are by common consent, literally as well as anagramatically, by "M. Première Prose" (pity that the author of that pleasant fancy did not always speak of Mérimée in the same fashion). Of the engravings, M. Merson's "Mateo Falcone" is cleverly composed, but wants tragic significance, though the background is good. M. Le Blant's accompaniment to the incomparable "Redoute" is a mere ordinary battle-piece, instead of representing, as it surely should, the finale, with "monsieur qui est arrivé d'hier" talking to his dying colonel as senior officer left in command. On the other hand, M. Sinibaldi's "Partie de trictrac" is capital, the minois chiffonné of the actress Gabrielle, and her action in playing with the money while she puts the fatal question to her lover, being just what they should be. "Les âmes du purgatoire" is neither good nor bad; but we cannot like the attempt—a difficult one of course—at the "Vénus d'Ille." The great splay feet and the stiff posture (does not M. Bramtot know that, when ancient artists introduced a slight stoop in connexion with the action of holding up drapery to the body, they followed nature?) would be enough to condemn it; though the half-sardonic expression of the face is at least well tried at.

The same firm send us, in their smaller, but equally beautiful, "Petite Bibliothèque artistique," a pretty issue of Silvio Pellico's Mes prisons. Here the illustrator is the same M. Bramtot; but he has been much happier, in of course far easier subjects.

M. Calmann Lévy issues this year (or at least his name is at the foot of the title-page; though, according to a new and rather puzzling habit, the head bears the label "Collection Guillaume et Cie") three new volumes printed and illustrated in exact likeness to the first and well-known edition of Tartarin sur les Alpes—that is to say, adorned with vignetted designs in the page or out of it at every opportunity. These designs are sometimes in black and white, sometimes in what are called aquarelles—a somewhat confusing designation, as they are, in fact, a kind of chromolithograph or chromo-phototype, having, except in their intentional softness, not to say blurredness, of outline, some resemblance to the aquatint "coloured cuts" of the last century. Madame Chrysanthème (the new book of Pierre Loti, and the prettiest of the three) is noticed under the head of "French Literature." The others are George Sand's François le Champi and M. Paul Deroulède's Chants du soldat. Here also it is unnecessary to say anything about the literary part. In M. Deroulède's case it would be not only unnecessary, but unkind. Both make very handsome volumes. M. Eugène Burnand takes the illustrations of François le Champi throughout, and gives not only the vignettes above described, but full-page, and as it were framed, drawings hors texte, which are very effective in their way. We are not sure, however, that we do not like the black-and-white head and tail pieces (which are often tiny landscapes without any figure) best of all. M. Deroulède's book is illustrated after different artists, and has a most dashing infantry man on its cover, and an equally beautiful trooper for frontispiece. Alas! (if we may parody the famous maxim in Latin as canine as the original) Magis bellos homines non sunt magis bravos soldatos. The blurredness of outline on which we have commented above shows at its worst, we think, in the design to "Vive la France!" in which the thing becomes a mere smear. In fact, the general illustration of the book, with some exceptions, is below that of its fellows.

Le livre d'or du Salon (Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles) is by this time a well-known and very desirable acquisition. It appears so late in the year that there is, of course, no pretence of novelty about it, and most of the canvases or marbles, of which it gives accounts or renderings, have been long familiar, not merely to actual visitors of the Salon, but to others. It serves, however, as a register of the best work in catalogue, and of the "best of the best" in black and white copy. The frontispiece does not make us like M. Cormon's "Vainqueurs de Salamine" much better, but it is fair to say that this kind of crowded canvas is the worst suited of all to reproduction on a small scale in black and white. On the other hand, nothing could be better suited to it than such a piece of sculpture as M. Fremiet's "Gorilla." The flowers of "Le Bréviaire" are also well rendered. But perhaps the best picture-rendering of the volume is M. Lhermitte's "La Fenaison," an admirable example of engraving, and a composition good to take the taste of La terre out of the mouth of any one unfortunate enough to have had to read it.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE might almost if not quite as well have noticed the last work of "Pierre Loti" (1) under the head of "French Christmas Books" for reasons given in that article; but perhaps a new book with literary as well as gift-book claims is better placed here, especially in the case of an author who, in the opinion of such different judges as Ouida and M. Scherer, is one of the chief French writers of the day. Undoubtedly M. Viard holds not merely a ready, but an exceedingly ingenious, pen. Given the moral as well as historical propriety of the line "A wife in every port has he" as applied to the sailor, there is no objection of any kind, from the point of view of the young person, to his book; for the details are scrupulously proper, and, temporary wife as she was, Mademoiselle Kikou, or Madame Chrysanthème, would, according to the customs of her own country, have a just right to complain of any one who aspersed her character. If, therefore, we find defects of taste in the book which were not present in the author's earlier accounts of his marine marriages, Aziyadé and Le mariage de Loti, it is not from any such point of view as that of the virtuous Dame Quickly. But "Pierre Loti" has in this book thought fit to take the Byronic line, and to compare the charms of, as he is pleased to call it, "morganatic" union in Japan with the said former experiences in a way very derogatory to poor little Madame Chrysanthème, to whom at this great distance we present our sincere condolences for having, even as an imaginary person, fallen upon hands, or rather lips, which not only kiss and tell, but which tell disdainful and blasé things. For instance, the little person longed for a comb, which (after undue delay, as it seems to us) Pierre Loti bought for her, and this is his reflection:—"Plus tard, quand Chrysanthème sera devenue une vieille guenon comme Madame Prune [the old lady from whom he bought it] avec des dents noires et de la dévotion, son tour arrivera de brocanter la chose—à quelque belle d'une génération à venir." Fie! M. Viard, is that the way a gentleman speaks of even his temporary wife? There was a time when a Frenchman thought and spoke of his mistress "quand elle serait bien vieille" in rather a different fashion. By force, moreover, of constantly informing the reader how dull and discontented he was in his rather illicit earthly paradise, we are bound to say that M. Loti produces something like a similar feeling of dulness and discontent in that reader, which he can hardly have intended. But it is fair to add that in point of mere description—minute to the point of photography and yet never "realist"—he has seldom done anything better. And in one part, at least, the touches of jealousy of his Frère Yves, for which good fellow Madame Chrysanthème seems to have had more inclination (and no wonder) than for her maussade and disappointed proprietor, the thing is excellently done.

We hope we shall not excite the ire of M. Romain Vienne (2) (who seems to be something hot and choleric) if we say that we really care very little to hear either truth or falsehood about his friend Marie Duplessis. Far be it from us to throw stones at her or any of her sisterhood, alive or dead. She seems, indeed, to have been a very favourable specimen of her class, neither coarse, nor grasping, nor hard-hearted, and she might have made a very good wife and mother if fate had been kinder to her. But we have always owed her a little grudge for attaching her rancid reputation to the most beautiful (next to the rose) of all flowers. And (though this is not her fault) the sentimentality of the particular book which made her famous and of its derivatives has also always appeared to us an exceedingly offensive sentimentality—as silly and maudlin as the "sensibility" of the eighteenth century, with a sordidness in addition from which that sensibility was quite free. Let her rest in peace by all means; but digging up bones is not letting them rest in peace.

Mr. Parry's Colomba and Mr. Elwes's Charles XII. (3) are good specimens of school-book editing. Both editors are still a little afraid of what we think the more excellent way in such editing—the furnishing, that is to say, of abundant literary information; but what they do in this direction is a long way ahead of the utter insufficiency of the older school editions in this respect. Their notes are perhaps a little too full, and we are still entirely unable to understand why derivations and suchlike things, which ought to be given once for all in the dictionary, should be given in notes to a particular author, unless (which is not the case once in a thousand times) there is something in the special context requiring the information. But these are general matters, and still undecided in at least general opinion.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MODERN Italian Poets, by William D. Howells (Edinburgh: Douglas), claims to be a sketch of Italian poetry during the hundred years ending in 1870, not fully representative of the period, though illustrating a century of national aspirations towards freedom and unity. With a brief glance at the Arcadian versifiers and the Academics, and a sketch of Parini, in which we have at least one effective rendering (43-44), these essays and translations deal with the writings of the more prominent poets of the revolutionary epochs of the century. Practically the survey extends from Alfieri to Aleardi, and may be said to end with the last Austrian occupation of Venice. Mr. Howells does indeed refer to the eminent Carducci, but he likens his work to "an agnostic flowering of the old romantic stalk," and evidently regards the stalk as irretrievably exhausted. The Italians, he seems to think, are too busy writing realistic novels, "as every people do who have any literary life in them," to produce poetry of vital force and inspiration, and, to clench the matter, Mr. Howells reaffirms an oft-iterated conviction with a new application—"In Italy, as elsewhere, realism is the ultimatum of romanticism." There is no need to deal with this odd introduction of an old thesis by the incorrigible Mr. Howells, as he himself is helpful in testing its value. Having declared that literature in Italy has found the "scientific and realistic development" common to all other countries, he confesses—"I do not know the more recent work, except in some of the novels, and I have not attempted to speak of the newer poetry represented by Carducci." Much of the patriotic poetry dissected in this volume is somewhat faint, not to say spiritless, in accent, and savours of the perfunctory expression of a sentiment; while the whole can only be accepted as national with very considerable reservations. Alfieri's hatred of tyranny, for instance, is something almost alien to Leopardi's mournful and melodious invocations to his native land. Monti and Ugo Foscolo suggest no conceivable parallel. Even Mr. Howells, "inured to drought by travel through the Sahara of Italian verse," finds it difficult to treat with serious respect some of the poets whose patriotic strains he translates. It is hard for him to respond with due fervency to the loathing of police spies, foreign soldiery, priests and other obnoxious persons, expressed by these tyrant-quelling bards. He playfully insists that their demands on his sympathy caused him serious embarrassment. As an American citizen, what should he know of spies and tyrants? Hence, perhaps, we find more of dry and rather painful literalness in his versions than of spirit and warmth. Among the more successful are some of the charming stornelli of Francesco dall' Ongaro, specimens from the Arnaldo da Brescia of Niccolini, and of Aleardi and Carcarno. The oft-attempted Napoleonic ode of Manzoni is, however, cruelly distorted, and Mr. Howells exemplifies on the whole the utter vanity of poetical translation.

Tenants of an Old Farm (Hodder & Stoughton) is an entertaining and, in some respects, a novel example of the art of popularizing scientific teaching. The author, Dr. Henry McCook of Philadelphia, and Sir John Lubbock, who contributes a preface, are of one mind, however, in thinking that the truths of natural history are sufficiently attractive in themselves, and need not the guise of fiction or a seductive colloquial style. Nevertheless, these excursions of a naturalist in the habitats of spiders, beetles, flies, moths, and other insect forms will amuse and instruct many who would never open a text-book of entomology. The author is an accomplished naturalist, a keen observer, and writes with perspicuity and animation. His book is illustrated by drawings after nature by Mr. Edward Sheppard and Mr. Stout, some of which are of great beauty, and the humorous cuts after Mr. Beard are often whimsical indeed, though they demand close study before their ingenuity is apparent. A sort of chorus to the disquisition of the naturalist is supplied by old Dan, who makes a good "corner man," and Sarah Ann, another domestic, whose superstitions with regard to moths and spiders season the lighter interludes between the naturalist's evening lectures.

Perhaps the nature of Mr. William Tirebuck's Great Minds in Art (Fisher Unwin) is sufficiently indicated by noting that sixty-two of its pages are devoted to Gustave Doré and thirty-five to Albert Dürer. In the table of contents each of the eight artists discussed is credited with some typical artistic quality, and is made to represent some country. Painters like Rembrandt and Velasquez, who represent art and not a country, are thus styled Dutch and Spanish respectively; "light and shadow, dramatic effect," is the note of the one, and "realism and romance" marks the other. Dürer is "German" and stands for "symbolism," while Doré is "French" and "imagination" (!) is his master quality. After this it is not surprising to find Landseer representing English art, and his express power in art is "the love of animals." Altogether this is a feeble book.

The new volume of the Portfolio, edited by Philip Gilbert Hamerton (Seeley & Co.), sustains to the full its reputation, both in literary contents and in illustration. Mr. W. Armstrong's papers on Scottish Painters, Mr. Blomfield's excellent notes and illustrations on Half-Timber Houses in Kent, Mr. Laurence Serle's articles on London during the last century, and papers on Signor Costa's landscapes and M. Auguste Rodin by Miss Cartwright and Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, are contributions that command admiration. Among the beautiful plates that have long been a specialty of the Portfolio must be mentioned M. Rajon's etching after Murillo's "Flower Girl," Mr. G. W. Rhead's etching after Mr. Pettie's painting "Dost Know this Water-Fly?" and a variety of fine reproductions by Dujardin, Armand Durand, and Massé.

Among our new editions and translations we have Ecclesiastical English, by G. W. Moon (Ward & Downey); the Rev. W. Wood's The East Neuk of Fife (Edinburgh: Douglas); the Life and Letters of Cicero, by the Rev. G. E. Jeans (Macmillan); Sakoontalá, by Sir M. Monier-Williams (Murray); Salome, by J. C. Heywood (Kegan Paul & Co.); Prince Lucifer, by Alfred Austin (Macmillan); Homespun Yarns, by Edwin Coller (Chelmsford: Durrant); Réséda, from the French of Zenaïde Fleuriot, by A. W. Chetwode (Dublin: Gill); Burke, by John Morley, "English Men of Letters" series (Macmillan); Principles of Political Economy, by Henry Sidgwick (Macmillan); Poetical Works of N. P. Willis, Routledge's "Pocket Library"; Lucretia, "Pocket Volume" edition (Routledge); Foods: their Composition and Analysis, by A. VICTORIAN GOVERNMENT FOUR PER CENT. INSCRIBED STOCK.

ISSUE OF £1,500,000.

Authorized by the Victorian Parliament, under the Act 49 Victoria, No. 815, intituled "The Railway Loan Act, 1885," secured upon the Consolidated Revenues of the Colony.

MINIMUM PRICE OF ISSUE, £104 PER CENT.

Interest payable 1st January and 1st July.
Six Months' Interest, payable 1st July, 1888.
Principal repayable at par, 1st October, 1920.

THE LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED are instructed by the GOVERNMENT OF VICTORIA to receive Tenders for the above amount of Stock, being the third instalment of a Loan of £8,000,000, authorized to be issued by the Act of the Victorian Legislature, 49 Victoria, No. 815.

According to the above Act, the Loan is to be raised for the undermentioned purposes, viz.:—

1. For the construction of Railways and works connected therewith (including Rolling Stock) already authorized by Parliament, or of such other works connected therewith (including Rolling Stock) as Parliament may by any Act direct; and for the repaying into the Consolidated Revenue any sums advanced therefrom, expended, and to be expended, on any such Railways or works connected therewith	£6,000,000
2. For Loans to Shires for the Construction of Tramways in Country Districts, on such conditions as Parliament may determine	200,000
3. For Irrigation Works and Water Supply in Country Districts, to be expended in such manner as Parliament shall direct	1,300,000
4. For Works in connection with Melbourne Water Supply	500,000

The GOVERNMENT OF VICTORIA state that the present issue of £1,500,000 will meet all their requirements for the current year, during which no further issue will be made, and that subsequent issues of Stock up to the foregoing total of £8,000,000 will be made thereafter, as funds are required to carry out the above-mentioned purposes.

The Stock will be in addition to and rank pari passu with the £4,500,000 already issued, and will be inscribed in accordance with the Provisions of the "Colonial Stock Act, 1887," 40 and 41 Vict. cap. 59, in the books of the "Victorian Government Inscribed Stock—4 per cent. Loan of 1885," kept by the LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED—and will be transferable without charge and free of stamp duty at that Bank, either by the Stockholders personally or by their attorneys. The interest, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, will be payable on behalf of the Victorian Government at the LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED, Lothbury, on January 1 and July 1 in each year, by Dividend Warrants, which, if desired, can be sent by post to the Stockholders, at their risk, and the principal will be payable at the same Bank on October 1, 1920.

Stock Certificates to Bearer, of the denominations of £100, £500, and £1,000, with Coupons for the Half-yearly Dividends attached, will be obtainable in exchange for Inscribed Stock at the LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED, Lothbury, on payment of the prescribed fees, and such Certificates can be re-inscribed as Stock at the will of the holder.

The revenues of the Colony of Victoria, alone, are liable in respect of this Stock and the Dividends thereon, and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom and the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are not directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the Stock or of the Dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto—40 and 41 Vict., cap. 59, sec. 19.

Tenders will be received at the LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED, Lothbury, not later than Two o'clock P.M. on TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, where and when they will be opened in presence of the Agent-General for Victoria, and of such of the Applicants as may attend.

The Loan will be allotted to the highest bidders, but no Tender will be accepted at less than £104 for every £100 of Stock, the price including accrued interest from January 1, 1888.

Tenders must be for even hundreds of Stock, and those at a price including a fraction of a shilling other than sixpence will not be preferentially accepted. Tenders at the lowest price accepted will be subject to a pro ratâ diminution.

Payment will be required as follows, viz.:—

£5 per cent. on application, and so much on JANUARY 17 as will leave 85 per cent. to be paid on FEBRUARY 21.

Payment may be made in full on January 17, or on any subsequent day, under discount at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum.

Scrip Certificates will be issued after payment of the amount due on allotment, and such Certificates will be convertible into Inscribed Stock on presentation at the LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED, Lothbury, so soon as they are paid in full.

Copies of the Act creating the Loan can be seen at the LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED, Lothbury; and Forms of Tender can be obtained at that Bank, or at any of its Branches.

"A LETTER was received from Mr. H. S. Parker, acknowledging the receipt of the samples of tea. He had lettered the samples, and sent them to Messrs. Hawes and Hertz, who had kindly tested them. The report of the testing was then opened, and it was found that the sample marked G, at 1s. 8d. per lb., was the 'best value at the price.' The Rev. S. B. Burnaby then asked for the name of the firm tendering sample G.—The Chairman: 'Messrs. Barber & Co., of Regent Circus.' The result was considered to be extremely satisfactory, as the sample supplied by Messrs. Barber was taken from the stock already supplied by them."—The Metropolitan, April 3.

COMPLETION OF MR. KINGLAKE'S HISTORY.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA.

Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of LORD RAGLAN.

By A. W. KINGLAKE.

Vol. VII.—FROM THE MORROW OF INKERMAN TO THE FALL OF CANROBERT.

Vol. VIII.—FROM THE OPENING OF PÉLISSIER'S COMMAND TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

WORLD.

The Crimean War furnished a great writer with a splendid theme, and the campaign, with its matchless blunders and gigantic mistakes, its lost opportunities and wasted achievements, will live for ever in the glowing pages of Kinglake. With volumes seven and eight the great prose epic is now completed, and the world is enriched with another Iliad, telling of another great siege, with Homer's picturesqueness and vigour.

ATHENÆUM.

The difficulty of writing contemporary history is proverbially great, but among the few brilliant examples of this difficult branch of literature Mr. Kinglake's book will take high rank, as 'Eothen' does among books of travel; and the venerable author may be congratulated on having given the finishing touches to the labour of years. Age has not impaired the vivacity of his style.

SCOTSMAN.

His vigour and animation of expression, his peculiar knowledge of the events he relates, and his wonderful skill in arranging them into a dramatic sequence and coherence, will give the non-military readers a much clearer notion of what war really is, than any other book written in modern times, not excepting even Napier's masterly achievement in this department of literature........This work of a life is a high achievement, a manly endeavour to reveal the truth of history, a stately ornament to English letters, and a noble tribute to a memory worthy of all honour.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

There is everywhere the flash of the old brilliancy, the enthusiasm of a master conscious of his strength, and rejoicing in its exercise.

SPECTATOR.

Mr. Kinglake's style seems to us as clear and attractive as ever. There is much of the present volume which would be of thrilling interest if it were mere romance. Much of it has never been told before.

TIMES.

Mr. Kinglake's volumes, as they appeared at irregular intervals, have always excited the interest of the public, as they have commanded the attention of soldiers and strategists........The brilliant author of "Eothen" is a master of picturesque style.

DAILY NEWS.

We have now before us perhaps the last work in which the history of a great war will be treated mainly as a succession of personal episodes. The "soldiers' battle" was described in the soldiers' way, and the humblest private that distinguished himself at Inkerman has his chance of immortality with this book. The characters form a gallery of portraits finished with consummate art.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

A work singularly original and varied in design, singularly bright and imposing in appearance, and yet built with such an immovable solidity of inquiry into fact that it is hardly possible to conceive its foundations being shaken.

GLOBE.

The result is not only a great historical masterpiece, but a narrative which is elevated into literature by the ease, correctness, and general charm of its style.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Kinglake's history is a clear, compact, artistic whole, governed from first to last by a definite conception, and worked in every detail by a marvellous mastery of patience and skill.

MANCHESTER EXAMINER.

We have before us the concluding volumes of the most brilliant historical work of our time—perhaps one of the most brilliant historical works produced in any time.

LORD SALISBURY AT LIVERPOOL.

IT was once remarked that Lord SALISBURY'S speeches had almost all good qualities except one—they did not show that desire of soothing the feelings of his adversaries by which a good Christian should always be animated. If statesmen were not as a rule obliged to make their arrangements long beforehand, the delivery of this week's Liverpool speeches, so soon after the Winchester election, might be thought to confirm this stricture. Many things have combined to produce in the Gladstonian party a state of extreme irritation of mind. The DOPPING affair exhibited their leader in a plight which hardly any statesman but himself could have survived, and which even to him was so damaging that his followers took care to say nothing whatever about it, and not even to attempt defence. The Crimes Act, instead of failing, is succeeding all over Ireland. The recipe of flooding the English constituencies with Irish stump-orators, after showing signs at first of being successful, has proved utterly useless. A Gladstonian philosopher might no doubt retain some equanimity after all these things; but he would probably do wisely in not reading any speech of Lord SALISBURY'S until he had recovered from the effect of them; and there can be little doubt that this wisdom has been intuitively shown in many quarters. The ill temper of those whom their hard fate has obliged not to show it is proportionately great. It has even been driven—Lord SALISBURY being too hard for it—to vent its irritation on Mr. BRIGHT for his unconstitutional doctrine that the QUEEN should not be asked to make such men as the present Nationalist members Ministers. HER MAJESTY is gravely told that she ought not to regard party in such matters. No doubt; but then Mr. BRIGHT was not talking of party. It is not objected to the Nationalist members that they champion Home Rule; some very respectable people have championed, and do champion, that, though we think them strangely wrong. What Mr. BRIGHT argued was that the associates of the vilest criminals, hung and unhung, the open promulgators of doctrines which strike at the root of the common rights of humanity, are not fit, whatever their political views, to be trusted with the government of a nation. It is convenient, no doubt, to substitute the other proposition for this; but it cannot be permitted. It may be added as a friendly caution to Gladstonians that, in their own interest, they would do well not to speak as though the charges against the Irish members rested on the authority of Parnellism and Crime. It would scarcely prove competence in Roman history and politics to speak as if the death of JULIUS CÆSAR rested on the authority of Pinnock's Catechism.

This digression concerning Mr. BRIGHT is a digression only in appearance. For Lord SALISBURY has been taken to task in some not unfriendly quarters for dealing at length with the false assertions of Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, and others respecting himself and his party. Yet it was as necessary for him to do this as it is necessary for us to correct that little matter about Mr. BRIGHT'S unconstitutional notions of constitutional government. If anybody says that the custom of requiring long polemical speeches from politicians, great and small, is an almost unmitigated nuisance, we shall very heartily agree with him. But, if the thing has got to be done, it must be done thoroughly. The whole stock-in-trade of the Gladstonian party consists in a little sentiment and a great deal of falsehood. The sentiment may be let alone; the falsehood cannot be let alone with safety. It may be weary work, and to some respectable and intelligent people it may seem unnecessary work, to go on contradicting; but it has to be done. The trouble, for instance, which Lord SALISBURY took with the constantly repeated assertions about Tory coquetting with Home Rule was assuredly not lost trouble. It will not silence the said assertions for good, no doubt; though the thing is a known lie (it is better sometimes to call things by their plainest names), and has been a known lie ever since it was first started. The contradiction will have to be given again and again. But it will be effective for the time, and for the time the enemy will be deprived of an exceedingly useful, if exceedingly dirty, weapon. When they pick it up again, it will have to be knocked out of their hands once more. This, it may be said, is a dreary prospect; but, then, the prospect of government under modern conditions can never be anything but rather dreary except to persons with a good dose of patriotism, a strong conviction of their political principles, and an unbounded stomach for fighting. The joy of battle fortunately remains much the same whether men tilt leisurely in the neatest of damasked armour or skirmish with sticks and stones; and the stake remains as great as ever.

So, also, the repeated exposure of those tactics which have been as unweariedly pursued as the tactics of misrepresentation—that is to say, the plan of encouraging Irishmen to break the law in Ireland and to hinder the making of law in England, and then of turning round and blaming the Government for inaction in England and terrorism in Ireland—however thankless it may seem, was necessary. It may seem lost labour to answer the historical criticisms of a person who avowedly has postponed the study of history to his seventy-seventh year—these Letters to an Aged Gentleman whose Education in Irish matters has been Neglected may seem almost superfluous. But they are not. Where the method of the one side is ceaseless construction of fallacy, the method of the other must be ceaseless destruction of fallacy. Constructive or positive arguments for Home Rule there is no need to meet, for the simple reason that there are none. The Unjust Judge argument, the Que Faire? argument, stand alone, as they always have stood, and it is not much use attempting to refute them. To supply an antidote to the poisoned weapons, to contradict the forgeries and the falsehoods, to demolish the invented history and the sham law, that is the laborious task of the Unionist orator. And, confessedly, there is nobody who sets about it with greater energy or greater success than the present PRIME MINISTER. He is provokingly free from any of those peculiarities which afford a handle to the only known method of Gladstonian controversy. Lord SALISBURY never compiled a hymn-book like Lord SELBORNE, who, as is clear to Gladstonians from the fact of that compilation, can know no law and have no valid opinion on politics. His nationality and religion give him a most unfair advantage over Mr. GOSCHEN in the eyes of disputants like Mr. LABOUCHERE. He has never been connected with trade—an indelible disgrace (according to some haughty fils des croisés on the Radical side), which rests not only on Mr. W. H. SMITH, but even on Lord CRANBROOK—and, if he did once write newspaper articles, it is inconvenient for several reasons to urge that point very strongly against him. These immunities perhaps account for the curiously injured tone which is frequently adopted by his adversaries.

One further remark may be made with reference to that part of Lord SALISBURY'S speech which dealt with the unfortunate "CARNARVON negotiations," as they are sometimes called. That it is utterly false to describe Lord SALISBURY or any member of his Cabinet, except Lord CARNARVON, as having in any way dallied with Home Rule, and that even Lord CARNARVON'S dallyings were not in intention compromising or disgraceful, are, we repeat, known and certain facts. But the conduct of the enemy, and the necessity of the PRIME MINISTER'S denials, show once more—what we have unweariyingly contended for here—the extreme unwisdom of, even in the most indirect manner, consenting to any such proceedings, and the dubious wisdom of committing Ireland to the keeping of one of the most estimable and honourable, but also one of the most guileless, sentimental, and crotchety, of Tory politicians. Lord SALISBURY and his party have suffered enough, in one sense, for the great error of not renewing the Coercion Act—an error the consequences of which were fully foretold at the time, in prophecies which have been fulfilled to the very letter. Politics never forgive; and the dreary task of perpetually contradicting false accusations is only a just punishment for a real and almost inconceivable blunder. But it may at least be hoped that the perpetual recurrence of the punishment will serve as a warning against the repetition of the fault which provoked it, and for which it can hardly be thought excessively or unreasonably heavy.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

THE Duke of ARGYLL has done well in recalling public attention to the outrageous character of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Irish proposals. The New Constitution, as the DUKE calls last year's scheme, has of late been thrust into the background by inquiries into the misfortunes of Mr. O'BRIEN or Mr. BLUNT, and by exhortations to "re-"member Mitchelstown" where there may be any convenient opportunity for vengeance on the Irish Constabulary. Party fanatics, of whom Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN is the most bigoted, have persuaded themselves that some of the most obnoxious features of Home Rule have been removed or reduced by a vague compromise, supposed to have been offered at Swansea or elsewhere. Some of Mr. GLADSTONE'S followers have openly propounded the doctrine that the provisions of a future Bill are to be settled at the discretion of Mr. GLADSTONE. The Duke of ARGYLL concurs with the enormous majority of intelligent politicians in declining to repose any confidence of the kind in the former leader by whom he and his friends have been deserted. It would be unreasonable to tamper with such questions as the substitution of a Federation for the Monarchy, on the suggestion of the wisest and most honest statesmen, of PITT, for instance, or of PEEL. There are still more conclusive reasons for rejecting in Irish matters the guidance of a Minister who asserts that he inclined during fifteen years to a revolutionary measure which he during all the time consistently denounced. The vexed question of the retention of their seats by representatives of a country which would have a Parliament of its own involves an insoluble problem. The English Home Rulers have almost unanimously protested against the alternative of exclusion which was deliberately preferred by Mr. GLADSTONE. He has accordingly condescended to promise that he will not refuse to consider a measure which would obviously accelerate the separation of Ireland from the United Kingdom. Perhaps Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN may not be alone in his grateful acceptance of an indefinite concession; but the objections to a twofold Parliamentary representation of Irish constituencies are, at least, equally conclusive. The plan of allowing Irish members to vote only on Irish questions was condemned by Mr. GLADSTONE himself for the sound reason that a distinction between Imperial and Irish questions was impracticable.

The preposterous contrivance of conferring on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a jurisdiction over both the Imperial and Irish Parliaments was perhaps the most extravagant article of the newfangled Constitution. Servile imitation of the American institution of the Supreme Court was worthy of the statesman who denied the existence in the United Kingdom of fundamental laws. He had formerly, as the Duke of ARGYLL reminds his readers, "described Mr. BUTT'S proposal as involving a demand 'that "'Parliament was to be broken up.'" "The breaking up "of a great Parliamentary Constitution never can," as the DUKE justly adds, "be otherwise than a tremendous expe-"riment." Sophists may argue that the so-called omnipotence of Parliament is incompatible with the recognition of fundamental laws, or, in other words, of a Constitution anterior to statutable provisions; yet at the Revolution of 1688 the Convention recognized the sacredness of the fundamental laws which the dethroned King had wilfully violated. The most authoritative historian of these events repeatedly speaks of the fundamental laws which were not re-enacted but reasserted and once more sanctioned by the Declaration of Right. That Parliament is in ordinary cases absolutely supreme and irresponsible is itself a fundamental law. The Estates of the Realm, with the sanction of the Crown, may effect almost any other change; but Parliament cannot declare itself perpetual, or abolish one of its own branches, or convert the Monarchy into a despotism or a Republic. Mr. GLADSTONE'S notorious criticism on the language of the Queen's Speech of 1866 showed that he consciously cherished the purpose of violating the laws which he denied to be fundamental. In ancient Athens a demagogue who had obtained a majority for an unconstitutional measure in the popular Assembly might be afterwards tried and convicted of a breach of the ancient laws of the Commonwealth. In England he can only be punished by general reprobation. The methods of proceeding since the first inception of the Home Rule scheme have been as objectionable as the actual measure.

The unscrupulous levity with which the Home Rule movement has been conducted is in itself revolting. The Duke of ARGYLL exposes with just severity the changes which have been introduced into the scheme since it was first propounded. The accompanying Land Bill was described by Lord SPENCER and by Mr. GLADSTONE as an indispensable accompaniment of the creation of an Irish Parliament. There could be little difference of opinion as to the honourable obligation to protect Irish Loyalists from confiscation. It is true, as the Duke of ARGYLL contends, that the necessity of protecting property against the action of a proposed Legislature involved unqualified condemnation of the policy of Home Rule. A Parliament which could not be trusted to maintain the obligation of contracts could have no moral claim to any of the powers which were in one respect to be limited or withheld. The framers of the Bill, having at that time not discarded all considerations of justice, virtually acknowledged the binding force of the fundamental laws which they repudiated for rhetorical purposes. By the American Constitution not only the State Legislatures, but Congress itself, is prohibited from impairing the validity of contracts. England has up to this time taken for granted the claims of honesty and justice. Even the most daring of innovators could not, as he then thought, establish a Parliament which in his opinion would have predatory tendencies without providing some kind of security against acts of spoliation for which he would be held responsible. The Decalogue still retained something of the character of a fundamental law; but six weeks after the introduction of the Land Bill Mr. GLADSTONE had risen superior to scruples. In a Midlothian speech he stated, though he could not have known the fact, that the Irish landlords had not been eager to accept compensation for the probable confiscation of their estates. He therefore warned them that the sands of the hour-glass were running out, and he has practically allowed them no opportunity for reconsideration. Mr. GLADSTONE has since taken credit with his partisans for pledging himself to refuse the act of justice which had been at one time binding on his sense of honour and on Lord SPENCER'S.

There was no sufficient justification for the introduction of any measure which involved an organic change in the national Constitution; but, if the abnormal state of Ireland were thought to justify the project of a new Constitution, the proposer of such a scheme was bound to a definite and intelligible plan. The opponents of Home Rule disbelieve in the possibility of devising any measure of the kind; and they are entitled to raise any objections which may attach to any given form of Home Rule. When the Bills of 1886 were submitted to the judgment of the House of Commons, the details of the plan were necessarily made public, and they were alone sufficient to condemn it. The best part of the entire measure, consisting of the accompanying Land Bill, was so unpopular with Mr. GLADSTONE'S supporters that it could perhaps have scarcely been carried. The dilemma between the admission and the exclusion of Irish members at Westminster tended to divide the revolutionary party. The Home Rule Bill was consequently withdrawn from the Gladstonian programme as soon as it was defeated in the House. For a year and a half there has been universal discussion of the theory of Home Rule, and many elections have been decided with exclusive reference to the single question of Union; yet it is not known to friends or adversaries which scheme is at any future time to be submitted to Parliament. Lord THRING, who was probably in Mr. GLADSTONE's confidence during the composition of the original Bill, has defended its provisions with an energy which would have been wasted on an abandoned project. There can be little doubt that, if his advice is followed, the House of Commons will at some future time be invited to reconsider its verdict. The bulk of the party is more sensitive to popular judgment, and it finds it safer to sign on trust a blank sheet of paper than to fill up the outline with clauses which would be liable to specific objection. It would perhaps be more just to hold the leader responsible for the obscurity of his intentions than to blame the docile followers who must wait to form their conscientious convictions till they know what they are to think and believe.

The Duke of ARGYLL, with good reason, ridicules the argument for a new Constitution which is founded on the numerical proportion of Nationalist members. As he says, fundamental questions cannot be decided by a plebiscite. "The impulses under which the masses may be got to vote "away the liberties of others and their own are as "numerous as they are unsafe." Too much importance ought perhaps not to be attached to the special disabilities which affect the existing constituencies of Ireland. According to modern theories, ignorance, political dishonesty, cupidity, and revengeful feeling are not supposed to incapacitate any body of persons from taking a part in government and legislation. The large percentage of Irish voters at the last election which professed to be illiterate was probably organized by the lay and clerical managers, who thought it expedient to control doubtful votes by their own presence during the process of polling. It is not likely that for a long time the Irish electors will be moderate and trustworthy. The best security against their misconduct is provided by the circumstance that the Nationalists are a minority in the Imperial Parliament. The Duke of ARGYLL seems to be more hopeful, as he quotes the numbers of voters at the last election. Not much more than half the whole number of electors voted for Parnellite candidates, and the total majority is said not to have exceeded the trifling number of 4,823. Little reliance can be placed on statistics of this kind. The constituencies which returned Parnellite candidates without a contest seem not to be included in the calculation. The Duke of ARGYLL is perfectly right in contrasting Mr. GLADSTONE's servile deference to the decision of the Irish voters with the passionate hostility of his criticisms on the return of an adverse majority in Great Britain. Few of his former followers speak of their recreant leader with equal boldness and candour.

"YOUR DOG!"

HOW differently, and with what "larger other eyes," is a dog viewed by his victim and by his owner! All night the hound expends the whole poetry of his nature in yelling, howling, moaning, barking—Orat, plorat (and gets swore at) (like Dr. JOHN BROWN's tyke), and everybody hears him but his master. It is the same with seeing dogs. At Westminster Mr. D'EYNCOURT has listened to the woes of Mr. SCOTT WINANS and the defence of General BROADLEY HARRISON. The General lives in Beaufort Gardens, and Mr. SCOTT WINANS has a brother who has an office in the same eligible residential district. Like a good brother, Mr. WINANS wishes often to visit the scene of his kinsman's labour. But there is (or has been) a lion in the way. The lion is General HARRISON's bulldog, or the bull-pup of the son of the General. The former of the Ollendorffian alternatives was favoured by Mr. SCOTT WINANS; the latter by the gallant officer. Mr. WINANS, in effect, says, "You keep "a ravening bulldog which makes Beaufort Gardens more "dangerous than Juba's lion-haunted shore." The General, in effect, answers:—"Distinguo; my son did keep a lively "bull-pup, the delight of careless infancy and the chief "ornament of Beaufort Gardens. But even that pup is "now with his regiment in Ireland." The difference is almost as great as the difference between PIP's four fabled hounds that ate veal cutlets out of a silver basket and the entire absence of even a puppy. Anyhow, Mr. WINANS suffered "a terrible shock to his nerves," and it was only by means of "great presence of mind and a silk umbrella" that he escaped the fate which once menaced the prophet DANIEL. General HARRISON put it to the magistrate that the dog, if unprovoked, was a lamb, but that, if a timid gentleman threatened him with an umbrella, why, like the fabled horse, "he would no longer do so." Mr. WINANS replied, with all the eloquence of an OLLENDORFF, "Three "times I have been attacked by your dogs, or dogs from "your house." But Mr. WINANS may now cast off the pale hue of dread; General HARRISON is leaving Beaufort Gardens, and the dog, or dogs, or pup, as the case may be, will leave also. No more the dog for childhood's back will serve (they rode him pick-a-back), no more his cheerful voice will make the walls of Beaufort Gardens shake. But Mr. WINANS now may go to see his brother to and fro, nor dread to meet in mid career, a horror and a shape of fear, like that which turned the soldier wan who "spake the spectre hound in Man." Nay, upon Erin's verdant shore that dog dwells and will come no more, and Mr. WINANS, in distress, need call not the Seven Witnesses, who, every man of them, would swear, the Dog went biting round the Square.

Thus all is well that endeth well, in Beaufort Gardens men may dwell; nor fear, whene'er from home they jog, to be brought back—inside the Dog, like her of whom old stories tell, she loved a Tiger passing well (a nymph was she of stately Riga), and once came back—inside the Tiger.

THE ANARCHY IN LEWIS.

THE rebellious spirit of some of the Scotch Highlanders and Islanders is apparently spreading. Both in the island of Lewis and on the mainland the pretensions which they have been induced by local demagogues to urge are inconsistent with the existence of property. The rioters who lately destroyed a number of deer belonging to Lady MATHESON and her tenant might be supposed to have some crude notion of the difference between wild animals and ordinary stock. Other malcontents have audaciously demanded the occupation of a farm to which they cannot pretend to the shadow of a legal right, and a large mob has driven off the tenant's sheep and cattle with as little compunction as if the animals had been deer. In the first instance they profess a willingness to pay rent for the land if their demands are conceded; but, as Irish agitations have demonstrated again and again, agrarian encroachment is invariably encouraged to further excesses by partial victory. The concessions which have already been made in the North of Scotland have been accepted partly as a recognition of moral right, and principally as proofs that the dissatisfied part of the population may rely on the support of a political party. Recent disturbances in parts of the Highlands have caused serious alarm in Scotland, though they have not been reported at length, or largely discussed in English papers. It is satisfactory to observe that attempts at outrage have, in almost every case, been followed by legal proceedings. The duty of maintaining order, which formerly devolved on the Lord Advocate, seems now to have been transferred to the Secretary of State for Scotland. Some of those who took part in the institution of the new office may perhaps not have been anxious to strengthen the arm of the law in Scotland. The two or three incumbents who have hitherto held the post can scarcely have been expected to meet with the same kind of difficulties in enforcing the law which has of late years habitually occupied the attention of the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In both countries demagogues have learned by experience that appeals to the cupidity of their clients are more effective than political arguments and fallacies. Irish malcontents are believed to care little for the projects of Home Rule which are sedulously inculcated by their leaders. In Wales even the vernacular press, and Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN himself, abstain from responding to Mr. GLADSTONE's proposals of disruption. The people of Lewis are covetous only of the property of their neighbours; and, up to this time, they have not formulated any political creed. They, of course, vote for the Parliamentary candidates who court their favour by the largest promises.

There is no doubt of the chronic distress which has long prevailed in some parts of the Highlands. A barren country and an inclement climate produce poverty as their natural result. The efforts of some of the great proprietors to improve the condition of their tenants have in many cases proved to be unacceptable to the objects of their bounty. In the early part of the present century the predecessors of the Duke of SUTHERLAND incurred much undeserved blame on account of the removal of some of the inland occupiers to more fertile districts in the neighbourhood of the coast. At an earlier period emigration had also been tried on a large scale with good material results, obtained at the cost of much popular discontent. In recent times the MATHESON family spent large sums in improvements, with the incidental result of providing much local employment; but it has apparently been found impossible to contend with natural disadvantages. The best remedy for the condition of the people would be emigration on a large scale; but it is impossible, as it would be oppressive, to remove the population against its will. No practicable experiment appears thus far to have succeeded. The land on which the lawless destruction of the deer was lately attempted had only been turned into a forest after the failure to render it profitable as a sheep-farm. The latest acts of violence have been committed where the land was stocked with sheep and cattle. It is highly improbable that squatters without capital would have been able to extract a tolerable livelihood from the soil. Only those who are intimately acquainted with the country can form an opinion of any value as to the economic possibilities of providing reasonable subsistence for the inhabitants; but little sagacity is needed for arriving at the conclusion that no good result can follow from a defiance of the law. In more than one case bodies of landless intruders have selected farms for distribution among themselves; and it is certain that, even if their first demands were comparatively moderate, submission to their arbitrary seizure of property would not stop with the original instalment. One consequence of the success of the agitators would be the withdrawal from the Highlands of the capital and of the private expenditure which partially correct the natural poverty of the country. Prudent capitalists have for some years ceased to advance money on landed security in Ireland. It may be conjectured that Highland proprietors already begin to find that their applications for loans are not regarded with favour.

Some theorists apparently hold that the claims of pauperism take precedence even of undisputed rights of ownership; but in the most extreme cases the claimants cannot be allowed to select at their pleasure the funds from which they are to obtain relief. The concession by recent legislation of some of the demands of the Crofters is already quoted as a precedent for interference with property where there is no pretence of actual need. The Scotch Farmers' Alliance, which includes many Lowland members, has with suspicious alacrity supported the demands of the Crofters; and Welsh demagogues have not been slow to cite the same authority for the partial or total expropriation of landowners. In these cases there is no pretence of starvation or distress, and the pretence that a readjustment of ownership would tend to increase the national wealth is at the same time irrelevant and false. Property is sacred, or rather exempt, from discussion, not because owners are specially meritorious, but on the ground that undisputed possession is the basis of existing social order. While sophists invent refined distinctions between property in land and other forms of ownership, law and custom recognize no difference of the kind. A purchaser of land has a right to rely on the implied undertaking of the community to protect and enforce a transaction which is legally permitted. It is true that a landowner is not entitled to injure his neighbours by the use of his own property, but the same restriction applies to anything else which may be acquired and possessed. An ingenious apologist for plunder lately propounded the fantastic quibble that land could not, by the law of England, be held in full ownership, because it was by a legal fiction supposed to be held under the Crown. The author of the theory unavoidably refused a challenge to suggest an instance in which the supposed feudal superiority interfered with the absolute discretion of a tenant in fee. Such restriction, even in the extreme case of the Highland Crofters, has only been imposed by modern legislation.

The uneasiness which has been caused in Scotland by the late disturbances is not confined to those who are interested in property in the Highlands. It is well understood that the example of the riotous Crofters will be contagious if they succeed. It is indeed surprising that wealthy or substantial tenant-farmers should sympathize with a movement which already threatens to include them among its victims; but when once rights of property cease to be taken for granted as ultimate facts, some persons will be more anxious to obtain the property of their neighbours than to secure their own. Even if the outrages which have been committed in Lewis and in Sutherland had been excusable, they weaken the authority of the law on which all rights depend. Frequent efforts have been made to extend the area which is now subject to exceptional legislation. As in Ireland, infringement of proprietary right is ostensibly excused on the ground that the circumstances are peculiar, and that consequently an anomalous policy can never be erected into a precedent. Since the introduction of the first Irish Land Bill it has appeared that the novel doctrines are applicable to entirely different subjects and circumstances. The Crofter disturbances and the partial remedies which have been attempted were confessedly imported from Ireland. The most formidable of Irish agitators, himself the founder of the Land League, has introduced the same policy into Wales. The Crofters and the editors of disaffected Welsh journals have eagerly accepted the example and the doctrines of Irish Nationalists. DAVITT himself is more consistent than the majority of his followers, for he has never held that a casual occupier ought to profit exclusively by the spoliation of the landowner. If property is to be confiscated, he would assign the succession to the whole community. His Socialism has never been popular in Ireland, where the disaffected class is bent on securing to itself the fruits of plunder. The Crofters are still less likely to appreciate the claims of society at large. Their Lowland sympathizers have for their principal object the acquisition by the tenant-farmer of the freehold under the name of fixity of tenure.

Although the alleged rights of the Crofters have probably served as a pretext for the late disturbances, the offenders are, it seems, simple wrong doers, without the pretence of a claim in the land. It is stated that they are without exception squatters who might at any time have been ejected from their holdings, except, perhaps, where they have acquired a title by length of possession. It seems that Lady MATHESON has, purely from benevolent motives, abstained from ejecting the squatters even when in point of law they were simple trespassers. As squatters they have none of the rights to pasturage or other advantages of the land which belong to Crofters. Apparently they think that no excuse is required for open violation of law. A number of them coveted the possession of a farm which the occupier had no intention of vacating. On his refusal to obey their summons, they have destroyed some of his fences by night, and if they had been allowed to continue their criminal proceedings with impunity, they would probably have perpetrated additional outrages. This quarrel with a tenant-farmer affords a valuable illustration of the tendency which is common to all attacks upon property. In this case the owner of the land would have suffered no pecuniary loss if the trespassers had continued to pay the present rent. The occupier is robbed and injured because he happens to be in possession of a commodity which others wish to obtain for themselves. Even the wildest agrarian projectors have not hitherto ventured to deny that, although it might be wrong to own land, it was permissible to hire it for a term, and, indeed, to convert the temporary lease into a perpetuity. It can scarcely be doubted that public opinion in Scotland will approve of the punishment of the Lewis Moonlighters. It is no excuse for their offence that they have been incited by the promoters and apologists of the Trafalgar Square rioters.

THE RAID ON BOURGAS.

IF there are any persons who are honestly in doubt where the real troublers of the peace of Europe are to be found, a careful study of the last filibustering expedition in Bulgaria, and of the telegrams dealing with the views of Russia in that country, might possibly be of service to them. The general characteristics of the NABOUKOFF raid are very familiar. Insignificant enough in itself, it is exactly like not a few other such raids which have, in countries imperfectly settled, before now overturned and reconstituted governments. It is not necessary to lay stress on any of the more doubtful and legendary features of the affair—such as the reported appearance of a Russian man-of-war just before the raiders landed, and its prompt disappearance when it became clear that they were unsuccessful. The undoubted facts are quite enough. A small party of desperadoes, which apparently would have been much larger but for the good information and prompt action of the Turkish Government, lands near the most valuable port of Bulgaria, in hopes of carrying it by a coup-de-main if they can gain a first success, and attract recruits. The officers are either Russians or Bulgarians of the type of Prince ALEXANDER's kidnappers. The men are for the most part Montenegrin bravos—valiant ruffians enough, no doubt, but, now that a little of the romance of the Black Mountain has been worn off, allowed to be the curse of the Balkan peninsula by all accurate observers, even by some who have begun their investigations with as much hatred of the brutal Turk and the base Austrian as Mr. EVANS or Mr. FREEMAN can feel. The attempt is obviously of a neck-or-nothing character — all such attempts are — and even the kind of men who make it can only be induced to make it by heavy bribes beforehand, and by a kind of belief or make-believe that there is a chance of their being joined by others in the country itself. There is no one who has the money or any interest in spending the money necessary for the bribes except Russian agents. There is nobody who believes, or has an interest in making believe, that Bulgarians are discontented with the present Government of their country except Russian agents. Perhaps Prince FERDINAND or his Ministers paid NABOUKOFF and his Montenegrins to come and be killed. This theory may perhaps commend itself to the persons who believe that Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH and Mr. BURKE hired the ruffians who killed Mr. BURKE and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH. Otherwise there is absolutely no explanation of the Bourgas raid except that it was due, not necessarily to the Government of the CZAR, but to the agents of that Government.

It failed, of course, completely; [illegible]d the leaders and many [illegible]f the followers seem to have been very satisfactorily shot. It did not even provide mendacity with an excuse for saying that the country people joined the raiders, though, of course, the said mend[illegible]ity goes on gravely repeating [illegible] Bulgaria is groaning [illegible] tyranny, and praying for [illegible] come [illegible]er and [illegible]elp her. But it might have [illegible] lono [illegible]nly this, but much more. It might h[illegible] [illegible]p a [illegible]al revolt, for there are fools and mal[illegible] [illegible]t in most countries. It might have given an [illegible] saying that Prince FERDINAND's Government ina[illegible] [illegible]ed a reign of terror; it might have put the one port of Bulgaria where landing is easy into Russian hands. The object, therefore, was clear, and the ill-success is comparatively unimportant. NABOUKOFF is dead, and some score or so of Montenegrins will never have a chance of cutting off Turkish noses again. But the Black Mountain is a fertile mother of rather venal heroes; and there are plenty of Russian soldiers who owe the Bulgarian Government a grudge for protecting local industry in their profession and discouraging the import of Russian officers into the Principality. Disorder will be encouraged just as long as it suits Russia to encourage it and make capital out of it, and as long as it does not suit the other Powers to point out that this kind of thing must be stopped, or Russia will be excluded from the privileges [illegible]he has abused, and the de facto establishment of a reg[illegible] [illegible] Government in Bulgaria will, whether Russ[illegible] likes it or not, be formally recognized without further delay. That is what, if courage and justice combined had prevailed with the Powers of Western and Central Europe, would have been done long ago; and perhaps (as not unfrequently happens when courage and justice happen to agree) it would have been in no very long run shown to be neither the most troublesome nor the most hazardous course of conduct. But one Power has family affections, and another is blessed with Home Rule in its different parts, and a third thinks it well to court Russia, and the two others have neither any particular interest in moving, nor perhaps, to tell the truth, any very great ability to move. And so Bulgaria is left at the mercy of the HITROVOS and the NABOUKOFFS in their respective capacities.

It is, however, from time to time signified more or less officially, or officiously, by Russian organs that Russia is really dying for this state of things to cease, and that it might be made to cease by everybody returning to the strict execution of the Treaty of Berlin. But, when it comes to be inquired what points of the Treaty of Berlin are to be strictly observed, the inquirer finds that the answer is unintelligible, unless he supposes that the Treaty of Berlin is in some such case as that other too famous or infamous one—the White and Red Treaty which deceived OMICHUND. The Red Berlin Treaty, which Russia fondly hugs, and the strict execution of which is all she asks for, contains stipulations about the government of Bulgaria by Russian and Turkish Commissioners (of whom the Turk is to be practically a dummy), the election of a new Prince, to be nominated by Russia, and so forth. The White Treaty, which was actually executed ten years ago, which is in all the books, and which is the constituent instrument of the Balkan Governments as they stand, contains unfortunately not one of these things, nor any things like them, and does contain others with which these things are absolutely and hopelessly incompatible. It would seem, therefore, that matters are completely at a deadlock—a deadlock for which the hustling out of Prince FERDINAND in this way or in that supplies no sort of key. Russia relies on the Treaty of Berlin, and yet the Treaty of Berlin is absolutely fatal to the demands of Russia. It is idle to suppose that, if the Prince of BULGARIA were called THOMAS, or RICHARD, or HENRY, instead of FERDINAND, it would make any difference to the CZAR. That potentate appears to be suffering from a kind of inversion or distortion of the feeling which made the poet's enamoured damsel cry "Call me PHYLLIS, call me DORIS, "Call me LALAGE or CHLORIS, Only, only, call me thine." If Bulgaria and Bulgaria's Prince will only call themselves his, he would probably care very little what was the nominal description of Prince or Principality. But, unfortunately, Bulgaria absolutely declines to call herself his, and the whole question is whether Europe will permit him to put constraint on her affections. Of this the author —whoever he was—of the forged letters was perfectly aware, and he was also perfectly aware that such gentillesses on the part of Germany as the late efforts of the German papers to show that Prince FERDINAND is a wicked man, who has no right to call himself Royal Highness, have nothing serious about them. If Prince BISMARCK is prepared to let Russia break the Treaty of Berlin, and turn Bulgaria into a Russian province, all these pretty tricks are quite superfluous; if he is not, they are worth nothing at all. And the reports, unauthentic enough, of the intentions of Germany and Austria go no further than the extrusion of Prince FERDINAND, and even expressly deny any intention to occupy or permit the occupation of Bulgaria. It remains to be seen how the apparent recrudescence of Nihilist or other disorder in Russia will affect the foreign policy of the Empire. It is well known that such disorder has sometimes stimulated aggressive movements abroad, and sometimes checked them, the particular direction of its influence being never very certain beforehand, and indeed depending for the most part on personal judgment, if not on personal impulse.

THE CLUB TRAIN.

THE persons of frivolous habits and dangerous political prejudices who live in Clubs are to be supplied with another luxury. Trains are to be provided for their particular benefit. They are to run between London and Paris, and between the hours of 4 and 11.30 P.M. They are to consist entirely of first-class carriages, to carry a hundred and twenty passengers only, and to be replete with every comfort, in the form of dining-saloons and dressing-rooms, or rather carriages. Seats can be booked beforehand at the chief Clubs of London and Paris. The qualification sounds a little invidious. No doubt there are differences in Clubs, but it does not follow that it will be pleasant to have a railway Company deciding whether your own is or is not to be considered entitled to the adjective. Probably there will be no difficulty on this point. A railway Company must sell its tickets to whosoever offers legal tender for them, and though the traveller may book at his Club, he will not be bound to book there. The name Club Train is a good one, and will serve to distinguish a particular convenient train as well as the more poetic title of Flying Dutchman. These trains will be undoubtedly very convenient. They will go at rational hours, they will be fast, and it will be a great advantage to be rid of the necessity of buying a ticket in the station or at one of the few agencies.

These are all improvements, and are capable of further extension. Whether the liberty to book a seat beforehand will abolish hurry and scurry at the moment of starting will depend on the good sense or good luck of the traveller, as before. Even now it is quite possible to get into a train in a leisurely way. It is only necessary to reach the station in time, and secure a place. The gentleman who is so unwise or so unlucky as to come on the platform half a minute before the Club Train starts will have to look sharp if he is not to be left behind. His sticks, umbrella, and miscellaneous rattletraps will have to be shot into the carriage after him, and his luggage tossed into the van, precisely as if he were going by an ordinary slow train. Except at the beginning of the holiday seasons, the traveller has himself or his bad luck to thank for it if he has any difficulty in getting a seat in a first-class carriage comfortably. If all the hundred and twenty seats of the Club express are taken, there will assuredly be a crush and a hurry going on about it just before it starts. But there is no reason why the risk of having to face worry and crush should not be made as small as possible. It would be a most convenient thing if tickets could be bought as easily for trains as for theatres. Even as it is, nobody need buy his ticket in the station. Messrs. Cook and others are prepared to supply him in a more convenient way. The power of booking a seat by telephone or message from a Club will increase this facility very considerably. We can see no reason why the same opportunity should not be given to travellers by all trains. The Companies could lose nothing; and, as they already allow agencies to sell on their behalf, they would not need to make any change in their system or any great addition to their staff. It would simplify the process of "intraining" (the word may as well be applied to the civilian as to the soldier) if the seats were numbered like stalls, so that the passenger could go straight to his place without waiting until the guard had found one for him. By adopting the rule followed now in most churches, which treats all seats not occupied at a certain time as free seats, the Company would leave their customers a reasonable margin of liberty. There are travellers whose joy it is to secure an empty carriage. These might not like to make the journey in company when an unoccupied compartment was to be got. It seems that the Companies rely on filling all the hundred and twenty seats of their Club Trains. The calculation is perhaps a little sanguine; but the trains will, no doubt, be popular among people who are prepared to pay for comfort, and the easier they are to use the more they will be patronized. As for the other advantages promised—the dining and dressing carriages—we do not despair of seeing them supplied on many other expresses before long. A few months ago a French Company ran a train fitted in this way from Paris to Lisbon. What can be done in France, Spain, and Portugal can be done between London and Edinburgh. There are many passengers who would pay not to be compelled to rush across York Station and hurry through a meal in the refreshment-room, good as it may be. The Club Train is decidedly a move in the right direction—in the direction of treating the railway-traveller as a person entitled to every consideration and convenience for which he is prepared to pay.

MR. WILFRID BLUNT.

As we shall find nothing in the course of these remarks to say in favour of the conduct which has brought Mr. Wilfrid Blunt to Galway Gaol, we are glad to be able to commence them with an acknowledgment of the propriety of his behaviour since he has been there. It is a satisfaction to us to note the marked superiority in fortitude, dignity, and common sense which has characterized the demeanour of the English Parnellites under their sentences as compared with that of their Irish colleagues. Mr. Blunt, like Mr. Doughty before him, finds no attractions in the example of those wretched men who, after having invited the world to witness their heroic self-immolation in the cause of their country, are exclaiming against the Government which has had the barbarity to take them at their word. The only two English agitators who have suffered as yet from defying the Government in Ireland have neither of them shown Mr. O'Brien's desire to reverse Mrs. Browning's pathetic description of the factory children, and to become "martyrs by the "palm without the pang." Mr. Doughty submitted without protest to the prison rules, and Mr. Blunt has done the same. Lord Ripon, as a good Radical, is naturally scandalized to find a person of "superior position" treated exactly as scores of humbler offenders of the same kind have been treated without exciting any similar disquietude in his lordship's breast; and he has informed the public by telegraph that he regards Mr. Blunt's treatment "with "grief and surprise." Inasmuch, however, as the prisoner appears to be neither surprised nor grieved at it himself, Lord Ripon's emotions seem to be a little inappropriate to the occasion. We can only recommend him to reconsider the whole question of punishments, offences, and offenders, and to see whether there is really anything so very scandalous in subjecting an "English gentleman"—to use the honorific title, which is hardly ever out of the mouths of the professed devotees of equality—to the same punishment for law-breaking as would have been inflicted on him if he had been neither a gentleman nor English.

Having disposed of this branch of the subject—a branch of it to which, not only Lord Ripon's "grief and sur-"prise," but the astounding sycophancy of other Radical commentators on the case, has compelled us to devote some special attention—we may pass to the consideration of its merits. No one doubted, we presume, that the sentence passed upon Mr. Blunt in the Court below would be affirmed, and most people, we fancy, expected that it would be affirmed on the grounds on which it was originally pronounced. It has, however, derived additional weight of authority from the fact that Mr. Henn, in dismissing the defendant's appeal, laid particular stress on certain collateral evidence as to the animus with which Mr. Blunt's offence was committed. The County Court Judge, it would seem, was prepared to take an exceptionally indulgent view of Mr. Blunt's acts at Woodford on the 23rd of October, if they had stood alone. When informed that it would be the resident magistrate's duty to prevent the holding of the meeting, he replied, not in so many words that he would "defy "the law," but that he regarded it as his own duty to hold the meeting. Mr. Henn is perhaps a little too much impressed with a distinction which is not necessarily expressive of any difference. People of Mr. Blunt's way of thinking—if we may use that last word—have seldom any difficulty in satisfying themselves that the phrase which he avoided is really synonymous with that which he used; and we, at any rate, should be very slow to infer from such a person's expressing a determination to "do his duty" that he does not mean that he is going to defy the law. However, it is all the better, as we have said, that Mr. Henn should have taken so peculiarly favourable a view of the case, and should have even gone so far as to say that, with no other evidence before him than this, he would have been disposed to visit Mr. Blunt's proceedings at Woodford with a lighter sentence than was passed in the Court below. For this only makes it more apparent that all, and more than all, due allowance has been made for an "enthusiast "in politics who has plenty of courage, a love of notoriety, "and perhaps," adds Mr. Henn, "what I must" (and we really think he must) "call vanity, but has also an un-"balanced judgment, and allows his judgment to give way "to his political enthusiasm." The enthusiast and the cooler-headed intriguers who egged him on will have no pretence for complaining that a mere impulse of anger, "excited by the baffling of a project in the legality of which "he had an honest belief," has been harshly punished. Mr. Blunt's proceedings at Woodford on the 23rd of October should be read, the County Court Judge pointed out, by the light of his doings in the previous week. He had attended the midnight meeting of the 16th—a meeting which he knew to be illegal, as being held by a proclaimed branch of the National League; he sat by and listened without protest to the inflammatory address of Mr. O'Brien; and, equally without protest, he witnessed an act "more suggestive and more demoralizing," as the Judge justly remarked, "than any language could "have been"—namely, the burning of the Lord-Lieutenant's proclamation. We are not, as we have said, of opinion that this particular proof of Mr. Blunt's intention of defying the law on the 23rd was required; but we quite admit that, whether superfluous or not, it is conclusive. Mr. Blunt's plea of "duty" in defence of his action on that day becomes purely frivolous. A theory of duty so elastic as to have allowed him to attend a secret meeting of an illegal association cannot possibly put forward a claim, we will not say to plausibility, but even to bona fides.

It is, on the whole, too, a matter for satisfaction that the Crown relied not on the proclamation of the Woodford meeting, but simply on its illegality at common law. For an opportunity was thereby afforded for a judicial exposition of the legal doctrines applicable to a question which Gladstonians in and out of Parliament, from Sir William Harcourt downward, have done their best to confuse. The law as to unlawful assemblies is, as Mr. Henn says, clear and indisputable. "The Executive Government has not only an "inherent right, but it has a duty cast upon it which it "dare not neglect, to forbid, and, if necessary, to disperse

"by force, all public meetings which, be their purpose law-"ful or unlawful, be they addressed by speakers few or "many, it has sufficient reason to believe are likely to pro-"duce danger to the peace and tranquillity of the neigh-"bourhood. Nay, more, the law as to such meetings is "so jealous and imperative that it says magistrates are "criminally negligent in not putting down such meetings, "and they are liable to prosecution for their neglect." As to the sufficiency of the reasons on which the LORD-LIEUTENANT acted, no sort of doubt can, as the Judge pointed out, be entertained. The district in which this meeting was convened by Mr. BLUNT and his friends was a district in which the National League had been proclaimed as a dangerous association, and public attention had thereby been called to the fact that it contained within its limits a body whose words and actions were a standing menace to law and order. But, further, it is to be remembered that after the proclamation had been issued—and, indeed, only two or three days before notice was given of the intended meeting—there had been violent resistance to the execution of the QUEEN'S writ, and the public peace had not only been endangered but violently broken. Nay more, in the very place in which the meeting had been invited to assemble, there had been held only seven days before a meeting of an indisputably unlawful character, at which the people had been openly urged to resist the law, and the Proclamation of the QUEEN'S representative in Ireland had been burnt in the presence of the assembled crowd, in ostentatious defiance of the Viceregal authority. If these are not grounds enough to justify the Executive in holding that Mr. BLUNT'S meeting was likely to endanger the public peace, and in resolving to prohibit it, we are at a loss to know on what grounds such an opinion could ever be reasonably formed or such a resolution legitimately taken. That Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE dissents from this view and holds, as he has since publicly declared, that the demonstration ought to have been allowed, is interesting as showing the length to which partisanship may urge an ex-Minister of the Crown; but it has no other relevance whatever. The decision of such a question rests with the Government for the time being, and not with their predecessors in office; and we confess to being very glad that it does not rest with a man who has permitted himself to express something very like a regret that a particular Irish landlord should live "beyond the reach of the "prayers or the threats" of his tenants. Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE is mistaken if he supposes that his right to revise and morally overrule the decisions of the Executive on matters of this kind will be acknowledged. The public are able by this time to form a pretty good idea of the latitude which Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues would allow the Irish agitation if they had their way, as well as of the motives which guide them to their estimate. And the public, unless we greatly mistake, are disposed to prefer the judgment of the constituted authorities in Ireland.

THE CONSULAR QUARREL AT FLORENCE.

THE unexpectedly lively dispute between France and Italy which has arisen over the rough usage of the French Consulate at Florence is an outward and visible sign of the little love these old allies now bear one another. It is particularly appropriate, also, that the quarrel should have arisen indirectly out of the French occupation of Tunis. A certain Tunisian, General HOUSSEIN PASHA by name, died at Florence, and left his fortune to his master the BEY, doubtless from motives of gratitude to the ruler who had allowed him to collect the money in the usual Oriental way. If the General had, further, any malicious intention of making trouble between the European Power which is so kindly protecting Tunis and the Power which would so dearly have liked to do the same thing, he has succeeded. As he was a protected French subject, his papers were taken charge of and sealed by the French consular officer in the town. A person representing himself to be the late General's executor came forward and claimed the papers. The French representative refused to deliver them. Thereupon EL MELECH, the executor, applied to the Italian Court, and obtained an order for their delivery. This order was enforced, and so the French flag was insulted, and so a little international question arose. International law and usages are somewhat vague things, and it is by no means certain that the Italian magistrate was technically altogether in the wrong. A Consul is not an Ambassador or Minister Plenipotentiary, and his office has never been considered to possess the sanctity of an Embassy. It is in the last degree doubtful whether the High Court of Justice, Admiralty, Probate, and Divorce Division, would allow the French Consul in Newcastle to put obstacles in the way of the probate of the will of a Tunisian who died leaving property in England. The Italian magistrate, though he had a case, seems to have spoilt it by making too much of it. He was rude and peremptory, and perhaps jumped at the chance of snubbing an official representative of France. Perhaps, too, it gave him a wicked pleasure to act in this offensive way on behalf of a Tunisian. In any case, he gave the French Government an excuse for considering itself insulted—of which it has proceeded to make the most.

If the two Governments were really friendly, an incident of this kind would have no importance whatever. Somebody in uniform would wait on the French official and would tell him how sorry his Majesty King HUMBERT was that the magistrate had been so unmannerly. The magistrate would be removed to a place where there would be no Consul to annoy, and nothing more would be said about this unfortunate incident. But the Governments are not friendly. Both have a good deal to remember, and do so with tenacity. So the Italians wish to give as little as possible, and the French to extort as much as they can. Signor CRISPI has expressed the regret of his Government, and has instructed General MENABREA to promise that the magistrate shall be removed to another post. This, however, will not satisfy M. FLOURENS. He insists that the magistrate must be dismissed, and that Italy must make an abject national apology because a legal official was guilty of an error of judgment. Signor CRISPI refuses, and it is not necessary to believe the tittle-tattle of newspaper correspondents who have discovered that his refusal is due to his anger at a disgraceful personal attack on himself in a Parisian paper which trades on fashionable "clericalism" and scandal. The Italian Premier knows that his countrymen are at present very touchy about their national dignity. This knowledge is of itself enough to make him resolute in refusing to comply with demands which would never be presented unless there were a desire on the part of the French to inflict an affront on Italy. The unwisdom of making the most of such a trumpery matter at a time when Italy is already sufficiently predisposed to tighten her alliance with Germany is in perfect keeping with the recent foreign policy of France. The argument that M. FLOURENS is, in fact, defending the consular inviolability of all nations is worth precisely nothing. Signor CRISPI has offered a reasonable apology, and what he refuses to do is to grovel because a stipendiary magistrate committed an error of judgment. In refusing he is taking a course which is both dignified and, having regard to his interests, rational. The French Government will probably find that they have in reality strengthened his position by giving him the right to say that he is defending the dignity of Italy. If, as seems almost certain, he perseveres in his refusal, the French will find that they have to choose between letting their claim drop, or taking very serious measures from which they will certainly shrink. In that case they will have turned what might have been a victory—one not worth winning, indeed, but a victory none the less—into a most unequivocal defeat.

ACTOR AND AUTHOR.

WITHIN the last few days two men have been taken into the past whose lives and fortunes, diverse and widely sundered as they were, have yet some common elements. One was Mr. CHIPPENDALE, the doyen of English actors; the other was the novelist and dramatist, M. AUGUSTE MAQUET. Both were survivals of the great Romantic age; each was born with the first years of the century, and while each achieved a certain eminence in his art, it may not unjustly be held that each derived the larger part of his fame from his association with greater and stronger men.

This, it may at once be admitted, was far less the case of the Englishman than of the other (who, by the way, was some ten or a dozen years his junior). He was eighty-seven years old. Before he was ten he had played to the KEMBLES, and at eighteen he took to the stage for good and all. He was a good while in the provinces with one or other of the old stock companies, the disappearance of which has deprived us of our only school of acting; he was for close on seventeen years a leading actor in New York and elsewhere in the United States; on his return to England he went on at the Haymarket, and established a reputation as the best classic "old man" on the stage; he appeared in 1878 at the Lyceum, and played POLONIUS to Mr. IRVING'S Prince, as he had played it to the HAMLETS of CHARLES KEMBLE, YOUNG, MACREADY, FORREST, EDMUND KEAN, and half a dozen famous players besides. But stage triumphs are the vainest of all; and as CHIPPENDALE, however accomplished and intelligent, was never great, such successes as he achieved, being scarce of the type that lives in history or becomes a part of tradition, were fleeting and visionary even for their kind. His parts were not heroic, and his achievement was not always commensurate with his opportunities. The mind is still capable of being exercised as to the points that distinguished MOLIÈRE'S ARNOLPHE, for instance, or GARRICK'S Lord OGLEBY, or the Sir PETER of FARREN and of KING; but the quality of CHIPPENDALE'S GRIPEWELL and the effect of his Commissioner COLEPEPPER—these are matters for speculation no more. We know that they were sound in conception, and in execution finished and exemplary; and beyond that we are not concerned with them. The fire of genius was lacking. They were models, but they suggested nothing either novel or immortal. They were the best of their kind, not so much in virtue of their own surpassing merit as in the absence of anything better. They will be remembered as respectable in themselves, and as the work of one devoted to the practice of an art in which he spent full sixty years of a life laborious beyond the common, and beyond the common vigorous and long. For the rest, it must be admitted that the romance of CHIPPENDALE'S career —that poetry of incident which touches the imagination—is confined to the fact that his first HAMLET was EDMUND KEAN and his last Mr. HENRY IRVING; and that, while yet a lad, he not only played with the KEMBLES, but served as a printer's devil in BALLANTYNE'S office, and went back and forward with the proofs of Waverley for the Great Unknown.

MAQUET, who was born in 1813, was the AUGUSTUS MACKEAT of a society—"Terreur du bourgeois glabre et "chauve"—which included not only THÉOPHILE GAUTIER and GÉRARD DE NERVAL, but the renowned lycanthrope, PÉTRUS BOREL; the engraver CÉLESTIN NANTEUIL, the original "jeune homme moyen-âge"; the noble BOUCHARDY, poet of Le Sonneur de Saint-Paul; and the ingenious but ineffectual PHILOTHÉE O'NEDDY. He belongs, in a word, to the second generation of the Romantiques, and by birth and early association is one of the most distinguished of the brood. It was not long, however, ere he fell under the direct influence of ALEXANDRE DUMAS, and in that enormous force his own identity, which was sound and solid rather than brilliant and taking, was instantly merged and lost. The most capable and trustworthy of this PROSPERO'S many ARIELS, he was associated with him in the production of the Valois and Mousquetaires cycles, of the excellent Bâtard de Mauléon, of Balsamo and the Collier de la Reine, of Ingénue and the Tulipe Noire, of Olympe de Clèves (in some ways the most extraordinary of all), of Monte-Cristo and La Fille du Régent and the Chevalier d'Harmental, and of such famous dramas as were contrived therefrom. The partnership lasted until 1851, when the two associates went to law. It was decided that MAQUET'S claims to a share in DUMAS'S achievement had some foundation in fact; and this much recognized, he set up again in business for himself. But, like everybody else absorbed in ALEXANDER MAXIMUS, MAQUET alone was LABIENUS without CÆSAR. His successes—La Maison du Baigneur, La Belle Gabrielle, and such like—had little to recall the brave days of Bragelonne and Monte-Cristo. It was seen that MAQUET was irresistible only as an expression of DUMAS, and that in puris (as it were) he was not more than sound, skilful, and second-rate. The truth is, of course, that, as ABOUT showed, the two men began to work by talking things over; that MAQUET then went out and prepared a first draft; and that this draft was by the Superior Fiend rewritten and sent to press. The method of procedure was not, we know, invariable; even in the best and brightest of the DUMAS novels there is a great deal that MAQUET may well have done alone, and which, in all probability, was dispatched to the printers exactly as he left it. But the hand of his great associate is scarce less recognizable than SHAKSPEARE'S; and the conclusion is inevitable that when it is felt, then, and then only, is MAQUET a man of genius and a great artist.

It is pleasant to know that after their difference the two friends were reconciled, and that MAQUET always spoke of his old chief in terms of mingled reverence and affection. It is said that he had, these some years past, been engaged in writing his memoirs; and it is greatly to be hoped that the rumour is not too good to be true, but that the book, or as much of it as exists, will presently be with us.

SOME NAVAL MATTERS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON'S assurance given at Teddington that the Admiralty has no intention of diminishing the effective strength of the navy does not of itself inspire much confidence. The FIRST LORD has done not a little to entitle himself to be believed on his word; but still, even from him, an official declaration of this stamp is not in itself equivalent to proof that the effective strength of the navy will not be diminished. It is a little too much a matter of course. There have been First Lords many, and of various kinds; but there never was a First Lord yet who has been known to declare publicly that the effective strength of the navy was to be diminished. One and all they have been sure that it was to be increased, or, at the lowest, maintained. Even the Minister who asserted that there was no ground for anxiety, because this country had a reserve of three line-of-battle ships at Portsmouth to meet any coalition, would have used the same phrase as Lord GEORGE HAMILTON. Before long the FIRST LORD will have an opportunity of explaining what has actually been done, or is in doing, and he has promised to show how the recent reorganizations (for there have been several of them) have worked for economy and efficiency. The explanation will be interesting; for, looking at it as a mere matter of ordinary calculation, it is not very obvious that retiring some officials on pensions, to do nothing, and appointing new officials with handsome salaries, necessarily leads to the saving of money, and in practice that is too often what reorganization means with us. The Trafalgar was certainly brought to the launching-point rapidly, and therefore cheaply, but as a set-off against this feat must be put the fact that Portsmouth Dockyard was threatened with, if not severely attacked by, a famine of work. When the Admiralty does do a good stroke of quick building it ought not to be denied its proper allowance of praise, but the department has caused so many disappointments that it is not to be lightly credited with having shaken off its old bad habits.

When the FIRST LORD presents his estimates, he is, it is said, to show what has been done by the new "Naval "Intelligence Department," not only to collect information, but to organize the navy in preparation for war. Whether the Admiralty will be more frank than the War Office has been about the famous and invisible plan for the fortification of the coaling-stations, we shall not presume to guess. In the meantime, the Intelligence Department has been justifying its extension busily, not only by collecting information, but by "the framing of plans for naval cam-"paigns suitable for each station, in the event of war with any given Power." The writer's confidence that more work is being done because more officers have been appointed will not be universally shared. A tolerably extensive experience goes to show that more work does not always follow the appointment of more officers. Neither are we at all persuaded that many men or much trouble are needed to learn all that is to be learnt about the number, size, or even the speed and construction of foreign steamers, the common routes of commerce, the position of fortifications and of submarine cables. The lists of insurance Companies are full of information about some of these subjects. Nothing is better known than the course of ocean commerce, and every map which has any pretension to be good marks the submarine cables. As for the making of plans of naval campaigns suitable for all emergencies, we hope that, if the Naval Intelligence Department has been occupied in doing any such thing, it will be considered to have worked for its own amusement. Nothing has ever been proved by a more universal experience than that the most fatal of all ways of making war is to make it on cut-and-dried plans prepared beforehand and by officers not upon the spot. NAPOLEON himself tried to direct operations in Spain from Paris, greatly to the convenience of the Duke of WELLINGTON; and what the EMPEROR could not do profitably will not be done successfully by the Naval Intelligence Department. Probably Captain HALL and his colleagues have not been spinning cobwebs for the confusion of admirals, but have only been considering what force will be needed on the various stations, and where it must be sent to enable the responsible commander to act with the best effect. This is a quite different and most necessary kind of work. If this is what the Naval Intelligence Department has been doing, it has been very well employed, and has been doing at least what ought to have been done long before. A very similar and equally useful task has been performed by the second or Mobilization Section—it is said. The officials of this branch have been inquiring and noting where the stores, ships, and men sure to be needed to reinforce the navy in time of war may be met with in case of need. They have communicated with the retired officers, many of them men still capable of years of service and of unquestioned fitness, who have been squeezed or bribed out of the service in order to keep up the flow of promotion, and have learnt how far they could be counted on in case of need. When it is remembered that the list of lieutenants is barely sufficient for the current service in peace time, and would require to be largely reinforced on the outbreak of war, it will be seen that there is need to organize this reserve. If it has been got in order by the Naval Intelligence Department, this branch of the Admiralty has certainly justified its existence, though there is no admiral at the head of it, to the grief and distress of Sir G. Phipps Hornby.

A piece of naval intelligence which it has been found impossible to mark confidential has been published in the form of a Parliamentary paper, and is as instructive as anything the Admiralty can possibly have stored in its pigeon-holes. It is the history of the flotilla of torpedo-boats which went on a cruise down Channel last May. Twenty-four torpedo-boats went on a cruise, and their history might almost be told in the style of the nigger epic. In the course of three weeks there were twenty-seven casualties to twenty-four boats. The thing could hardly have been more complete. It is certainly fair to note that the number twenty-seven is made up because four of the vessels contributed two accidents each, and also that two were disabled by a collision, which was properly one accident. But allowing for the collision, and deducting a stranding, which was an old-fashioned misfortune, and omitting very trifling accidents, though one of them would be enough to paralyse a boat in action, it appears that more than half of the torpedo-boats—the craft, be it noted, which are to sweep the seas in future wars—were disabled in a few days of peaceful cruising by internal defects. A very few examples will show what happened to them:—No. 41. "Machinery broke down, due to fusing of crank brasses, "and wire cable broken." No. 42. "Machinery disabled; "main feed-valve leaked badly; had to draw fires." Both these accidents, and six others with them, happened on the 10th of May. No. 44. On the 6th of May "Joint of feed-pipe blew out; towed back to anchorage, and repaired during "the day." On the 9th, "Auxiliary steam-pipe burst," whence it follows that on the 10th she had to be left behind. No. 47. "On the 10th boiler furnace crown came down; "engine-room and stokehold staff scalded; three subsequently died. Accident caused by deficiency of water in "the boiler." One entry is almost worthy of Happy Thoughts. No. 31. "Tubes defective; unable to proceed. "Afterwards found to be a mistake. Valve in stokehold "turned wrong way." But if the valve in stokehold had been turned wrong way when the torpedo boat ought to have started to attack an ironclad, how long would she have escaped the machine guns? The repairs of the damaged boats cost in round numbers eleven hundred pounds, without counting the smaller defects. Nothing in the long history of torpedo-boat failures shows more convincingly that these vessels are still painfully delicate for the rough work of war. Under the heavy strain of the real thing their crank brasses would always be fusing and the tops of their feed-pipes blowing off. As for the turning of the valve in the stokehold the wrong way, that is just the kind of mistake most likely to happen in the excitement of preparation. There is nothing to show as yet that the torpedo-boat has killed the battle-ship.

LITERARY STURDY BEGGARS.

In the daily and hourly hunt for "copy," a class of literary and journalistic mendicants has been evolved. It is not given to every one to observe, to narrate, to invent, to make researches, nor even to compile. But every one who is provided with the cheap materials of pen, ink, and paper, and the still cheaper quality of impudence, can now go copy-cadging. He or she merely takes his pen, sits down quickly, and sends a lot of impertinent questions to persons whom he does not know, but whom most people have heard of. The answers of the victims to these questions make the desired copy. They are welcomed as "palpitating with "actuality." "Do you shed real tears on the stage?" "What rouge do you prefer?" "Is porter your favourite "beverage, and if not, why not?" These are the sorts of questions that the copy-cadger likes to put. In the new number of an American magazine there is a quantity of material obtained by this ready and simple device. The stuff is called "The Preferences of our Opera Singers," but, it must be allowed, has nothing in it to cause a blush. The "preferences" are not the love of the moth for the star, of the soprano for the tenor, but a list of the songs which singers like best to sing. The "writer," as the collector of these confessions has the easy confidence to style himself, "secured a series of letters from the lead-"ing artists of the operatic stage regarding their personal "preferences for the music they have occasion to sing." Does this kind of bore never think of the trouble he gives his victims? Every human being whose name is occasionally printed finds his breakfast-table littered, every morning, with notes from curious impertinents. "Excuse the liberty "I take in asking whether you divide your hair down the "middle? I am engaged on a volume of literary statistics "to prove the connexion between different forms of genius "and different habits of dressing the hair. If you are "totally bald, please say on what side hair (when any) was "divided. A photograph will greatly oblige." This is a very common kind of petition; so is the request to know what three books you consider the most valuable to a young man who has not time to read. A Scotch professor, noted for his modesty, is reported to have said that Shakspeare, the Bible, and some little thing of his own, were all that un jeune homme pressé would need in the battle of life. But few persons carry diffidence so far as this. Other idiots want to know whether the victim smokes when he is working, whether he is a devotee of total abstinence, and so forth, endlessly. The answers are published, and the anxious inquirer makes money out of the wasted time and temper of his fellow-creatures.

Why do the fellow-creatures answer at all? it may be asked. For no very good reason. Partly, they are good-natured, and do not care to say "No!" Partly, they are vain, and want to advertise themselves. Partly, they are timid, and know that the catechist may do them a bad turn in some journal of the gutter and the chapel.

We have become such a backboneless people that nobody can do what he thinks fit for himself without the backing of a Society or a League. Perhaps the Irresponsive Society might be founded to comfort and abet people pestered by literary sturdy beggars. The members of the Society will simply bind themselves by a solemn oath (like the oaths people take in romance) to answer no letters from curious strangers, to send no autographs, to give no photographs. The motto will be "No Americans need apply," and this prohibition will include all schoolgirls, inquiring young men, provincial mythologists, and bores in general. Mere isolated resistance, here and there, does not discourage these persistent nuisances. If nobody ever answered their questions, they would cease to trouble.

THE FRENCH PROFESSORS.

There is something peculiarly English in asking a number of French teachers to Cambridge, and then giving them a lecture on the study of their own language. Cardinal Newman once accused English Protestants of thinking that they could teach the Pope his own religion, and perhaps it was only a proper chastisement of national pride when Lord Palmerston or Lord Russell received from Prince Albert some hints on the principles of the English Constitution. The American girl who was told by a well-meaning friend that there were some things with which mothers must be better acquainted than their daughters, replied energetically, "You may cut me into "thirty thousand triangles if there is anything I don't "know better than Ma," and this ultra-British spirit is not quite extinct even in the old country. Nothing could be further from our purpose than to say anything disrespectful of Professor SEELEY, whose modesty is equal to his learning, and who never dismisses the historical claims of GIBBON or MACAULAY without a complimentary word. Moreover, as Mr. SEELEY's remarks were "frequently interrupted by "applause," it may be assumed, with all due allowance for French politeness, that the teachers liked it. Much of what Mr. SEELEY said was smart, and a good deal of it was true. It is impossible to read any treatise on education (no; we will not stop there) without being reminded of Dr. JOHNSON's simile of the breeches, and his retort, "Sir, while you are debating which of two "subjects to teach your child, your neighbour's child "will have learnt both." Still the old "Battle of the "Books," the rivalry, or supposed rivalry, between the Ancients and the Moderns, is always being fought over and over again. Mr. SEELEY may be congratulated on having found something to say about it which, if not exactly new, was freshly put. It is useless to aim in this so-called nineteenth century at more than a spurious originality in educational science. The recently published Essays of the late Mr. THRING, for many years Head-master of Uppingham, prove how difficult it is to attain even that end. Mr. SEELEY turned with some ferocity upon "the classicists," to whom he attributed "a spirit of blind, "unreasoning conservatism, such as in politics has died out "since the time of Lord ELDON." If a "classicist" in this connexion means a man who thinks that nothing but Latin and Greek ought to be taught in public schools, then, whatever may be his resemblance to Lord ELDON, he is certainly very like a fool. But we have never met with such a person, and we believe him to be mythical. A former Head-master of Eton, who still lives to lament the utilitarian tendencies of the age, expressed the eccentric opinion that French is no part of a gentleman's education. If Dr. BALSTON only meant that a man might be ignorant of French without being wholly illiterate, he said no more than the truth. Indeed, if the contrary doctrine were generally accepted, a great many people who carry their heads pretty high would have to lower them considerably.

Professor SEELEY adopts from the Master of Balliol the sensible, if not very startling, suggestion that French may be taken as an aid to Latin. The reason why "prac- "tical" Englishmen are so particularly set upon having their sons taught languages just now is not, we fear, love of literature or zeal for knowledge. It is simply the fear of commercial defeat at the hands of more accomplished nations. England is not really being beaten by other countries in the markets of the world, as any one can see for himself by studying the official statistics. The danger is of a different kind. If we do not care to "fight the "battle of life with the German waiter," as Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD puts it in one of his numerous apologies for indolence, we shall go down under the heel, which it is cold comfort to call the hoof, of the German clerk. Mr. SEELEY justly, if not very profoundly, observes that modern languages have a literature as well as ancient, and that French literature is better worth reading than Latin. Here be truths, if not truisms. But we are afraid that Professor SEELEY misunderstands the nature of the change which has set in against an exclusively classical training. There is, of course, no necessary relation between commerce and the living tongues of the Continent which separates them from the humane culture of Latin and Greek. There is none, but there is supposed to be some; and hence the suspiciously sudden enthusiasm for studies which used to be neglected. Regard for the main chance will carry the day, and give additional employment to the French teachers, not Mr. SEELEY's eloquent appeals to the beauties of GOETHE and VICTOR HUGO. We have never been the worst linguists in the world, for the French have always been worse than ourselves. But Mr. SEELEY has only too much ground for his caustic observation that most Englishmen learn enough Greek and Latin to make them ashamed of reading POPE's Iliad or DRYDEN's Æneid, not enough to make them capable of reading HOMER or VIRGIL. On the other hand, M. PETILLEAU's two pupils, one of whom had learnt French from "a Dutch lady who also looked after the linen," and the other from a drill-sergeant who acquired it in the Crimean War, would have made a poor figure with RACINE or MOLIÈRE. Perhaps the most surprising statement made during the proceedings was Dr. BELJAMBE's assertion that half the students at the Sorbonne now learn English. This, although Dr. BELJAMBE was too modest himself to say anything about it, is mainly due to his own influence and exertions.

THE SCHOOL FOR DETECTIVES.

FROM time to time of late the public have been alternately amused or alarmed by the new part assumed by the newspapers that under cover of "revelations" or important and mysterious "information" claim an odd sort of alliance with the detective force. Sometimes it is a person who ought to know who communicates the latest movements and intentions of a suspected dynamitard. Or a notorious miscreant comes over sea, or a supposed murderer is in hiding, or some one "wanted" is somewhere about, and the journals, with marvellous good will, do all in their power to make them comfortable and strike a panic in the public. Not much harm is done, perhaps, by this benevolence, and it suggests an excellent antidote. There is much, indeed, that is highly ludicrous in this scheme of police assistance. Conscientiously practised, we might soon see the end of it. It seems you must follow the pleasant rule of Captain REECE in dealing with suspected evildoers, be they of riotous inclinations or pestilent plotters against the QUEEN's peace. Let your forethought be of the best, your wiles of the finest quality, your plan of action such as combines the astuteness of FOUCHÉ with the alertness of VIDOCQ, full and explicit must be the publication of your intentions. Thus only can results merit the approval of a tender conscience. The absurdity of the method was prettily illustrated by the Standard this week. According to the candid, but singularly indiscreet, reporter of that j urnal, they seem to have been playing at detectives in the island of Lewis quite in the spirit of Mr. ANSTEY's diverting schoolboy story about Indians and Pale-faces. The happy thought occurred to some one to operate against the lawless raiders of Lewis with a force of disguised Highlanders, fellows gifted in the vernacular and irreproachably clad in tourist's suits.

No expense was spared to make the snaring of the guileless natives complete. The tourist clan seems to have been properly coached, and humorously inclined to the venture. Whence they came they knew not, and of their destination they were no blabbers. Then the Standard goes and spoils the game, eager to play the ignoble part of "informer," and by its inopportune disclosure breaks the heart of the inventor, not to mention the silence of the seas among the furthest Hebrides. It may be asked what are these precautions worth when thus boldly advertised. Their objects, if not judicious, are plain enough. Tourists do not abound in the Western Isles in mid-winter. The island of Lewis is not particularly favourable to playing the detective in an amiable and amateur fashion. There is little cover but what the native mist affords for the observation of a disguised Highlander, and the population inherit a primitive suspicion of the stranger. Foreign faces and garb make men marked in an incredibly brief space of time. Even the little body of first class passengers, endowed though they be with Gaelic speech, possibly second class, possess small chance of surprising the fomentors or leaders among the raiders. As to "throwing off suspicion," as the Standard puts it, they had better throw off their tweeds, and devise some new form of "special duty." With the Standard as an ally, the lawless in Lewis have nothing to fear from the Chief Constable of Lanarkshire and his sham tourists.

The burlesque example supplied by the Standard does not make us unmindful that there is a serious aspect of the question. Happily the mischief effected by enterprizing reporters, special commissioners, and other wondrous products of the modern press, is chiefly confined to the temporary perturbation of the public mind. Occasionally it becomes really alarming, and is the source of widespread panic among the credulous, as when dynamite projects abound and interviews are cheaply obtained. Perhaps people like being frightened, as it is notorious that they enjoy being cheated. Otherwise it is difficult to account for the practice of newspapers who are never tired of proclaiming their desire to serve the public. Their services to the public are certainly of a curiously inconsiderate kind. One might imagine their readers to comprise nervous old ladies, for the most part, who subsist, as the nervous often will, chiefly on Gothic romances and the milder joys of GABORIAU. As to the aid they render to Scotland Yard, by being a terror to evildoers, showing them what to avoid and where to abide, Scotland Yard is probably sufficiently sensible and grateful. But it is an exquisite assumption that the detective force needs auxiliary instruction, and has forgotten its ancient skill in constructing blinds, saps, springes, and other resources of a venerable profession. Yet this is precisely what is suggested by the reports and comments of our newspapers whenever a mysterious case arises. So highly do they rate their information, on the one hand, and their extra-professional assistance, on the other, it rarely occurs to them that Scotland Yard confides just as many "secrets" as it deems judicious, "mere cobweb lawn, light. thin, good enough to "catch flies withal." Perhaps it may speedily appear that "private information" reported falsely of Commander M'Hartley and his men "dressed in disguise," and they remain in their station in the mainland as firmly rooted as the oaks of Dunsinane.

ODIUM GRIMTHORPIANUM.

It is a pleasure to be abused by Lord Grimthorpe, because his abuse, though too common to be an honour, is always innocuous, and sometimes entertaining. To have "whipped all creation" in what Lord Grimthorpe calls "folly," and the poor creatures who do not agree with him call common sense, is a feat of which we have some reason to be proud. If Lord Grimthorpe had bestowed upon the study of logic some of the time which he has wasted in the perusal of homœopathic pamphlets, he would be aware that to compare two things for one purpose is not to identify them for all purposes. We did not assert that the "law of similars" was as demonstrably false as the law of gravitation is demonstrably true, though we have Mr. Darwin's authority for saying that even Newton's discovery is no more than the only hypothesis which explains all the phenomena. What we asserted, and what we repeat, is that a proposition of which the falsity is assumed in every medical book not written by a homœopathist, and every medical practitioner not a homœopathist himself, is one which it would be superfluous for the College of Physicians formally to condemn. To Lord Grimthorpe's charge of "impudence" we can only reply that there can be no more consummate judge of the article than the gentleman who, with so little knowledge and so much assurance, calumniates the most beneficent of all professions. The phrase "notorious falsehood," which Lord Grimthorpe, with characteristic courtesy, applies to this Review, is only employed or retorted (out of politics) by controversialists who have parted with their self-respect. The statements made in the article to which Lord Grimthorpe refers were, without exception, true, and for the most part, we fear, notorious truths. But Lord Grimthorpe has abundantly proved by his recent letters to the Times that truth may be very notorious indeed without his being acquainted with it. Homœopathists do complain that allopathists will not meet them in consultation, and although Lord Grimthorpe has seized the opportunity to pour the fallacies with which he has been crammed upon an unoffending public—that is, in homely language, how the fight began. Non-medical newspapers are very unfit arenas for an exhaustive discussion of the gospel according to Hahnemann and the efficacy of infinitesimal doses, though the latter expression must strike even laymen as something very like a contradiction in terms. The doctors were put upon their defence in the Times for refusing to recognize homœopathists, and they have naturally defended themselves to the best of their very great ability.

We said last week that the particular circumstances of Mr. Millican's case were not of much public interest, nor are they. Mr. Millican succeeded in his action, not because the hospital he attended was bound to retain a doctor who also visited an infirmary where homœopathy is practised, but because he was, in Mr. Justice Manisty's opinion, irregularly and unfairly dismissed. Of course the question whether medical men who disbelieve in homœopathy ought to act professionally with homœopathists is of very great public interest indeed, and as such we have discussed it. Mr. Millican, who writes with good taste and moderation, may perhaps see reason to regret the dangerous alliance of Lord Grimthorpe. For Lord Grimthorpe has evidently found the original subject far too dull and impersonal to suit his taste. Leaving the debatable ground of possible merit in homœopathy, or in homœopathists who sit loose to their principles, he has made a ludicrously violent attack upon doctors as a class, in which his tendency to call a spade a particularly unpleasant kind of shovel finds ample scope. In this torrent of incoherent invective only infinitesimal doses of reasoning have been found, and they are lost in the flood. But what can be expected of a man who cites vaccination as an instance of "cure by similars," when he must know that, in the first place, vaccination does not produce small-pox, and, in the second place, does not cure it? Lord Grimthorpe quotes a number of sayings, apparently collected from some anti-medical tract, in which more or less eminent doctors, no longer here to speak for themselves, are represented as having expressed their disbelief in medical science; and their conviction that pathology was "all non-"sense." If these men used the language attributed to them, and if they used it seriously, they were conscious and deliberate impostors, upon whose statements no reliance whatever can be placed. But everybody is not always in quite such deadly earnest, or, we may add, in quite such a towering rage, as the ever-solemn, ever-irascible Lord Grimthorpe.

THE POLITICAL PROSPECT.

Lord Salisbury's second speech at Liverpool was directed, unlike its predecessor, to a considerable variety of topics, and its uniformly encouraging tone is all the more welcome on that account. From Ireland, to which the former speech was principally confined, it was already known that the Prime Minister's report must be a favourable one. The English public have been able to see for themselves that the firm policy of the Government is rapidly transforming the Irish situation. They were fully prepared, therefore, for Lord Salisbury's hopeful references to that subject in his first speech, and his still more emphatic assurance that the determination of the Executive to reassert the authority of the law is having its effect upon the disaffected elements of the Irish population, and that "they "are learning the one lesson which it is essential that they "should learn—namely, that the will of Great Britain "cannot be shaken." The Prime Minister, however, was able to present to his hearers a no less cheering forecast of the future in other directions. There have been so many "false alarms" of a revival of trade that he, no doubt, does well to speak with caution on this subject; but it is much to be able to say that we have never before "had grounds so solid or so universal a consensus of "opinion from all branches of trade and commerce as now "sustains us in the happy conviction that the night is "over, and the dawn of a new prosperity is near." Whether one touch of the magic wand of prosperity will charm away so many of our political difficulties as Lord Salisbury anticipates is perhaps doubtful, although upon some of them, we dare say, its effects may be instantaneous. It will very likely kill the business of Socialist agitation out of hand, and it may be as promptly fatal to the less subversive, but equally misguided, movement in favour of Protection. As regards Ireland, however, Lord Salisbury himself suggests reasons why a revival of prosperity should produce a less immediately satisfactory effect. Principles have suffered in that country, during the last twelve years, as they have not here. Rights of property have been unsettled and capital expelled by legislation, and we cannot now expect that a mere recovery of trade will restore the status quo. The healing of a wound does not mean health to a patient when its ignorant treatment has sown the seeds of a deeper and more diffused malady in his frame.

On the prospects abroad Lord Salisbury had also reassuring words to say; and, if they did not quite strike the note of confidence which we should all like to have heard, they are, at any rate, much more hopeful than those of the foreign press in general, as the speaker's opportunities of information and immunity from misleading influences are greater than those of the average newspaper Correspondent. Lord Salisbury does not deny that confidence has been shaken by the course of recent events abroad; but he is nevertheless able to say that, as far as he can judge, matters are rather better than they were when he last spoke. In a period of such doubt, with so many elements of uncertainty, with such gigantic issues dependent sometimes on the movement of individual brains, sometimes on the uncertain manifestation of national and popular feeling, the Prime Minister naturally hesitates to increase the confidence of his tone. "But, at all events," he proceeded, "for the moment we have peace; for the immediate future "we have peace. Let us be thankful for that; and when "I see, as I see more and more, Sovereigns and Ministers "devoting, as far as I can judge, every energy in their "power to the maintenance of peace, I cannot refuse to "entertain the hope that peace will be ultimately main-"tained." Of course it is one thing not to despair—which is all that "not refusing to entertain a hope" amounts to—and quite another to hope with confidence, or with some approach to confidence, in not being doomed to disappointment; and it is no doubt much to be wished that Lord SALISBURY could have seen his way to the adoption of some phrase of the latter kind. But his language, as we have said, must be compared, not with that of an ideal optimism, but with the actual and very prevalent pessimism which characterizes the speculations of outsiders. The results of such a comparison are, to our mind, sufficiently reassuring.

Even more satisfactory, however, was Lord SALISBURY'S prospective survey of our own political future. It is true that he deemed it right to commence his remarks on this subject by cautioning his hearers against the natural tendency of mankind to desire to eat its cake and have it. But as regards the particular instance to which he applied it we are fully persuaded that the warning is unneeded, and that the Unionist party of both political shades throughout the country have thoroughly grasped the necessity of mutual compromise for the insurance of the great end which they have jointly in view. They are already quite disposed to recognize the fact that the Government rests on the support, "not of a coalition, but of an alliance." And they will not "wonder" or blame the Government if to a certain extent the colour of the convictions of the Unionist-Liberals joins with the colour of the convictions of the Conservative party in determining the hue of the measures that are presented to Parliament. Liberals and Conservatives throughout the country should and would be prepared, for the sake of the Union, to accept this blending of the two colours, even if they stood in more pronounced contrast to each other than they do. But, as a matter of fact, the sacrifice of individual preferences which such a compromise will exact from either party is not likely to be very serious. The shade of Liberalism represented by Lord HARTINGTON, to whose supremely disinterested character Lord SALISBURY paid a well-deserved compliment, is not very far removed from Conservatism of the type principally represented in the Cabinet. Neither party will have to concede much to the other, or not, at all events, on any question which the allies will allow to be raised until after the safety of the Union is absolutely assured; it would be strange if, under these circumstances, they should fail to maintain a steady accord on the general principles of whatever legislation the Government may determine to introduce. Lord SALISBURY, however, took occasion to refer to the possibility of difficulties arising in this direction, and he did so in what appears to us to be language pregnant with significance. He spoke of the "peculiar constitution of the present House of Commons"—that is to say, the composition as determined by the necessity of a constant alliance between two normally opposing parties for a particular object—and he went on to consider the effect of this condition of things with regard to what he called "our power to carry into legislation "all the portions of the measures we may propose." Now, as to this, though it is the fixed maxim of the British Constitution that when the House of Commons expresses distinctly its want of confidence in the Government, that Government should either resign or advise a dissolution, yet "there are a number of other matters on "which the Constitutional tradition is not precise, and "in which it depends on the determination of the Min-"isters of the day whether they will regard the vote as "a vote of want of confidence or not; and whether "they regard the vote as a want of confidence or not "must depend very much on whether they regard it as "a matter of public interest that they should appeal to "the electors or not." The intention of this it is impossible, it seems to us, to mistake. It is designed to convey a gentle hint to the strategists of the Opposition that it will be quite a mistake for them to suppose that, if they can succeed, not in defeating a Ministerial Bill on its main principle, but in merely compelling the abandonment or modification of some of its provisions, they will thereby achieve their much desired and often ignorantly discussed purpose of forcing a dissolution. Should the Government thus find itself prevented from carrying "all "the portions" of one of its measures, they will consider whether that check is to be treated as a withdrawal of confidence, and they will be guided to their decision by a consideration of the general interests of the country as likely to be affected by an immediate dissolution. Nor did Lord SALISBURY conceal his opinion that as matters stand the Government would best exercise their constitutional discretion in the case supposed by "deferring an appeal to the "country until the result of their recent measures in Ireland "can be more permanently displayed to the minds of the "people." Such is the proposition which Lord SALISBURY has laid down as regards the future action of the Government in certain possible contingencies. The statement, which might be appropriately headed "Important to Old "Parliamentary Hands," should be about as unpleasant reading as it is possible to lay on a Gladstonian breakfast-table; but we believe that it will be cordially approved by the country.

ALPINE FORESTRY.

MOST professions seem easy to those who have only a superficial knowledge of them, and the simplest woodcraft doubtless demands a greater experience and certainty both of eye and hand than is generally supposed. But if this is true even of the woods that afford pleasant and easy walks to those who dwell upon the plains or gently undulating hills, the matter is one of far greater moment and difficulty in the higher Alps, where the maintenance of the upland woods is necessary to secure the property and even the lives of those who dwell in the valleys, and where the natural phenomena with which the forester has to deal are far more complex. Even in England one is sorry to see a knoll which was once covered by ancient trees turned into smooth pasturage, but in England this feeling may be regarded as sentimental; to denude one of the steeper acclivities of the higher Alps means to bring ruin on all who live beneath. The little brook that for centuries has run its course quietly if not noiselessly, gradually swelling and then falling a foot or two under the influence of the melting snow or long continued rains, becomes a mountain torrent whose humours and caprices are incalculable. It rises and falls suddenly, sweeping away the mills beneath and covering the fertile meadows with large fragments of rock and beds of gravel. Nor is this all. In a year or two the frost and snow of winter and the rains and drought of summer loosen the outer coating of vegetable earth from the rocks on which it rests, and then, on some bright or mildly raining day in spring, the whole comes down with the thawing snow as an avalanche, the destructive power of which is not to be withstood. Nor will the principle of letting things go answer here. Even if it were advisable to abandon all the profit that may be derived from the timber, and it is by no means inconsiderable, wardens would still have to be appointed, for a single trunk falling across a stream is converted by the first flood into a dam, and then the brook tears its way through a new channel, spreading devastation before it.

Thus, even if we ignore the climatic influences which the growth and destruction of forests—the word is here used in the vulgar, not the technical, sense—have been shown to produce, it will be seen that the position of an Alpine forester is by no means a sinecure, and that his work can hardly be done by the rule of thumb. The Austrian Government is fully conscious of this, and trains its foresters for the duties they are expected to perform as carefully as the members of any other profession. They may be divided into two ranks, which correspond roughly to those of commissioned and non-commissioned officers in the army. A boy who has passed an examination somewhat similar to one that might be imposed on leaving our higher elementary schools has a right to enter the lower grade, if he can speak the current languages fluently. He is then assigned to a district where his practical work at once begins, and he receives a small payment, but is subject to dismissal at a day's notice if he proves incapable. At first he is chiefly employed in the office, but the forester takes the pupils with him when he inspects the woods, draws their attention to the more important matters, and affords them an opportunity of gaining a full knowledge of the lower branches of woodcraft. If one of them shows peculiar aptitude, he is soon employed in the open air. When the forest has to be thinned or timber sold, he is trusted with the office of seeing that none but the stems which have been marked are felled, and that this is done in such a way as to inflict the smallest possible injury on the surrounding trees; and at other times similar duties are found for him. His instructions are always clear and exact, and at first the supervision over all his actions is very strict, as the forester himself is responsible for them to the Government or the private proprietor. Thus he learns his business, and rises in it by degrees till he becomes a Forst Wart, on whom the whole practical management of the forest, the employment of labourers, and the execution of orders depends. In this position he is frequently consulted by the higher officials on all matters of detail, but without further theoretical instruction he cannot rise above it.

For the higher offices a different training is demanded. The youth who chooses this as his career has to pass an examination equal in severity to that which secures an entrance to a university or one of the higher technical schools. He then goes to one of the great schools of forestry, in which he remains for at least three years. The instruction there given is both theoretical and practical, though it is perhaps better in the former than the latter respect. The course embraces lectures on almost all the natural sciences in their application to woodcraft; and at its close an examination is imposed. To pass it successfully the student must give ample proof that he has profited by a training as severe as that which would secure a university degree, though it is, of course, different in character. From the successful candidates the lower ranks of the higher service are recruited, and thus by degrees officials are formed to whom the administration of large extents of mountain woodland can safely be entrusted.

This union of a high intellectual training with practical knowledge and duties is what lends the Alpine forester his peculiar character. He is usually a keen sportsman, and often a close observer of nature. A great part of his life is spent in the open air, and he has unrivalled opportunities of watching the slow changes that take place in districts on which the hand of man rarely encroaches—the disintegration of the rocks, the changes in the bed of a mountain stream, the habits of animals that love the solitude, and so on. His counting-house duties compel him to be exact, his early education renders him comparatively free from superstition. He has the hardihood of a mountaineer, and the good humour good health usually brings. Altogether, he is one of the pleasantest companions on a summer ramble; but his duties are not light, particularly on the Government domains. The game is under his charge as well as the trees, and he must take care that a sufficient stock is kept up, and never permitted to increase to such an extent as to be an annoyance to the peasants. The woods are expected not only to pay their own expenses, but to yield a certain profit; it is he who has to decide what trees can be felled without danger to public security and with the greatest profit. The mere auditing of the accounts when a large district is concerned involves a good deal of desk work. But the life, though busy, is by no means monotonous; the occupations are varied, and, for the most part, interesting.

We have noticed that the practical training given in the highest schools of forestry is hardly equal to the theoretical instruction they afford, and also that there is a point at which it has been found necessary to put a stop to the advance of men whose knowledge has been gained by practice alone. There is a third way by which men may enter the career of a forester and rise above the position of Forst Wart, though they cannot attain the highest positions in their profession. If a boy stays two years longer at school and can pass a stiffer examination than that imposed on the younger candidates, he may enter one of the lower schools of forestry at once, and thence rise to the position of a forester, though not to that of an upper forester or administrator, unless the former title be given him as a compliment when he retires. Many youths who have passed two or three years in practice, but kept up their learning by private study or tuition, pass the examination necessary for their admittance into those lower Forstschulen, and they are then as a rule preferred to their more theoretic colleagues.

One of the difficulties of the forester consists in the conditions of law and usage, which differ in the various districts and sometimes in the single villages. The landed proprietors of the valleys have always possessed an acknowledged, though undefined, right to fell such timber as they require for firing or building purposes. When the value of wood in the upland valleys was but small, and transport was so difficult and costly that exportation could only be made to pay when it was undertaken on a large scale, the old and simple usage is said to have worked smoothly to the satisfaction of all; but with the increased demand caused by the construction of railroads, the forests began to be devastated, and the Government found it necessary to impose strict regulations as to the felling of timber. These gave rise to great discontent and prolonged litigation between the various villages and the Government, to which a close was put by mutual concessions and arbitration. The conditions, however, which were finally adopted in various villages differed widely, and the forester has to be thoroughly acquainted with those which are in force in the districts he has to superintend.

In many, probably in most, cases the Government ceded a part of the domains to the single towns or hamlets, on condition of retaining an exclusive right to the rest. In some cases the municipal authorities kept the woods thus granted in their own hands, and have administered them for the benefit of the community; in others, however, they were parcelled out to the proprietors who had a claim upon them, and there the destruction almost immediately began. The price of timber then seemed high, though it has been rising ever since, and not only did the smaller peasants clear the hillsides of everything by which money could be made, but men possessed of capital sold their trees to invest the money in a bank. The results which might have been foreseen followed; a disastrous change in the climate and frequent inundations. At length a new law to prevent the felling of immature trees was passed, which even the foresters acknowledge to be strict enough in principle, but they say the penalties imposed are too small and too rarely enforced. It pays a merchant to take the risk of the fines.

Any one who makes a leisurely journey from Pontebba to Laibach may see to what result the parcelling out of the woods has led. From the Italian boundary to Tarvis they are in the best possible order. This domain formerly belonged to Count Arro. It was lately purchased from him with money taken from the ecclesiastical fund, and is administered by the State, though the revenues drawn from it of course belong to the Church. It already yields a considerable profit, which it is believed will greatly increase in the next few years. The woods of Weissenfels, which belong to a corporation, though subject to the old rights of the inhabitants, are also in a good condition; but as soon as the sources of the Sava are reached the hillsides become bare, and from hence all down the valley wherever a piece of well-tended wood exists the traveller may be sure that it belongs to the State, to a nobleman, or to one of the few proprietors who have had the foresight to treat the forests which they cannot replant, and the soil of which they can use for no other purpose, as a part of their children's patrimony, from which they have a right to draw a reasonable interest, but the principal of which they regard as sacred. It is a misfortune that such prudent and conscientious men have to suffer from the inundations which are to a large extent caused by the thoughtlessness of their less thrifty neighbours.

HALF-HOURS WITH SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN.

THE materials of an exceedingly interesting and valuable book, which will probably appear under the above title, though The Whole Art of Not Being a Statesman has also been suggested, and may perhaps be used, are rapidly accumulating in the proper hands. Some part of the volume has already appeared in the pages of this Review; other parts, we trust, will appear; but the whole, for obvious reasons, cannot be thoroughly digested just yet Meanwhile an important addition has been made this week to the texts of the treatise by the correspondence which has taken place between Sir George and Mr. Robert Martin, representative of the famous family of the Martins of Ballynahinch. With Mr. Martin's part, at least the argumentative part of him, which is chiefly contained in his rejoinder to Sir George's reply, we need not busy ourselves, except to say that it is as moderate in tone as it is sound in substance. The questions which opened the correspondence, and Sir George's answer to them, are the points of interest. Mr. Martin first quoted Sir George's statement at Sunderland some three weeks or a month ago that "The Irish landlords had been adjudged by competent tribunals to have taken from many generations of tenants money to which they had no moral right," and he wanted to know what competent tribunal had ever said anything of the kind. He also quoted a very different passage from a speech some five years old, in which Sir George, giving a glowing and generous denunciation of Irish crime, spoke of its victims as having been chosen because "they had been pointed out to the assassins in incendiary articles and speeches, made, not for the purpose of argument, but for the purpose of denunciation, and just as much part of the machinery of murder as the sword-cane and the pistol." And then Mr. Martin wished to ask whether Sir George was not now giving his support to the men who wrote those articles and made those speeches. Sir George's answer is too remarkable and interesting not to be given in full:—"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge your letter. The reductions in Irish rents made by the Land Commission were, no doubt, in part due to the fall in agricultural prices. But those reductions were much more largely due to the circumstance that, in the days of rack-renting, the Irish farmers very often paid competition rents in order to save themselves being turned from houses which they and their predecessors had built, and farms which they and their predecessors had reclaimed and improved. The money which landlords obtained under these circumstances was money to which they had no moral right, and to which, since recent land legislation, they have no legal right. English landlords who, or their predecessors, have reclaimed and improved the land, and have built the farmsteads, are in an entirely different position. I may state that, in making these remarks, I am quite unaware whether they apply or not to the estates belonging to your family. With regard to the last part of your letter, if you will read my recent speeches on Irish policy, you will find that they recommend—first, that Ireland should be governed by conciliation, and not by coercion, as was held by the Conservative party and Government in 1885; and, next, that self-government should be given to Ireland, under reasonable conditions, as was held by Lord Hartington in 1886. I do not think that either of these propositions are inconsistent with what I said at Hawick. Whether they are or not, I am convinced they are right in themselves.—I remain, yours faithfully, G. O. TREVELYAN."

It should be said that for the remarkable evasion in the answer to the first question Mr. Martin had somewhat laid himself open, inasmuch as he had unwisely added to his simple inquiry as to the competent tribunal and its adjudication a comparison with English landlords and their reductions, which, however just in itself, admitted of evasion. Sir George therefore, except on high moral grounds, can scarcely be blamed for declining the stronger and attacking the less strong part of the enemy, according to the rules made and provided by all good generals. The important point, however, is to note here how absolutely he does decline the strong part. He makes not the slightest attempt to point out the competent tribunal which adjudged, &c., and that for the best of all reasons. There is no such tribunal and no such adjudication, and Sir George knows it. The reductions under the Act of 1881, the further reductions under the Land Order of the other day, no more adjudge on the morality or immorality of the rents that were paid "many generations" or a single generation ago than they adjudge on the morality or immorality of the rent, whatever it is, that will be paid "many generations" hence. Taking the Land Commissioners at their most august valuation, their adjudications are simply adjudications that at a given time, between given persons, and with a given scale of prices prevailing, such and such rents were fair, such and such others not fair. By partisans they may also be taken as signifying their opinion that immediately before their assessment rents had been "unfair"; but that circumstance is always understood to have been pretty liberally taken into account in the new tariff, and whether it be so or not, it has absolutely no bearing on the point which Sir George seeks to establish. It is not a case even of "the fathers have eaten sour grapes," as it would be if somebody charged Sir George with immorality because the Fenwicks of Wallington in old time made uncommonly free with Scotch beeves. It is more preposterous even than that. The only exact parallel that we can see is that Sir George should denounce every one who sells Consols to-day at par as "taking money to which he has no moral right," because in the critical times of the last century they might have been bought at Heaven knows how much discount. The case is purposely inverted, but the argument is just the same. If it follow because a hundred pounds stock is worth to-day a hundred pounds sterling and more, that it was "morally" worth that amount when Paul Jones was insulting the coast of Yorkshire, then it follows that Mr. Martin's, or anybody else's, ancestors took more than they had a moral right to a hundred years ago, because it has been decided that they have not a legal right to as much now.

But, clear as this is, and curious as Sir George's evasion of the first question is, it is not so curious as his complete refusal to answer the second, and as the reason he gives (apparently to satisfy his own conscience rather than Mr. Martin) for refusing. It will be observed that he says not one single word in reply to the plain question whether the men whom he is supporting—the men whom, as Mr. Bright would say, he is recommending to the Queen as her advisers and Ministers in Ireland—were or were not the authors of things which a few years ago he pronounced to be as much part of the machinery of murder as the pistol or the sword. He has apparently that grace of conscience left in him that he dare not tell a categorical falsehood, and say they are not; he has not quite conscience enough to say that they are. He talks about conciliation, and coercion, and self-government, and 1881 and 1886—things about which Mr. Martin had said never a word, and which have absolutely nothing to do with the question. Is Sir George or is he not supporting with all his might those whom he has denounced as machinators of murder? His reply is, in fact, as germane to the matter as the essayist's was when he observed, "She is exquisitely handsome," in reply to requests as to the time of day, and the like. Either the persons concerned were machinators of murder or they were not. If they were not, Sir George Trevelyan grossly calumniated them in 1883; if they were, it remains to be shown what they have done to purge themselves of this stain, and to become in Sir George Trevelyan's eyes fit persons to whom to commit the well-being of five millions of the Queen's subjects and the government of a third of the Queen's immediate dominions in 1888. This part of the matter, it would seem, Sir George does dimly see, and he tries to ward off the blow by the strange concluding words of his letter:—"I do not think that either of these propositions [the propositions about conciliation and coercion and self-government, and 1881 and 1886, and her exquisite handsomeness] are inconsistent with what I said at Hawick. Whether they are or not, I am convinced they are right in themselves."

A right memorable statement that last! It is not merely that its curious mixture of petulance and disquiet in tone, its boyish "I-don't-care-what-you-say-and-it's-a-shame-to-bother-me,-and-I-just-mean-to-stick-to-it" ring is characteristic of the recent utterances of a once acute and intelligent, if never very logical or vigorous, politician. It is not merely its fatal positiveness, its forgetfulness of the warning, "Man! thou takest vows of eternal stability in the name of th. rock that is itself crumbling away." Both these things are curious, and still more curious is it that it should have been left to nearly the youngest Gladstonian to formulate in a letter what all Gladstonians would say if they were honest enough or rash enough. But most curious of all is the unconsciousness it indicates of another fatal dilemma similar to those pointed out already. Sir George Trevelyan, in committing the fortunes of Ireland to A and B, now is "certain he is right." Was he not certain he was right when he called A and B "machinators of murder," persons as guilty and as responsible as those who used the pistol and the sword-cane? If he was not certain, how came he to utter so gross a scandal, and not merely to utter it, but actually to administer for years the government of Ireland itself in the very spirit and direction of these words of his? It has been noted by historians as a special but rare wickedness in certain inquisitors and persecutors, religious and political, that they persecuted others for denying or disbelieving doctrines in which they had themselves no belief. But they were mostly, if not always, servants of despots or of ecclesiastical and political systems which left men little choice but to be rackers or racked. Sir George was not in this plight when he undertook and long carried on the coercing of Ireland and the battle against the machinators of murder. He must be presumed to have done it of the purest free will. And yet he was apparently not convinced that he was right. Or, if he was, what is the value of a conviction "which alters when it alteration finds" of a score or so of votes in Parliament, and "bends with the remover to remove" when the remover is Mr. Gladstone and the remove is from certainty that A is a machinator of murder towards innocent victims, and certainty that A is the very man to be entrusted with the management of the Kingdom of Ireland? Was Mr. Trevelyan a persecutor of patriots, a maligner of heroes, a reckless defender of a policy that cannot be defended, or is Sir George Trevelyan utterly and hopelessly in the wrong? One or other of these questions must be answered in the affirmative, and we hardly know which answer is most fatal to his political reputation.

COFFEE.

ATTENTION has recently been called to the fact that the consumption of tea is largely increasing, while that of coffee is diminishing in an almost similar ratio. It is at first somewhat difficult to account for this. There are, however, certain explanations which let in some light upon the matter, and the first of these is that tea, since the reduction of its duty, is more largely than ever drunk by women, who greatly prefer it to coffee.

Tea, except in the exaggerated form of lightly-dried green tea, is a mild stimulant and sudorific, or, to use a common phrase among those who drink it, a "comforter" or "stay." Coffee is more potent than tea. It not only arrests waste of tissue, but it also possesses qualities which bring it very near to the limits of the range of dangerous drugs. If we take theine, the alkaloid of tea—and we may practically leave out of consideration the difference between black tea and green—and compare it with the corresponding alkaloid in coffee, we find certain marked differences. Coffee is more immediate and more marked in its effects than tea. A strong cup of coffee will act on the moment, and is sometimes employed by medical men as an emetic. Or, again, a cup of hot coffee will recruit a man who has suffered from a violent shock, where a cup of warm tea would be not much better or more efficacious than a basin of gruel. It may be agreed, then, that coffee properly prepared is a drink for men rather than for women. The question remains, why men do not now drink coffee, or, to put it in another shape, why we have no genuine coffee-houses.

One first and obvious answer is that the drinking of coffee, like the taking of snuff, has gone out of fashion. It was once pardonable in a young man to carry a snuff-box, but absolutely unpardonable to smoke. It is now considered legitimate to smoke from morning to night, if a person desires to do so; but nine persons out of ten consider the taking of snuff to be a most objectionable habit. Another reason is that in England the proper preparation of coffee is very generally unknown. Cooks and housekeepers as often as not purchase ground coffee, long since devoid of all aroma, and proceed to boil it until the last atom of virtue has evaporated. Now coffee seeds are to be procured in much greater perfection in England than in France. Why is it, therefore, that the average cup of coffee that can be obtained in an English restaurant or hotel is distinctly inferior to that which may be met with on the other side of the Channel? The answer is obvious. The French cook understands the preparation of coffee; the English cook knows nothing about it, and, we are afraid, as a rule, does not care to learn. The coffee handed you even at the table of your friends is often made from seeds which were roasted three months ago, ground two months ago, and which have since been kept in paper until they were boiled. The original aroma has gone, and nothing has been left except the stale material for a coarse, woody extract.

To prepare coffee you must take the green seed, using your judgment to make sure that it is new. You must then roast it in a rotary cylinder, or even in a small fryingpan, over a charcoal fire. It will change its colour from light sage-green to dark brown, and will at the same time begin to sweat. Drops of brown oil will stand out upon it, and will give out an unmistakable aroma. This aroma consists of a delicate essential oil, so volatile in its nature that coffee roasted the day before yesterday—not to say coffee which has been roasted and ground and kept in tinfoil for a month—has no more left of its virtue than a rose a week cut. The seed thus prepared should stain your fingers or leave a perceptible greasy brown trace on white blotting-paper. From this point all is easy. Break your seeds, for the kernel of the nut is always the sweetest. Tie the fragments in muslin. Then, if you are an epicure, pour a small quantity of actually boiling water upon a large allowance of them. But you can get admirable coffee for a larger number of guests if you boil the muslin bag for a minute and a half or two minutes, and not longer. Coffee is an infusion, and not a decoction. Coffee thus prepared is a beverage within the reach of every man who will make it or see it made for himself; and it can be made by any woman who condescends to be taught.

In the East the preparation of coffee is essentially the same as that we have described. A quantity of the green seeds are roasted and broken up, and boiling water is then poured upon them. The sole difference is that the compound is not strained, so you have to allow the crushed fragments to settle to the bottom of your cup and to sip the surface of its contents. The cup of good coffee, if poured into a large thin wineglass, ought to be the colour of Madeira, and to exhale an aroma perceptible all over the room. This aroma is due to the highly volatile oil, of which we have already spoken, and of which most has disappeared a week after the seed has been roasted. We are speaking, of course, for the epicure. For a sailor, wet through with his watch, or a navigator just released from his barrow and shovel, coffee of almost any kind is better than none. This is a fact which working-men have long found out. For coffee-stalls are becoming more numerous, and owe their patronage almost entirely to men who live by their muscle.

CAMPAIGNING AGAINST SNAKES AND WILD BEASTS.

THE Annual Report drawn up for the Government of India on the measures taken for the destruction of snakes and of wild beasts is an interesting illustration of the conditions of life and of the duties of Government in that peninsula. Year after year the campaign goes on against these pests. But an examination of the Returns shows that the Government is hardly getting the mischief under. The last ten years nevertheless give a grand total of over two hundred thousand wild beasts and more than two million and a half snakes destroyed. It is curious to note that more than a half of the venomous reptiles extirpated are put down to the Bombay Presidency. Other indications, though this is certainly the most striking, point to the Government receiving more support in its measures from the inhabitants of Western India than elsewhere. But, in spite of this gigantic slaughter, the number of human beings actually done to death, and of cattle and domestic animals lost to the community, remains much the same. In the year 1886, for which the figures have just reached home, the number actually rose. The bill of mortality amounted to nearly 25,000 in all, or not far short of 2,000 more than in the preceding year. The increase was due entirely to deaths from snake-bites, which reached the number of 22,134. It must be remembered, however, that, dangerous as the snakes are, they still probably bear somewhat more blame than they deserve. Death from snake-bite is a too obvious explanation, unfortunately, when the disgraced widow disappears in the zenana, or a child has been murdered in one of those obscure sacrifices which a frenzy of native superstition, or the desire to guard hidden treasure with the spirit of a boy still demand.

Amongst animals the tiger continues to hold a bad pre-eminence as the most deadly foe to human life. Not far short of a thousand people proved in their own cases that the man-eater is yet far from being extinct. But, though the mortality among human beings increased during the year under review, the loss of cattle—57,451 head—showed a diminution. Some consolation might be gathered from this if the figures were to be relied upon. But, unfortunately, these figures are extremely vague, and the Government is convinced that they do not by any means represent the real loss. The natives in up-country localities are at no great pains to report cases, and the stations where the reports can be taken are few and far between. More trustworthy evidence of the progress of the campaign against wild beasts is afforded by the returns of animals and snakes destroyed. Zeal is here stimulated by the Government rewards. For the year 1886 we observe a decline in the numbers which is by no means satisfactory. As against 1,855 tigers, 5,466 leopards, and 1,874 bears killed in 1885, the figures were only 1,464, 4,051, and 1,668. A decrease in the number of snakes destroyed from 420,044 to 417,596 is also reported. Various explanations are offered for this. It is stated that the rewards are too small in some provinces, or that they are unpunctually paid, as in Bengal, while the people qualified to certify for them are inconveniently few. Attention has been called by the supreme Government to the necessity of remedying this.

The utmost possible results should certainly be obtained by the Indian authorities for their campaign against snakes and wild beasts, since the operations cost Government a round sum. In 1886 the rewards paid amounted to Rs. 1,89,000. But during the previous decade the disbursements ran up to over a crore and a half of rupees. We note, however, with satisfaction the complaints against the Arms Act are unfounded. It is a stock theme of native agitators to contend that the Act cripples the native community in their struggle with wild beasts and exposes both them and their crops to unnecessary depredations. But a scrutiny of the working of this Act shows that contention is a flimsy one. Over 86,000 licences under the Act were current during the year in question, and it must be borne in mind that these licences are granted without payment. But the destruction of less than 23,000 wild animals is disproportionate to the facilities offered, and brings out the supineness of the native population clearly enough.

BOARD OF TRADE RETURNS.

THE Board of Trade Returns for December and for the year 1887 fully bear out the view we have taken in this journal for months past of the course of trade. For the month the value of the imports was 34,173,968*l.*, being in excess of those of the corresponding month of the year before 3,162,683*l.*, or about 10¼ per cent. For the twelve months the value of the imports was 361,935,006*l.*, being 12,553,920*l.* in excess of that for the year 1886, or somewhat over 3½ per cent. The value of the exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures for the month was 20,385,464*l.*, an increase over that of December 1886 of as much as 3,231,354*l.*, or very nearly 19 per cent. For the twelve months the value of the exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures was 221,398,440*l.*, an increase of 8,965,686*l.*, or about 4¼ per cent. over the preceding twelve months. Both in the imports and in the exports it will be noticed that the month of December shows an extraordinary advance upon the average for the whole year. This seems to prove that trade has been growing much more rapidly at the end of the year than previously, and particularly in the very last month; and that this is so is borne out by all the other indications before us. It is to be recollected, however, that the increase in values would naturally be greater than the increase in quantities, because prices rose very suddenly and very rapidly during December. Our readers will recollect that in some instances the rise was quite extraordinary. It is further to be recollected that there was one day more for business purposes in last December than in the December of the preceding year, Christmas having fallen last time upon Sunday and in 1886 upon Saturday. A single working-day added to the business of so great a commercial country as this would naturally make a very considerable difference. And, lastly, it is to be borne in mind that December of 1886 showed a slight falling off on the preceding December, as did December 1885 upon December of 1884. Thus the good trade of last month compares with a month in which trade had received a check. When full allowance, however, is made for all these considerations, the fact remains that December last was one of the most satisfactory, whether we regard the imports or the exports, for a long time past. And, if we turn from the general figures to the details, we find in most directions confirmation of the fact that trade was decidedly improving at the close of the year just ended.

Fears had been entertained for some time past that the American purchases of our goods had received a material check. The dearness and scarcity of money in the summer undoubtedly put a stop to railway construction in a great many cases; and the stop to railway construction naturally decreased the demand for iron, steel, coal, and many other commodities. It was apprehended, therefore, that the end of the year would show a decided falling off in the exports of articles of British and Irish produce and manufacture to the United States; but it is satisfactory to find that the increase in the American purchases of our goods has continued. Thus, to take the most important articles, iron and steel, we find that in December the quantity of pig-iron exported to the United States was 25,407 tons, against 12,307 tons in the preceding December, and likewise there was a very large increase for the whole year. Railroad iron of all kinds exported to the United States was in quantity 12,820 tons in December, against 8,584 tons in the preceding December, and for the whole year the quantity was about trebled. In machinery and millwork there was also an increase, as there was likewise in hardware and cutlery. Against the improved business with the United States is to be set, it is true, decreased trade with Australia, the long-continued drought having lessened the colonists' purchasing power. But it is encouraging to find that in December our exports to Australia showed an increase, foreshadowing, we hope, a recovery in the trade. Another feature even more satisfactory is the continued increase in the export of coal. Some time ago we called the attention of our readers to the growing demand for coal, and we pointed out that the whole of the increase in business was in the South Wales ports; the North-Eastern ports, on the contrary, having lost business. We suggested at the same time that the explanation was to be found mainly in the protectionist policy adopted by Germany and Russia, and partly, no doubt, in the development of coal-mining in Germany and neighbouring countries. During December the exports of coal have continued on an increasing scale, the quantity exported for the month having been 2,091,839 tons, against 1,744,719 tons in the preceding December, an increase of not far short of 13 per cent. For the whole year the increase was from a little over 23½ millions of tons to a little under 24½ millions of tons. And, as we found to be the case when last writing upon this subject, the increased export is to countries in the trade with which the South Wales ports would have a decided advantage over the North-Eastern ports. Both for the month and for the year there is a falling off in the exports of coal to Russia. For the year also there is a falling off in the exports to Germany and to Sweden and Norway; while there is a decided increase, both for the month and for the twelve months, in the exports to Italy, Turkey, Egypt, Brazil, Gibraltar, the East Indies, and "other countries." This increased demand for coal in so many countries indicates a more active state of trade in the countries referred to, and at such places as Gibraltar it points further to a decided recovery in the shipping trade. The demand for coal for the use of steamers also shows an increase, proving that the revival in the shipping trade has continued to the very end of the year. And this is further confirmed by the fact that the entries and clearances of shipping at our ports show a marked increase in December over those of the preceding December. Shipping of the total tonnage of 2,088,976 tons entered our ports during the past month, against 1,913,720 in the preceding December; while the clearances were 2,569,529 tons last month, against 2,247,594 twelve months previously. One other very satisfactory point may be noticed in the exports; we refer to the revival of the Indian demand for cotton piece goods. During 1885 and 1886 the exports of cotton piece goods from this country to India were exceedingly large, and the result was a glut in the Indian markets and a falling off in the past year in the exports. In December there was, however, a marked revival. Thus, the exports to Bombay rose from 58,111,800 yards in December of 1886 to 79,028,500 yards last month; those to Madras rose from 10,908,100 yards to 12,486,500 yards; but those to Bengal still showed a falling off, 79,347,900 yards having been exported in December 1886, while last month the exports were only 72,911,600 yards. Against this is to be noted a generally increased demand in the Far East, for example, at the Straits Settlements, China, and Japan.

It is not easy to reconcile the increased exports of textile fabrics last month with the falling off in the imports of the raw material. Thus, in raw cotton there was last month a falling off of as much as 386,705 cwts.; there was also a falling off in raw silk, in alpaca, and in goat's wool. Probably the explanation is that the imports during the preceding eleven months were very large; so that while the imports for December showed decreases in the value of raw materials, both for textile manufactures and for sundry industries and manufactures, there is an increase of nearly 5¾ millions sterling in the value of the raw materials for textile manufactures for the whole twelve months; but in raw materials for sundry industries even for the twelve months there is a falling off in value of about a million and a quarter sterling. This latter fact, however, may be due to mere accident; to contrary winds, for instance, or to some delay in shipment. The falling off last month may this month or the month after be followed by very large increases. It is reasonable to assume that where the foreign demand for our goods shows a marked expansion there will be likewise an increase in the imports of the raw materials of the manufacture. With the exception of the falling off in the raw materials, the imports generally are as satisfactory as the exports. But there is one rather curious change as regards the sources of our supply of wheat indicated in the Returns since last harvest. For some years our imports from Russia had been steadily falling off, so much so that it appeared as if Russia was completely losing her hold upon the wheat markets of Western Europe. On the other hand, the imports both from the United States and from India showed a marked increase. But since last harvest there has been an extraordinary recovery in the Russian wheat trade. In December, for example, we imported as much as 1,645,527 cwts. of wheat from Russia against barely 91,574 cwts. in the December of 1886, and the increase in the imports from Russia since the harvest has been so marked, that for the whole year 1887 we imported over 5½ millions of cwts., against less than 3¾ millions of cwts. in the preceding year. On the other hand, there has been a marked falling off in the imports from India. In December we imported barely 433,032 cwts. of Indian wheat, against 750,012 cwts. in December of the preceding year, and for the whole year we imported barely more than 8½ millions of cwts., against somewhat over 11 millions of cwts. in the preceding year. From the United States our imports have also fallen off; but in December, while we imported from the Atlantic seaports little more than a third of what we imported in the preceding December, we imported from the Pacific ports about twice as much as in the December of 1886. In the early part of the year our imports from the Atlantic seaboard were enormous, and consequently, notwithstanding the falling off in the past few months, there is a very decided increase in our total imports of wheat from the United States over those of 1886. Still it seems plain that the American harvest last year was deficient, while the Russian harvest was very fine and therefore Russia has been able to recover some of her lost ground. As we have seen above, the shortness of the American crop has not, as yet at least, affected injuriously the American purchases of our goods. It is to be hoped that the increased imports of Russian wheat may increase Russia's purchasing-power of our goods, and lead to a recovery in our trade with that Empire. On that point, however, very much depends upon the maintenance of peace, and not a little upon the price obtained for wheat.

THE QUEEN'S PREMIUMS FOR SIRES.

THE Royal Commission on Horse-breeding has issued its report within four months of its appointment, and, in our opinion, its activity has been equalled by its common sense. At present it has only 5,000*l.* at its disposal, and of this 4,400*l.* is to be distributed in prizes of 200*l.* each for thoroughbred stallions whose owners will guarantee their services at a fee of 2*l.*, the remaining 600*l.* being reserved for expenses. If the judges are well chosen, the very fact of a horse having won a Queen's Premium will be a great recommendation to breeders, irrespective of the reduced fee, especially to those who make a great point of soundness. The low fee, again, ought to insure a full subscription to a winner, so that his receipts, including his fees and the premium, should be about 300*l.*, or the equivalent of a full subscription at a fee of 6*l.* The Government never gives more than 300*l.* for a thoroughbred stallion to be sent out for breeding purposes to India; and many people might be surprised, if they took the trouble to go through the sale lists of thoroughbred stock, to find how few horses, apart from foals and yearlings, fetch more than that sum. In 1886, only about five-and-twenty realized anything above 300 guineas at the sales given in the long lists in Ruff, and a good many of these were two-year-olds and three-year-olds in training and of high promise. Even at a cost of 500*l.* or 600*l.* a winner of Queen's Premiums should prove a remunerative investment. Country stallions are often purchased for very small sums. Bruar, who is serving at 5 guineas a mare, was bought for 50 guineas. That good old horse Berserker only cost 100 guineas a year and a half ago; he has had a season since then, and he is still advertised at a fee of 10 guineas for thoroughbred, and 5 guineas for half-bred mares. The most extraordinary case of a well-bought stallion is that of Londesborough, who is said to have been sold as a stud-horse for 24*l.*, and is now advertised at a fee of 50 guineas.

Low as the fee of the winners of Queen's Premiums appears at 2*l.*, there are something like forty stallions in the United Kingdom advertised at fees varying from one to two guineas. They are, however, as a rule, a set of unsound, worthless brutes. According to the useful list given in the almanac published at the Field office, there are about a hundred and fifty sires advertised for half-bred mares at 5 guineas or less. At fees varying from 3*l.* downwards there are a good many exceedingly well-bred stallions; the pity is that they are not all sound, but it may be worth noticing how excellent are the strains obtainable at such low fees. There are four of these cheap sires by Lowlander, whose descendants ought to be powerful, fast, and fine fencers. There are two by the celebrated sire Speculum. There are two, again, by Petrarch, who himself earns the large fee of 150 guineas; and there is an equal number by Sterling, who receives a similar fee. In 1886 the fourteen yearlings by Sterling, sold at public auction, averaged 1,068 guineas each. There are three sires, serving at two and a half guineas or less, by the fine old grey Strathconan. Admirers of the King Tom blood can get it, through his son, Tom King, crossed with that of the great Birdcatcher himself for 2*l.* The most fashionable of all crosses at present is that of Touchstone and Birdcatcher. This blood, too, may be obtained for a couple of sovereigns through Chichester. The same blood exists far more directly in the splendidly bred Exminster, who is by Newminster, out of a Stockwell mare. He serves at 3*l.* The same cross occurs again in Limestone, a horse with a grand back and loins, who serves at 3 guineas. The successful double-cross of Touchstone can be had for 2½ guineas, through Althotas by Rosicrucian, a horse that serves at a hundred guineas. Few better horses have ever trod the turf than Gladiateur and Fille de l'Air; they were mated, and their highly-bred son, Candidat, is given in marriage for the nominal consideration of a couple of guineas. The services of a son of the handsome Beadsman, called Carthusian (a big horse with plenty of bone), are to be had for 2*l.* 10*s.* Florin, a horse by Sterling, serves mares "the property of tenant-farmers or those within Baron Rothschild's hunt" for nothing. Tenant-farmers living in the Meynell country get the use of Oswestry, a powerful horse with splendid blood for hunters, at 1*l.*, and tenants of his owner pay nothing for it. The Duke of Westminster keeps a sire of much the same blood in Golden Cross, who stands in the Eaton paddocks at a fee of 2*l.* The master of the Badsworth hounds only charges 1*l.* for the use of Knight of the Forest, by Knight of the Garter out of a Kettledrum mare. So far as we can learn, no son of Hermit condescends to accept less than 10 guineas. At that fee the services can be obtained of Torpedo, Friar Rush, and St. Honorat, a colt that was once sold for 4,000 guineas.

Perhaps the best effect of the proposed Queen's Premiums will be the fair distribution of sound but inexpensive sires. At present there are more than are required in some districts, and none in others. Owners of ordinary stallions need not be afraid of having the bread taken out of their mouths by the Premium-winners; for in several districts one holder of a Queen's Premium will have to do duty for three counties. The competition for the Queen's Premiums should also benefit any good sire that is shown, even if he is not selected by the judges, as it is likely to attract a very large number of breeders, and many of them may like some of the unsuccessful competitors better than the prize-winners. Some breeders will always prefer make and shape, while others will be most anxious to obtain certain strains of blood, and among the latter there will ever be considerable diversity of taste. Upon the whole the new system of competition for Queen's Premiums ought to be hailed with satisfaction by all owners of good stallions, for even if it should have the effect of obliging them to reduce their fees, it will afford them a fine opportunity of advertisement.

The advocates of Cleveland bays, Yorkshire coachhorses, and Norfolk trotters are disappointed at the refusal of the Commissioners to devote any of the grant to the encouragement of those breeds; but the sum at their disposal is small enough, even for the leading breed, and we are convinced that the Commission has acted wisely in confining its efforts this year exclusively to the improvement of thoroughbred sires. In the opinion of many competent judges, most Norfolk trotters have some thoroughbred blood in their veins. The famous Emilius is known to have stood in Norfolk, and to have served half-bred mares at a fee of 5 guineas. Nor can there be much doubt that Yorkshire coach-horses have generally a strain of thoroughbred blood. Some of the best American trotters, again, are descended from the famous Hambletonian, or from Diomed, a winner of the Derby. Even in carthorses, it is a question whether a dash of pure blood does not give pluck and endurance. One of the Commissioners, Mr. H. Chaplin, dissents from his colleagues on this one particular of limiting the competition for the premiums exclusively to thoroughbred sires. He considers that "horses with a stain in their pedigree, and which are not, therefore, in the Stud Book, are constantly found, and have frequently been proved to be among the best and most successful of country stallions," which is all very true; but it does not necessarily follow that it is "inexpedient and undesirable that they should be excluded from all competition in the premiums," when the amount available for those premiums is comparatively small. If horses that are not quite clean-bred were once admitted to the competition, it would be difficult to keep out the Clevelands, the Trotters, and the Yorkshire coachhorses. We hope, however, that the time will come when the grant will be sufficiently increased to afford opportunities of encouragement to all our national breeds of horses.

While we rejoice at the distribution of 4,400*l.* by the Government in premiums for stallions, it is but fair to remember that the Hackney and the Hunter's Improvement Societies give away 1,113*l.* in prizes for the encouragement of horses this year; and that besides this, there are the Yorkshire annual stallion prizes for thoroughbreds, as well as a number of prizes at local shows, not only for thoroughbred horses, but for other breeds.

TWO PLAYS AT THE HAYMARKET.

No good object would be served by making a close comparison between Mr. Robert Buchanan's Partners and M. Daudet's Fromont jeune et Risler aîné. The writer of the English play publishes a statement with reference to it, that "the character of Heinrich Borgfeldt has been partly founded on that of Risler, but though numerous suggestions have been taken from Daudet's admirable story, the leading situation and most of the dramatis personæ are radically different." In an argument as to the amount of Mr. Buchanan's indebtedness, it would be easy to make a good case for either side. As for "most of the dramatis personæ" being "radically different," that all depends upon what one understands by the adverb. There are eight important characters in Partners, and of these Borgfeldt and his wife are the M. and Mme. Risler of the novel (the latter, it is true, with a difference); Charles Derwentwater is Fromont, Mr. Parr is M. Planus, Mr. Algernon Bellair is certainly Delobelle the tragedian, and Mrs. Harkaway has her origin in Mme. Dobson. On the other hand, though Mrs. Borgfeldt touches upon some of the experiences which befall Mme. Risler, the two are totally unlike each other in mode of life and habit of thought. Mme. Risler is a thoroughly vicious woman; Mrs. Borgfeldt is weak and vain, a little frivolous, but has no taint of criminality about her, and this fact necessarily causes the tone of the play to differ from that of the novel. A character is not as a matter of course dramatically feeble because it is the character of a feeble woman, nor dramatically strong because the personage is of determined disposition. We do not find fault with the playwright for making his Mrs. Borgfeldt vary so completely from Mme. Risler. The former is a sufficiently lifelike and probable creature; our only objection to her is that we have met her so often before. There is about Mrs. Borgfeldt a suggestion of the heroine of Nos Intimes, and indeed of the heroines of a great many other plays—the lady who is tempted by an illicit lover. Her husband may adopt a new accent and wear a novel wig, but we recognize him for the same in essentials, though it is true that the point of innumerable French plays in which he appears is the hiding from him of the intrigue. Just at the moment when it has seemed to be on the point of discovery, when he is "hot," as children say in playing the game, he is usually led astray and becomes cold again. In Partners Borgfeldt, arriving unexpectedly at his home, sees his wife Claire in the arms of his spendthrift partner, Charles Derwentwater. In truth she could not help herself. She strove to repulse the man (having, it is true, previously encouraged him), but he would not be repulsed, and her husband's suspicions concerning her are ill founded. Here, however, is a dramatic and powerful "situation," to employ the convenient jargon; but the author uses it with curious clumsiness, and finally destroys such slight chances of success as the piece has seemed to have.

There are several ways in which Borgfeldt might conceivably treat the false partner who has ruined the honour of the firm, and has striven to betray—has, as it appears, succeeded in betraying—the friend who has trusted and loved him. Borgfeldt might, as he is once on the point of doing, fly at the traitor and take personal vengeance, he might restrain himself, and order Derwentwater from his sight; he might declare that no effort should be made to save the firm, regardless of his own ruin, as it involves the ruin of the man he has such cause to hate; he might—in fact, he might do almost anything except what he does. His scheme of revenge is a very great deal too complicated to have any dramatic value. He declares himself determined to save the firm; but he, the senior partner, insists upon withdrawing and filling the position of a clerk, while the junior, who has squandered the money and so nearly caused the downfall of the house, is to remain sole master. We have to go a very long way round to find the reason of this resolve. It is based upon the circumstance that Derwentwater has married the daughter of the late founder of the firm, Borgfeldt's "honoured master," about whom we hear a good deal in the course of the drama, though as a very general rule—and playwrights would do well to remember this—people who are talked about and never seen in a play create no sort of interest. By overlooking Derwentwater's cruel treachery and reinstating him in the position he has deliberately lost, Borgfeldt quixotically proposes to show reverence for his "honoured master's" memory. This is all so exceedingly fantastic that, but for the acting of Mr. Beerbohm Tree in the part of Borgfeldt, audiences would surely laugh at—if they did not yawn at—such roundabout revenge; for it is revenge in a way, as Borgfeldt assumes that Derwentwater will be infinitely humiliated, in which supposition he is probably wrong. Mr. Tree's study of the character is, however, remarkably sympathetic. The actor deliberately and heavily handicaps himself by his awkward manner, ill-fitting clothes, strong German accent, and general uncouthness; but it is soon made evident that, if there is want of dignity, there is no want of heart; the man's simplicity and tenderness win him regard. That Mr. Tree should be able to sustain interest in Borgfeldt's proceedings, and to hide their eccentricity in the scene described above, says much for his power of influencing an audience. Such relief as the play possesses is furnished by Mr. Charles Brookfield's admirably fresh and humorous performance of the unsuccessful tragedian Bellair. We are not quite sure whether Bellair is a reproduction of an actual type, or whether he is just a trifle exaggerated. The cant about the "artistic temperament," which Bellair regards as a virtue, and recognizes in all the people from whom he wants to borrow money, is a touch of nature; and we doubt whether the difficulties of the aspirate have ever been quite as adroitly indicated. Sometimes Bellair is triumphant with the letter; often there are lapses; frequently he hesitates, and then the chances are that he goes wrong. His selfishness is indicated by notably clever touches. He perceives that his daughter is troubled. "I'm afraid she's losing her gaiety of 'eart. Have you a cigar?" he says in the same breath. Miss Marion Terry skilfully indicates the weak, but not unwomanly, disposition of Claire Borgfeldt, and competent work is done by Messrs. Kemble, Cautley, Allan, Misses Achurch and Lo Thiere. Partners has, no doubt, grave faults; but in the representation there is much that is striking.

Mr. Hamilton Aïdé's play, Incognito, presented during the week for the benefit of the Actors' Benevolent Fund, is founded on a central idea which is effective for stage purposes, but does not seem very susceptible of development. The author shows much cleverness in several respects, not least in the skill with which he utilizes his subject, sustaining interest in his personages when the whole scheme has been laid bare and the end is practically inevitable. The well-mannered scoundrel who hovers on the outskirts of society and sometimes is able to penetrate through the barriers is not, of course, a new figure, but the Vincent of Incognito is treated with freshness by Mr. Aïdé and Mr. Beerbohm Tree. Twenty years before the opening of the story, Vincent, then known as John Cracroft, deserted his young wife, who, after a few weeks of married life, had detected the real character of her husband. Mrs. Cracroft has inherited property on condition that she takes the name of Mordaunt; and when Mrs. Mordaunt's son Eric asks Vincent to his mother's home—they are all staying at Nice—she has no more notion that Mr. Vincent is her husband than he has that Mrs. Mordaunt is his wife. The adventurer is bent on marrying Claire de Florian, a rich young widow, whose sister May is engaged to Eric, and, when Mrs. Mordaunt has made her discovery, she is, of course, determined to save her friend. At the end of the first act Mrs. Mordaunt recognizes in Vincent the husband she had supposed dead. He shows no sign of recognition, though his keen eyes reveal the truth to him; and here the breaking off of his marriage with Claire becomes so certain that already the only possible end of the play is in sight. It is a proof of Mr. Aïdé's ingenuity that interest actually strengthens as the work proceeds, though if we examine the structure critically we perceive that the expansion of the story is something in the nature of a tour de force. Just before the act ends Mrs. Mordaunt begs Vincent to call upon her next day, and wonder is excited as to what will take place at the interview. Before this is reached there are some scenes which do not much advance the plot; but the interview when it comes is a striking episode, well written, and remarkably well acted by Mr. Beerbohm Tree and Miss Geneviève Ward. Vincent is, above all things, frank. Now that his wife is rich, he will, if she chooses, return to her, as Mr. Vincent, Mr. Mordaunt, or as any one else; if she will not accept him as her husband in any of those characters, she will surely let him marry Claire de Florian. "Either arrangement will be equally convenient to me," he observes with an air of great politeness in which contempt is only faintly apparent. The complication is well devised. Mrs. Mordaunt can prevent the sacrifice of Claire by stating that Vincent is her husband, but to do this is to let her son know what a scoundrel his father is, and to place herself openly in his power; if she does not speak, Claire will not be persuaded—she has conceived a ridiculous idea that Mrs. Mordaunt is jealous of her—and will fall into the toils. Again at the end of the second act the author adroitly postpones the climax, leaving it doubtful what course Vincent will pursue with regard to his intended victim. What he does is to visit her, and beg her to follow him to Paris, where they can be married, and Claire is wavering when Mrs. Mordaunt enters, and at last tells the wayward girl who Vincent is. Meantime the police have been accumulating evidence against him on other charges, and he solves the difficulties which his existence creates by shooting himself. The play would end as effectively if he did not do this on the stage.

It has been said that the story is not very susceptible of development, the threads in truth hang somewhat loosely together, and not all the episodes affect the main plot. Of the seven characters, one, Colonel Dupuis, is almost an excrescence. He is useful in just mentioning the reports which are current about Vincent, but though a good deal more is seen of him, he does not advance matters. Nor are the lovers, Eric and May Hartley (Claire's sister), much influenced by the proceedings of Vincent, notwithstanding that he is Eric's father. There is, in fact, a want of coherence in Incognito, and interest would centre exclusively in the two chief characters but for the personal charm of Claire, as represented by Mrs. Beerbohm Tree. This is a particularly bright and agreeable sketch; and, as will be judged from what has already been said, the principal parts receive the amplest justice from Mr. Tree and Miss Geneviève Ward. The contrast between the emotional woman and the cold-blooded man is well conceived by the author and executed by the players. Vincent is a study of much artistic merit. At the present time there is little danger that an actor of Mr. Tree's calibre will exaggerate; if anything, he is likely to be too tame; but Mr. Tree avoids both the fault of the old school of acting and of the new. The detail and finish of his performance are remarkably good. He does nothing without a meaning, which is much, and he always makes his meaning clear to his audience, which is more. Miss Ward's exhibitions of feeling have a very genuine ring about them. Mr. Sidney Brough as Eric displays aptitude and intelligence which cannot fail to advance him in his profession. Mr. Gilbert Farquhar's old men have a pleasing resemblance. His Colonel Dupuis is much like other characters that he has portrayed, except that the Colonel has an oddly fluctuating French accent. Mr. Elwood and Miss Emilia Grattan fulfil creditably the tasks allotted to them. Mr. Aïdé's dialogue has literary merit of a sort which is rare in the contemporary theatre.

THE CROWN PRINCE.

THE progress of events in the Crown Prince's malady since the week of excitement in November last, when the disease was authoritatively declared to be cancer, has happily accorded with the dissentient opinion and the favourable forecast which we thought ourselves warranted in publishing on the 19th of that month. We pointed out that his Imperial Highness did not seem to share the apprehensions of his medical advisers; and we concluded that, "even with a formally recorded diagnosis of cancer against him, it is by no means clear that he will not have the more deliberate and reasoned judgment of the profession on his side." Our reasons for so dissenting from the generally accepted verdict were based upon the official record of the case published in London and Berlin the day before we wrote. On their own data, it seemed to us, the medical men had no warrant for a diagnosis of cancer. Inflammatory or catarrhal attacks, with small excrescences at various points on the surface of the larynx, had been coming and going for months. There was every probability that the inflammatory processes and the small outgrowths of the surface were of one and the same nature; and, in any comprehensive or synthetic view of the malady as a whole, it could not be cancer. That is the view which is at length entertained, with hesitation and wise head-shaking, in the organs of professional opinion. Last week a leading medical journal had got so far as to discover that the whole of the symptoms since the spring of last year might belong to one and the same morbid process, and that it had been perhaps a mistake to speak of a cancerous growth with certain inflammatory accompaniments. The marvel is that this common-sense reading of the history of events should not have been obvious from the first. It is against all precedent for a cancerous affection to be attended by inflammatory symptoms; there is, in fact, a certain antagonism between the two kinds of morbid action. Cancer is cancer, for one reason among others, just because it is not inflammation, or because it has ceased to be inflammation. It is a rather inchoate sort of pathology which fixes upon one excrescence or growth in the larynx, being the largest and most persistent of several, and calls that cancer, while all its attendant conditions are so much inflammation superadded. But it is nothing new to find a crude and haphazard pathology among specialists. Great and brilliant as their qualities are, these have been acquired at the sacrifice of some of the old-world reflectiveness and insight which saw things steadily and in their totality. In the history of medicine and surgery there is only one period which approaches ours in its cultivation of dexterity at the expense of thinking capacity—the Alexandrian period, a period of decadence more than a hundred years after the best Greek period. Then, too, did specialists flourish and branch out into all sorts of pedantic refinements: It may be doubted if even the cleverest of our modern surgeons would go so far as Erasistratus, who used to persuade his "liver-patients" (jecorosi) to submit to such an operation as would enable him to apply his medicaments directly to the ailing organ. It is not easy to beat that in the way of "local treatment."

His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince has been well advised to decline operative interference from first to last. The English physician who was called in has been fully justified by the course of events in the advice that he gave last summer. If he went back upon his original opinion, and assented to the German diagnosis of cancer at the consultation in November, the error, as we must now speak of it, was one that has had no practical consequences for the illustrious patient. The situation in November, it should be remembered, was difficult and complicated. The efforts of the surgeons were first of all directed to relieving the sudden and dangerous swelling (or œdema) of the upper part of the larynx. Having rescued their patient from that imminent peril, they proceeded to give an opinion on the disease which seemed to underlie and to occasion all those other and acute symptoms. Their verdict was cancer; but it was an opinion formed amidst adverse and distracting circumstances, and there is no doubt that it was to some extent, or unconsciously, a concession to the national prejudices that were then being freely expressed in Germany. Through all these inane doctors' differences the malady has pursued its own course towards a cure, which we may look to see completed before the winter is over. The diagnosis of cancer being set aside, there is nothing ominous remaining. An inflammatory ailment is doubtless apt to come back; and any inflammation in the throat is attended with some unusual risks. There is, however, no reason why the affection should return, either in the near or in the distant future. It would now seem to have almost spent its force, and his Imperial Highness is not going beyond correct prognostics when he looks forward to resuming his duties in the German capital before the summer.

LAWYERS IN PARLIAMENT.

THE two armies of the Union and the Separation have gone into winter quarters, and, except for an occasional sally, reconnaissance, or a single combat in front of the lines, the peace of Christmas has extended itself into the opening days of the new year. The single combats of which we have spoken are in more than one sense of a singular character. They are not very satisfactory, as Lord Salisbury in his speech at Liverpool acknowledged. Each champion thrusts and parries, and illustrates his mastership of fence, in the absence of an antagonist. He shows how he would dispose of his adversary if he had him before him, and the victory is of course complete, until it is reversed by a similar triumph on the part of the temporarily discomfited hero. The wit of the staircase, generally a belated display, has here its legitimate field and triumph, and the good things which, under the conditions of ordinary conflict, are simply the good things which might have been said, if they had been thought of in time, become the good things which are actually spoken. Repartee, which is in time three weeks after date, is easily within the resources of the most tardy improvisation. One of the most remarkable of these encounters is that in which Sir Henry James at Glasgow has demolished Sir William Harcourt in the sylvan retreats of the New Forest, to which he is attached, no doubt, by the pathetic memories associated with the fate of his illustrious but remote ancestor and namesake, William the Red. There is something touching in the conflicts of the two redoubtable knights. They had been friends—learned friends—in youth, bound together by a kind of Hermia and Helena attachment; if not working both on one sampler, yet sitting on one cushion, and, in a political sense, warbling of one song both in one key, taking sweet counsel together on the questions submitted to them as Law Officers of the Crown, and signing the same legal opinions. All this is changed; but the adversaries still remain friends—learned friends. We do not intend to imply that the phrase involves a contradictio in adjecto; but there is perhaps a qualification in the adjective. The friendships of lawyers are among the most remarkable and affecting incidents of English public life. They survive political alienation; they cross from one side of the House to the other; they overleap the gangway, and even endure, in the present division of parties, the more trying test of personal proximity on the same front bench. The friendships of lawyers, as Fox said of the new-born attachment between himself and Lord North, are eternal; their animosities are but things of the moment. The transformation in political controversies of a right honourable friend into a right honourable gentleman is usually quick and enduring; while a learned friend once is a learned friend for ever.

Lawyers as politicians are the subject frequently of a good deal of foolish and insincere disparagement. It is one of the perennial pleasantries of the House of Commons to receive with ironically approving cheers the allusion which is from time to time made to the unlearned Parliament of Henry IV.'s reign, from which lawyers were excluded. No doubt there is a type of lawyer whom it would be very undesirable to see in any considerable force in the House of Commons; the solicitor of the police court or of the Borough Sessions, the lawyers who swarm in the French Chambers and the American Congress, "the ministers," as Burke described them, "of municipal litigation; the fomentors and conductors of the petty war of village vexation." But the English Bar has made in both Houses of Parliament contributions to English statesmanship as splendid as any that have been furnished by any other order and condition of men. Burke's celebrated character of George Grenville illustrates at once the defects and merits of legal habits of mind as a training for politics. There are, of course, instances of men illustrious at the Bar who have been positive or comparative failures in Parliament. Erskine left a considerable part of his reputation behind him in the law courts. When, during the delivery of Erskine's first speech, Pitt, who had assumed a posture of close attention, and had made a great display of taking elaborate notes, gradually relaxed his attitude, detached his pencil from the paper, and finally threw them both on the table, Erskine's Parliamentary position was forejudged, and perhaps in some degree determined, by this rather unkind but effective by-play. There are numerous instances, for which we need not look beyond recent Parliaments, of considerable lawyers, and we dare say, from the professional point of view, even effective Law Officers of the Crown, who have dwindled into very insignificant politicians. The two sides of Westminster Hall—of which, however, in this connexion it is now an anachronism to speak—have no necessary connexion of equal or proportional success, and still less of success and failure. Mr. Perceval, who had been both Solicitor- and Attorney-General before he became Chancellor of the Exchequer and Prime Minister, was at least as great in Parliament as he had been at the Bar, and led the House of Commons with a success which his most brilliant rival never attained to. The same cannot be said of the Liberal lawyer, now chiefly recollected as the hero of the trial in the New Whig Guide, in which Henry Brougham was indicted for mutiny in having called the Hon. George Ponsonby an old woman. The names of Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir Hugh Cairns among English lawyers, and of Mr. Napier, Mr. Whiteside, and Mr. Edward Gibson among members of the Irish Bar, offer in our own time a few only of many instances of the conspicuous part played in politics by the legal profession. Lord Brougham in the House of Commons was more a politician who happened to be a lawyer than a lawyer who devoted himself to politics. But perhaps the part played by lawyers in political affairs has been greater in the House of Lords than in the House of Commons, mainly because it is in the Upper Chamber that they usually acquire a seat in the Cabinet. It is curious to think how often an ascendent and almost monarchical influence has been exercised in the House of Lords by Chancellors who had no ancestry to look back upon, or whose ancestry was discovered at the Herald's Office when their patents of peerage were made out. The authority of Camden and Mansfield was perhaps professional or judicial quite as much as political. But Lord Thurlow ruled, and even tyrannized, the Peers with absolute sway, and made a strong fight for Ministerial ascendency with Mr. Pitt, until the younger statesman got rid of him by a kind of coup d'état, which it would be improper to call a coup de Jarnac, for the perfidy was on Thurlow's side and not on Pitt's. Lord Eldon's authority in the Peers was scarcely inferior to that of Lord Thurlow, though it was differently exercised. Lord Lyndhurst, again, was a far more considerable politician than Sir John Copley; and Lord Cairns more than maintained, as Lord Ashbourne more than maintains, the position won in the Lower House by Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Gibson. Lord Brougham's failure in the House of Lords, whatever may be the reason of his still unexplained and mysterious exclusion from the Ministry of Lord Melbourne, was probably due mainly to the unsuitability, of which he himself had an almost pathetic foresight, of his organization to the environment in which he was placed. His stormy nature could scarcely live in the quiet atmosphere of the tapestry figures; and, if it had found its natural vent and occasion in the conflicts and tumults of the House of Commons, the extraordinary gambols in which it sought relief might have been spared.

There is undoubtedly a certain prejudice against lawyers in the House of Commons. They are supposed to enter it merely as a necessary condition of becoming Solicitor- or Attorney-General, and as a short cut to the Bench or the Woolsack. Of course lawyers are not indifferent to professional advancement. To say so is only to say that they are human beings as well as lawyers. But we have not to look beyond our own time for examples of pure and self-denying patriotism among them. Lord Selborne's career bears the stamp of a single-minded disinterestedness unique only, we are quite willing to believe, because the opportunities for displaying it have presented themselves to him more abundantly than to any of his contemporaries. Sir Henry James has shown in the controversy which now occupies the public mind a similar and a not less admirable readiness to sacrifice the highest post in his profession, and to endanger his political future, by fidelity to conviction. It is because Sir Henry James refused to sell the Union for the Lord Chancellorship that Sir Farrer Herschell is now Lord Herschell. The Selbornes and Jameses of the legal profession are as abundant as the Loughboroughs and—Sir William Harcourt will probably take it as a compliment if we add—the Harcourts. The member for Derby, talking of fidelity to principle and loyalty to his leader, is a spectacle at which it would be absurd to be angry. Sir William Harcourt is true to Sir William Harcourt, being at once his own political principle and his own leader. His talk of fidelity to conviction and devotion to Mr. Gladstone, no doubt, amuses himself as much as it amuses any one else; and he would, we are sure, be the first to admit that the whole thing is a stupendous joke. But, though Sir William Harcourt has become a very conspicuous politician, the propriety would be doubtful of including him among the double-firsts of law and politics. The Parliamentary Bar is not the most learned branch of the legal profession; and international law, as the expounder of which "Historicus" won a certain notoriety in the columns of the Times, is not law at all, but rather morality—a distinction which accounts for Sir William Harcourt's proficiency in it. Even in politics Sir William Harcourt is more of a public entertainer than a political leader. His performances are Harcourt at Home, and are displays rather of the Mathews, or even of the Woodin and Maccabe, type than contributions to public business. His peculiar position in politics cannot be considered as throwing any light upon the place of lawyers in Parliament.

BONAMY PRICE.

THE death at the age of eighty of Mr. Bonamy Price, Professor of Political Economy at Oxford, removes to many it will almost seem prematurely—a familiar figure, not only from Oxford, but from the social and literary world, amid the regrets of his friends, whose name was legion, while neither in the University nor elsewhere can he have left any enemies behind him. Mr. Price exhibited in a remarkable degree what Mr. Matthew Arnold—who was once his pupil at Rugby—would call "distinction"; there was indeed something about him, not easy to define, but which all who had the happiness of knowing him would recognize as unique. He was dogmatic, crotchety, and combative, without betraying the faintest trace of arrogance or of bitterness, and as it used to be said of Charles II. that he could refuse a favour with better grace than his unfortunate brother could grant it, so it may quite truly be said of Bonamy Price that he could dispute every inch of ground with an opponent—and he was very fond of doing so—with more thorough geniality than most disputants would show in expressing their agreement. He had all the excitability without a particle of the proverbial irritability of genius. For genius he undoubtedly possessed, though it may perhaps be questioned whether the Chair of Political Economy gave the most felicitous scope for its exercise. But his Oxford professorship represents one phase only of a long life of incessant and multifarious activity. He was one of those men to whom energetic action is as the elixir of life, and who feel no temptation, unless under pressure of failing health, to rest and be thankful. To the last indeed his mental vigour struggled hard against the advance of bodily decay. His boyhood had already given promise of the intellectual power and the warmth of natural affection which distinguished him in after life Born in Guernsey and educated at a private tutor's, without the great advantage of a public school training, he had yet formed friendships among his fellow-pupils—one of them was the too famous Smith O'Brien, another, the late Mr. Ambrose de Lisle, became afterwards a zealous Roman Catholic—destined in spite of all differences of opinion to last through life. A boy coming up to the University with such antecedents is necessarily placed at a disadvantage both social and intellectual, and Bonamy Price moreover was an undergraduate of Worcester, which did not in those days hold at all a high place among Oxford Colleges. He succeeded however in gaining the exceptional honour of a double-first in the Michaelmas term of 1829. Among his companions in the Classical first was the late Charles Eden, who afterwards succeeded Mr. Newman as Vicar of St. Mary's. That was before the beginning of "the Oxford Movement," but the future leaders were silently preparing for the fray, like knights of old watching their armour, and it is interesting to know that among the friends of the Worcester undergraduate were included both the Newman brothers. The younger, Francis, who has since passed through such strange religious vicissitudes, was his contemporary and fellow-collegian; the elder and more illustrious was already a Fellow of Oriel when Price came into residence, and became Vicar of St. Mary's during his undergraduate time. No two men could well differ more widely in theological conviction, but their friendship remained unbroken. Another friendship dating from the same period, more eventful in its direct influence on Price's future career, was that of the hitherto little known Dr. Arnold, whose occasional pupil he was at Laleham and who in 1828 became Head Master of Rugby. That circumstance practically determined his career. Dr. Arnold had a keen discernment of character, and he recognized at once in the young Worcester undergraduate the fitting instrument to aid him in the great Rugby reform which was to leave its mark on the entire public school education of England. Price therefore after taking his degree did not stand for a fellowship, but went at the beginning of 1830 as an Assistant Master to Rugby.

This is not the place to write or rewrite the familiar story of Rugby under Arnold. Is it not written for the gods in Stanley's Life of Arnold, for men, and boys, in Tom Brown? But it must not be forgotten that in that momentous enterprise Bonamy Price took no insignificant part. He was for two years Mathematical, and Classical Master at Rugby for eighteen years, covering the whole of Dr. Arnold's régime from 1830 to the end. For six of these years he had charge of the Fifth Form, and he then succeeded Prince Lee, afterwards Bishop of Manchester, as master of "the Twenty," i.e. the élite of the Upper Vth, during the final interval before they passed under the immediate control of the Head-Master in the VIth Form. It follows of course that every single distinguished Rugbeian during those eighteen years—that is during the golden age of Rugby—came under his moulding hand. It is needless to attempt an enumeration here, but conspicuous among them were the late Dean Stanley and Professor Conington and the present Deans of Westminster, Durham, and Llandaff. Meanwhile Mr. Price also had a boarding-house, and among his pupils may be mentioned the late Henry Smith, Savilian Professor at Oxford, and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. On clever boys high up in the school, and especially on clever boys of the "earnest" type it was supposed to be the special boast of the Rugby of that date to foster, the teaching and personal influence of such a man could not fail to produce a very stimulating effect. The vivid impression left on Arthur Stanley's mind by his description of the chief orator of the day at the Oxford Union—W. E. Gladstone to wit—is recorded in a schoolboy letter still extant. In later years by the way Mr. Gladstone thought proper, when defending the Irish Land Act of 1881 in his place in Parliament, to formulate a solemn sneer at Mr. Bonamy Price's boldness "in applying the principles of abstract political economy to the people and circumstances of Ireland, exactly as if he had been proposing to legislate for the inhabitants of Saturn or Jupiter." It was not long before many besides Mr. Bonamy Price saw reason to think it might have been as well for the interests of Ireland and of the British Empire if Mr. Gladstone had paid a little more regard in that same legislation to the "abstract principles" he so loftily ignored and a little less to his own peculiar estimate of "people and circumstances." But this by the way. Had Mr. Price been in holy orders he might not improbably have been called to succeed to the chair of Arnold on his death, in 1842. As it was he retained his post at Rugby for yet eight years longer under Dr. Tait, but resigned it in 1850 when again a new reign began. For the next eighteen years he held no public office, but was constantly occupied in business or literature, while he served also on two Royal Commissions—one on the Scottish Fisheries, the other on the Irish Queen's Colleges—one of his chief studies during the period being that of political economy.

It was natural enough therefore that, when the Chair of Political Economy at Oxford became vacant in 1868, Mr. Bonamy Price should be elected to it. But it is amusing and at first sight rather puzzling to be told that he came in as the elect of the Conservative party in Convocation against Mr. Thorold Rogers, the outgoing professor, who sought re-election as the Liberal favourite. For Bonamy Price, as became the intimate friend and colleague of Arnold, was reputed a Liberal of the Liberals; but then he was a Liberal of the old school, which means inter alia that he was very emphatically not what would now be termed a Gladstonian, and already twenty years ago the "little rift" was beginning to show itself. With Liberalism of the kind exhibited then and since by Mr. Thorold Rogers he had less than no sympathy; and on its later development, in the adoption by a section of English Liberal statesmen of the Parnellite programme, which they had themselves not long before sternly denounced as treason to the Empire, he gazed, as at some strange and ugly portent, with a mingled horror of bewilderment and disgust. "Where are we?" he would exclaim, as he scanned their marvellous evolutions. He was essentially a Liberal in the English, not the Continental, sense of the word, and nobody felt a profounder scorn for that "illiberality of Liberals" which has long been a byword on the other side of the Channel, and of late unfortunately has begun to get naturalized nearer home. In educational matters he was Conservative enough to be a strenuous defender of the system of classical training—notably of the study of Greek—as the best and most searching discipline for a boy's mind. And the same downrightness and consistency of principle and absence of party bias may be traced in his religious beliefs. He was a Broad Churchman of the Arnoldian type, and was the author, or was credited with the authorship, of some racy strictures on "the Anglo-Catholic theory" in the Edinburgh Review. But keen and incisive as was the satire he expended on a theological system he disliked and had very imperfectly mastered, his sarcasm was never illnatured or violent; there was nothing of the bitterness Dr. Arnold unfortunately allowed himself in his fierce philippic against "the Oxford Malignants." This arose partly no doubt from a difference of temperament between the two men, closely as in many respects they agreed, partly from the fact just now referred to, that Price had, while Arnold had not, maintained throughout intimate personal relations with leading minds of a school opposite to his own. Both he and Arnold were deeply religious men, and if they were decided, not to say aggressive, Protestants they had no leaning at all to Agnosticism. John Conington used to say that, if Arnold had lived to see the later developments of Broad Church theology—and it has developed further in the negative direction since then—he would have recoiled in horror and taken refuge in Evangelicalism. Be that as it may, Bonamy Price, who did live to see it, became, not exactly an Evangelical, but a much less uncompromising assailant of High Church or Catholic principles than he had once been. He was never a High Churchman, but he felt and frankly avowed a religious sympathy whether with High Churchmen or Roman Catholics which he could not feel with Agnostics. But these matters are too sacred to be further dwelt on here. We spoke just now of Mr. Price's unfailing geniality of disposition; this was the more remarkable because from first to last, and in speech even more than on paper, he was one of the most irrepressible and pugnacious of disputants. But if he enjoyed nothing better than running an adversary into a corner "in the keen encounter of their wits," he never for a moment lost his temper, and if ever the rival disputants lost theirs, the fault lay entirely with themselves. His irony, however keen, played like summer lightning, lambent and innocuous. Nor could any rational opponent fail to perceive that the motive impulse was not desire of conquest but sincere enthusiasm for what he believed to be the cause of truth. It has been said of him with absolute justice that "his heart was emphatically in the right place"; he was true in friendship, tender in feeling, and chivalrous towards those with whom he most widely disagreed. There was a time when both Tories and High Churchmen found in him one of their sturdiest assailants, but there is probably no Tory or High Churchman who was personally acquainted with him by whom his memory will not be cherished with a feeling of affectionate regret.

THE GROVES OF HAWARDEN.

THE groves of Blarney aren't worth a farden,
  Whin the groves of Hawarden amazed I scan;
And Blarney Castle can't one moment wrastle
  Wid the Gothic mansion of the Grand Ould Man.
There the shamrock and thistle together nestle,
  And ye'd fairly whistle at the fragrant leeks,
Or at Joseph Gillies, wid his Amaryllis,
  Gatherin' orange lilies in his Sunday breeks.

'Tis Misther Gladstone that controuls these regions,
  Like the Emperor Nayro or Pope Joan of Arc;
Not even Pharaoh wid all his legions
  Could bombard that hayro from this princely park.
For the cute ould spider has labyrinths round him,
  Batin' Rosamund's bower itself to explore;
And you're fairly addled whin you think you've cot him,
  To find he's skedaddled by some fresh back door.

In these crooked courses he has grand resources
  For confabulations wid Government Whips;
And open shpots to resayve deputations,
  Or to turn a pinny by the sale of chips.
And quiet corners for artful roguin',
  And sly colloguin' wid beau and belle:—
Professor Rogers and Mrs. Prodgers,
  Madame Pell-Mellikoff and Misther Parnell.

And after his speeches and fellin' of beeches,
  Shlippin' into knee-breeches and Irish frieze;
He's off, the sly fox, like a modern Guy Faux,
  His Gaelic games to organize.
On his pleasure-ground there he prepares for ructions
  By erecting obstructions from place to place;
While Charles Stuart Parnell, wid skill infernal,
  Arranges his three-legged obstacle-race.

He links Earl Granville to the martyr Mandeville,
  And Lord Herschell and Dillon ye'd see him yoke,
And Charlie Dawson to Sir Wilfrid Lawson,
  And Misther Bradlaugh to Archbishop Croke.
And Campbell-Tannerman and Docthor Bannerman
  He mixes up in his merry-go-round;
And sets George Trevelyan riding postilion,
  In green and vermilion, for a million pound.

  Wid T. P. O'Connor and Proteus Blunt;
And little Tim Healy, wid his toy shillelagh,
  Wid Earl Spencer startin' a Land-League hunt.
And some of these athletes have stripped their coats off,
  And some have turned them upon their backs;
While Sir Patrick Ford and Sir Vordant Falstaff
  Bounce on stark naked in a brace of sacks.

There's a saycret grotto, where two-headed Otto,
  That prize chameleon, in the dusk is found,
Wid Prince Krapotkin, and Misther Godkin,
  And Sir Edward Watkin, tunnellin' underground.
And there's a fishpond like the Slough of Deshpond,
  Wid slimy waters and throubled flood,
Full of Irish pikes and Sassenach leeches
  Fattenin' together in the emerald mud.

And there's an organ where ould Osborne Morgan
  Plays wedding marches wid Morganatic grace,
Or sings obbligato to the Moonlight sonata
  In the most funayreal tones of his bass.
And opóssite Taffy ye'll sometimes find Mahaffy,
  Sipping his caffy as they do abroad;
Or silver-tonged Morley wid the lures of the Loreley Singing "Come with me to Hawarden, my Maude, my Maude!"

There's statues standin' at points commandin'
  Of ivery landin', to enslave the view;
—There's Matthew Harris, in plaster of Paris,
  Wid Pontius Pilate and O'Donnell Aboo!
And there's a picture, beyant all stricture,
  —'Twould make Raphael himself wid envy expire—
'Tis of William O'Brien, that Barbary Lion,
  Airin' his shirt by his dungeon fire.

So now to take leave of this marvellous mansion,
  Which my poor scansion could never enshrine;
But were I Horace, or Lewis Morris,
  Like any shoeblack I'd make it shine.

AMONG the authors who have tempted many translators Virgil is perhaps the most difficult. A translator of Homer may fairly hope to reproduce some one side of Homer well enough for his work to be justified. It is true that Homer is infinite; for that very reason our expectations are moderate. There is room for many translations of Homer, as for many schools of landscape-painting. It is even difficult for a scholar who has any true sense of poetry and any tolerable command of rhythm to be wholly and hopelessly un-Homeric. But in Virgil we have the deliberate and exquisite work of a scholar, addressed to Roman readers educated in Greek literature, aiming at a definite artistic effect, and achieving it, we had almost said, with unique success. The translator's problem is to reproduce that effect for the modern reader, not merely to produce a respectable poem containing the same matter; and by his approximation to this ideal he must be judged. His work has to be Virgilian (if we may speak in a seeming, but only seeming, truism), or it is naught. Now the obstacles in the translator's way are grave and various. The metrical difficulty would be enough by itself. In Virgil's hands the Latin hexameter is an instrument not only of great power, but of extraordinary compass and flexibility, and it is used with unerring mastery. Virgil's command of appropriate words and metrical effects is absolute. His power of combining the pomp of sound and the charm of association in cunningly placed names and epithets has been rivalled only by Milton. In the power of maintaining a certain dignified level of style in every kind of matter he is perhaps unrivalled altogether. Suppose, however, that we possessed an equivalent to the Virgilian hexameter whereby the English translator were competent to follow his original in all this, there would still remain something incommunicable—the strain of refined learning that runs through Virgil's work everywhere, now and then becoming manifest in an express touch of Greek elegance or of native Roman antiquity, but always with us, and felt even when not manifest. These things are, of course, familiar to scholars, and have often been pointed out. We call them to mind in order to show the general grounds on which we think the ideal translation of Virgil even less likely to become actual in our time than the ideal translation of Homer. We believe that Lord Tennyson, the most Virgilian of English poets since Milton, could give us an almost ideal specimen if he thought fit. More than a specimen could not be expected.

Such being the adventure that Lord Justice Bowen has taken up, he has acquitted himself with the honours of a scholar and a man of taste, and to our mind with something more. He is constantly meritorious, often felicitous; and he is more in sympathy with the refinement of Virgil's work than any previous translator. He has not been led astray by either archaic or modern affectation, but has aimed at rendering in good literary English the effects which Virgil produced, as a rule, within the limits of current Augustan Latin. The Lord Justice has not troubled himself to find conventional parallels for Virgil's occasional archaisms. It might possibly be done; it is a thing better left alone than overdone or spoilt. But the most striking novelty of Lord Justice Bowen's version is the metre. This is in any case an independent addition to the resources of English verse. It is arrived at by striking off the last syllable of the English hexameter, and the result is excellent. Instead of a sickly exotic (for English hexameters have never really thriven, and we think they have had every chance), we get a line with a real English movement, going easily and gracefully in rhyme, and capable of no small variety. We suspect that, in order to develop its resources fully, it would be well to forget its origin. The same movement may be found involved in forms used by Mr. Swinburne. Here are some of Lord Justice Bowen's verses, taken at random from the Eclogues and the Æneid:—

Tell me in what far region the names of kings are a sign Writ on the wild flower's petals—and thine my Phyllis shall be.

Life of the gods shall be his, to behold with gods in their might Heroes immortal mingled, appear himself in their sight,
Rule with his father's virtues a world at peace from the sword.

Tired of toil, Troy's mariner sons for the neighbouring land Eagerly make on the wind, and turn toward Africa's strand.
Down a secluded inlet a spot lies, fashioned to be Haven of rest, by an island that spreads her sides to the sea.

Now consider the structure of some of Mr. Swinburne's rolling lines:—

Our | souls and the bodies they wield at their will are absorbed in the life | they adore—
In the | life that endures no burden, and bows not the forehead, and bends | not the knee—
In the | life everlasting of earth and of heaven, in the laws that atone | and agree.

In the great battle-chorus of Erechtheus many lines occur which differ from Lord Justice Bowen's form only in using up the rejected syllable of the English hexameter at the beginning of the line; the difference is, however, material, as the regular presence of this anacrusis, in addition to the ending being regularly spondaic, changes the character of the movement as a whole:—

O | wind with the young sun waking, and winged for the same wide way.
Air | shudders with shrill spears crossing, and hurtling of wheels that roar.
White | frontlet is dashed upon frontlet, and horse against horse reels hurled.

This will serve to prove, if proof were needed, that the Lord Justice's verse may claim the rights of an English denizen; and we agree with him as to its capacities. The chief difficulty for the purpose in hand is to prevent it from running too fast and too lightly. In the Eclogues, where Virgil has not developed the weight of his verse, the translation is often almost perfect. We could wish for nothing better than the Pharmaceutria as given by Lord Justice Bowen:—

As in a fire that is one and the same, grows harder the clay, Softer the wax, may Daphnis be wrought by passion to-day.
Crumble the cake, let the boughs of the bay-tree crackle and blaze.
Daphnis has fired me with passion, I light over Daphnis the bays.
Homeward bring from the city, my chants, bring Daphnis again.

When we come to the more solemn notes of the Æneid the task is harder. Such lines as

Ibant obscuri sola sub nocte per umbram
Perque domos Ditis vacuas et inania regna could really be Englished only by some one who had the secret of Milton. Lord Justice Bowen gives:—

So unseen in the darkness they went by night on the road,
Down the unpeopled kingdom of Death, and his ghostly abode.

This goes something too trippingly for us. We know that it is taking a mean advantage of a translator who has borne the burden of many days to offer amendments in detail; but, after all, our amendment may be no improvement. We would suggest, however, something like this:—

So through coverts of lone dark night they went on their way, Desolate halls of Death, realms void of the living day.

There is a peculiar difficulty about the sententious lines of prophecy or exhortation which are frequent in Virgil, and several of which are currently quoted. It is almost impossible not to sacrifice either their directness or their weightiness in a translation.

Tu ne cede malis sed contra audentior ito,
Qua tua te Fortuna sinet is almost literally rendered by

Yield not thou to disasters, confront them boldly, and more Boldly—as destiny lets thee.

But the voice that spoke the words is gone, as irrecoverably as the Sibylline leaves themselves. This might be the advice of some highly respectable Cumæan Polonius; it is not the oracle of a God. Lord Justice Bowen is more successful, in many places nobly successful, with the prophecy of Anchises in the same book. But lacks the fulness and solemnity of

Thine, O Roman, remember, to reign over every race

Tu regere imperio populos, Romane, memento.

The difficulty is complicated by a certain tendency of the Lord Justice's metre to run into cadences rather on the prosaic side of the line between elevated prose and verse.

So supreme was the labour of founding the Roman race might with very slight change, or even with none, be worked into a peroration; whereas we feel that though perfectly straightforward, could never be Latin prose.

We have only one exception to make to Lord Justice Bowen's Latinity; it is in the first few lines of the Æneid. "Dum conderet urbem" cannot mean "building his town," which would be "dum condit." It means "until he built his town," according to the fixed rule of classical Latin. Perhaps, however, the translation is deliberately lax to avoid an awkward multiplication of words. The same locution is correctly rendered elsewhere. Enough of minute criticism, however. The translation as a whole is both scholarlike and poetical, and it is often exceedingly happy in transferring to English the peculiar grace of Virgil's descriptions. We take a specimen from the first Æneid:—

Every wave that arrives from the seaward breaks and divides
Into a curving current that round in a channel glides.

* Virgil in English Verse—Eclogues and Æneid I.—VI. By the Right Hon. Sir Charles Bowen. London: John Murray.

Huge cliffs flank it on either extreme; twin peaks to the skies Point in defiance; beneath them a slumbering water lies,
Silent and safe. On the height, for a background, glimmering glade,
O'er it the sombre gloom of a forest tossing in shade.
Facing the deep is a cavern inlaid in a precipice; sweet
Fountain freshets within it, and stone unhewn for a seat;
Home of the nymphs. Here weariest barks ride ever unmoored,
Never to shore by the bite of an anchor's hook are secured.

Here, as in Virgil, there is not one far-fetched word, and yet every feature is clear and individual. We think, indeed, that not only young students of Virgil, but scholars of riper years, may thank Lord Justice Bowen for an excellent commentary; he brings out several points which it is easy to miss in a hasty reading of the Latin. The renderings of "silvis scena coruscis" and "fronte sub adversa scopulis pendentibus antrum" are as good as can be; the artificial touch of scena is exactly hit off.

Work of this kind must stand before scholars on its own merits, and a reviewer must test it, as the Germans say, objectively. Having done this to the best of our skill, and concluded that the Lord Justice's work will stand very well, we are free to express our particular pleasure in its coming from such a quarter. The English Bench has a long tradition of learning and accomplishment outside the strictly professional field. However uncouth our law may seem, even at this day, in some respects, we have always been able to point to judges who were not mere specialists. Admirable expositions of the history of English institutions, discussions of fundamental principles which are models of scientific style, nay more, delightful specimens of scholarly wit and humour, lie hidden, for all men save English lawyers, in the wilderness of our law reports. Seldom have our judges found time to convince the world of letters that a scholar does not renounce his part therein by devoting himself to law. Lord Justice Bowen will be honourably remembered among the exceptions. There is a wicked story told of Fearne, the author of the classical treatise on Contingent Remainders, that he burnt his books of poetry and humanities at the bidding of a misguided conscience. We fear, too, it is pretty well vouched for; but here, at all events, is better authority to the contrary.

NOVELS AND TALES.*

IN Mr. Westall's new book, which is described as "The Story of a Fortune," the fortune is a great deal bigger than the story is interesting. Of course Her Two Millions is very far from being unreadable. But two millions sterling is a vast deal of money. Even Monte Cristo would have found it respectable; beside it even the hoard accumulated and buried by the thrifty commander of the Walrus is as it were a mere savings-bank deposit; and one cannot refrain from regret, that with the courage to invent so noble a property Mr. Westall should not have been able to combine the wit to deal by his invention as it deserves. His hero and heroine are, in truth, quite third-rate people. There is nothing magnificent or even abnormal about either of them. It is true the lady has red hair and is the daughter of an Englishman slain in the cause of Italian unity; but she is "kep out of her rights" for many years, during which she is brought up as the grandchild of a common Swiss peasant; and, though the villain of the story does actually go so far as to murder his true and lawful wife in order to offer her marriage, she is not, for all that, the exciting and romantic creature which the heiress of so prodigious an estate should be. One feels that, by all the laws of fiction, she is entitled to not a penny over twenty thousand pounds. The dignity of two millions becomes her not at all. She might take hands with the heiress whose father has "struck ile" at Pittsburg, or whose uncle has done the trick at Chicago with a common corner in pork. P. nly she is not equal to the responsibilities of her magnificence; plainly she is meant for nothing gaudier than a pair of nursemaids and a neat suburban villa; plainly, in three words, the hero and she are well matched, and it is hard to associate them with two millions of money. He, it must be noted, is a good enough specimen of the common (or garden) journalist. He dawns upon us as the sub-editor of a country paper; it is as the sub-editor of the Helvetic News—a sheet which is issued, sometimes not without difficulty, at Geneva—that he fixes his as good as virgin affections on the young woman with the two millions; it is as a leader-writer and special correspondent that he wins her for his own; it is as the proprietor and editor of an ideal in journalism—a print in which a man may say the thing he will, provided that he says it over his signature—that he sets about enjoying his spouse's wealth. The ambition is surely of the tamest. Where are the stratagems of Edmond Dantès? The great whims of Fortunio where? Beside this mild and temperate form of luxury the madness of Sir Epicure Mammon seems respectable, and the memories of Facino Cane are exalted into romance. We hasten to repeat that in its way the history of these eminently middle-class young people is quite readable. Mr. Westall has done his best to make and tell a story, and in his way he has succeeded. His personages are natural to the point of being humdrum; even his villain might exist, and scarce awaken a suspicion in the breast of (say) a maiden-aunt; his journalistic interiors are evidently done from life. We complain, indeed, of nothing except the disparity between his idea and the circumstances by whose means he has chosen to compass its development. A fortune of two millions of pounds sterling is a great, an impressive, an august creation; and to waste it on a couple of sentimentalists, whose little life is rounded with a "serious" journal, is to offend against romance. Mr. Westall can scarce suppress his book; but he has only to follow his Marchioness, and "make believe very much," to imagine that it is still to write, and to be in a position to consider his admirable find from a right and fitting point, and handle it—with or without assistance—as it merits.

Mrs. Spender has a scientific, not to say a learned, habit of mind. On p. 4 of Her Brother's Keeper we are introduced to "an amorphous curtain of mist"; on p. 6 to a wind that "seemed to grow solid like a man in a rage prepared to throw stones"; on p. 21 to a quantity of scenery of the sort that "Sir Isaac Walton"—who must not be confounded with excellent Master Izaak Newton, author of The Compleat Angler—"or Thoreau would have loved"; on p. 99 to "the false devices of a furrowed face"; on p. 125 to a heroine with "an antiseptic quality, not only for counteracting evil, but for rendering her scarcely aware of its existence." On p. 129 this prodigious young creature is shown to us as she appeared "after taking her modest tea" at, not a London coffee-shop, but a Paris restaurant. It is true the Paris she inhabits is a Paris where is written such French as that of "grandes et petites appartements"; where people ascend "à sixième," and exclaim, when they go to the Morgue, and look at a drowned young woman, not "Oh, la belle morte!" but "Quel beau cadavre!"—just as though they were translating from the English, and knew all about the "lovely corpse" of Sarah Gamp's dream. For the rest, Ursula Campion (such is her highly stimulating name) has not only the "antiseptic quality" aforesaid but "proportions" that are "gracious" and "not meagre," a nose that is "piquantly rounded at the end," and (it need scarce be added) "a rich abundance of red-brown hair"—hair which on solemn occasions, such as dinner-parties, is capable of turning from "red-brown" to "gold-bronze." Also she has ideas, and when, as the effect of certain circumstances which it would scarce be fair to describe in detail, she inherits a fortune and a house near Bath, she is able to look out upon a landscape "mainly composed of clear greys, such as Turner loved, with very little green." Worst of all, she has a brother—a youth with hyacinthine eyes, and an hereditary appetite for drink of such abnormal perversity that, being at Oxford, having opportunities of knowing better and rejoicing in plenty of money, he is dolt and dullard enough to get drunk on "yellow chartreuse." This last touch of luxury does something smack of the paradises of the noble Ouida:—the paradises where persons of genius, their locks crowned with roses dipped in Burgundy, recline on summer afternoons under the great elms in the quad of Trinity, quaffing maraschino from its native pewter. The heroine, we should add, is subject to not a little of the roughest treatment. Thus, not far from the end of the first volume, she is confronted, "antiseptic quality" and all, with her future husband, the tremendous Wilfrid Fielding, and is called upon to remark, the instant he has saved her from a watery grave, that he is blessed with, imprimis, a pair of "red, sinewy hands," and, secundo, a "magnificent dome-like forehead," and, having noted these things, to feel "as if there was a sympathetic relatedness between them," which, do she what she might, "would make it impossible for him long to remain a stranger." Wilfrid—"a man who has taken his first class at Oxford, and of whom great things are prophesied"—is presently engaged as Ursula's brother's tutor. It is suspected that the effect of "dome-like forehead" may be improving; it is known that none "could be more calculated to counteract by his own high tone those habits which" the Hyacinthine-Eyed One has contrived to contract. It is painful to have to record that the dome-like forehead and the high tone are both unavailing; and that Wilfrid has to find employment for these gifts in the purlieus of Toynbee Hall. How the couple are united it is not for us to say; neither shall we do more than hint that their union is delayed for a number of years by a quaint choice of circumstances, prominent among which are a really idiotic murder and a rather original and captivating mesmerist. It will be enough to remark that we take leave of them "like a couple of children in their holiday, not ashamed of their innocent joy." The gifted Wilfrid indeed is happy in his Ursula. How should he be otherwise, seeing that she has never worn stays, and in costume has "a style of her own, which in its strange mixture of fashion and simplicity" has been known to remind an observer of "the drapery of a Greek goddess"? How should he be otherwise, when as she wandered by the sea she has been caught in the act of speculating "on the forty millions of infusoria said to make up a cubic inch"?

The two volumes of George Stalden, further described as "A Personal Memoir of the time of the American Revolutionary War," are given forth as the genuine utterance of a gentleman who knew Burke and Rodney and Major André, and had some share in the struggle that ended in the discomfiture of Britain and the creation of the United States. They might be all that, and more; but it cannot fairly be said of them that they are good reading. The style is smooth, formal, and colourless; the facts are carefully set forth; the characters are carefully drawn; the dialogue is carefully redacted; the whole thing has the look of having cost the writer a world of pains. But the book has the great fault of being not alive. D'Artagnan's ride to Belle-Isle is probably a tissue of impossibilities; but it never for an instant makes the reader (unless, perhaps, he writes for a "serious" print, and entertains a high opinion of the quality of his intellectuals) wish he were done with it; and the same may be asserted with confidence of any number of episodes in the work of the great artist to whom D'Artagnan is due. The reverse is the case with George Stalden. We have no sooner begun upon it than we are impatient to reach the end of it; not because it carries us on to a consummation at which, for excitement's sake, we want to arrive, but because we are longing to get it all over and have done with it. That is one of the differences between a book which is confessedly a common essay in fiction and a book which professes to be an authentic record of experience and fact.

Una Merideth, the heroine of Una's Revenge: a Picture of Real Life in the Nineteenth Century, is a lovely schoolgirl of sixteen summers. The creation of an author whose taste for poetry has been fed full upon Longfellow, Faber, and Æschylus in "Anstices' Translation," she has the bluest eyes and the purest heart in the world. Also, she has an enemy, one Eva Maitland, and out of this comes martyrdom. Una's father is the Dean and Chapter (Melville Gray calls him the Dean and Chaplain, but that is obviously a mistake) of Shanghai; so that her condition is naturally all that could be wished. Of Eva, on the other hand, we hear that her "home was not a happy one"; "her father's time was engrossed in literary pursuits"; and as she never knew "the enervating, ennobling influence of firm religious training," it is plain that she is destined to go to the bad. Una is the head of her class; and Eva, by a sequence of machinations too dreadful to be discovered in these columns, gets her expelled, and is complimented in her stead with "a beautifully bound edition of Shakspeare's works," and, "in addition, the Bishop's own prize, always given to the girl standing first on the College lists, a lovely copy of Keble's Christian Year." Una has brain fever, but on her recovery goes to another school, where she rises to the top of her form, and is presented in due course with "a beautifully bound edition of The Divine Master." This reconciles her with life, and soon after her triumph is complete. Eva and she are at a ball, and Eva has just told lies about her, when she (Eva) catches fire at a Chinese lantern, bursts "like a brilliant meteor upon the crowd, only to vanish again," and, before she can be captured and put out, is burnt beyond recovery. Una visits her couch of pain, and there is an affecting interview; after which, we are told, the clergyman in attendance, "following the expressed wishes of the patient, brought and placed in Una's unwilling hands" both "Keble's Christian Year and the edition of Shakspeare's works," and so made everybody happy. It is fully understood that "the Bishop will alter the name"; and in this and other assurances Eva dies. Una, it need scarce be added, marries a serious and very gentlemanlike Major, and thus is able to bring to bear upon him, greatly to his improvement, what our author (or her printer) calls "the soothing, enervating influence of woman." And when we bid her farewell, she is not only a wife and mother—she is also standing at her own front door, and therewithal is "enfolded in the strong arms of her husband, who could not bear her out of his sight." The moon, it is pleasant to know, is quite equal to the occasion; for, though it has but "just risen," it is "casting its bright beams of light and illuminating the whole scene with an exquisite grandeur, so perfect in its colouring as to seem almost unearthly." It is impossible to avoid the reflection that Colonel Wardle (the Major's name is Wardle, and he is now a Colonel) is scarce less happy in his moon than in his Una. We regret to add that of the beautifully-bound edition of Shakspeare's works and the lovely copy of Keble there is no word more.

Mrs. Bradshaw, in Gabrielle, tells the story of two sisters, whose mother, en route for Liverpool and New York, departs this life at a country inn, leaving nothing by which herself and her two babies, Gabrielle and Bertha, can be identified. Both children are adopted, and lose touch of each other for many years. When they come together again Gabrielle, the elder, is passing poor on forty pounds a year, while Bertha, the younger, is as rich as a Jew. Gabrielle, who has all the virtues, is companion to an eccentric lady; Bertha, who has none, is her own mistress, and, rather out of pride than anything else, she invites her sister to stay with her. They go to Switzerland together; and while they are there they quarrel about a young man, one Leonard Trench, who is in love with Gabrielle, but wants to marry Bertha's money. They part, of course, and Gabrielle discovers her father in a certain Sir Charles Rothney, whose good angel she becomes, and at whose noble mansion she presently is wooed and won by a fit and proper suitor, a gentleman of antique strain, full of most rare differences. Leonard, meanwhile, has been rejected by Bertha, and Bertha has married a shadowy peer; so that everybody has his deserts, and, without a touch of remorse on the reader's part, the whole thing may be instantly forgotten.

THE announcement some months ago that Dr. Guppy had in preparation two works on the Solomon Islands was received with general satisfaction, and we venture to think that the handsome volumes which are now before the public will more than justify the anticipations that had been formed respecting them. Scientific men at home were more or less aware that the author had been closely occupied with the study of the general features of the Solomon group during the repeated visits of the surveying vessel to which he was attached as surgeon; but perhaps few were prepared for results so wide in scope, so full of accurate observation, and so carefully elaborated in all their details as those which now claim our attention. It may be explained at the outset that the two volumes, though externally uniform, are published as distinct works; the first containing a general account of the islands, together with observations on the anthropology, natural history, botany, and meteorology of the group, to which are added a translation of the long lost and little known Journal of Gallego, giving a narrative of the discovery of the islands by the Spaniards about the middle of the sixteenth century, and a chapter on the early history of geographical discovery in the Western Pacific generally; whilst the second is devoted more especially to the geology and physical features of the islands, with some reference also to their suitability for colonization.

The Solomon group, Dr. Guppy tells us, consists of seven or eight large mountainous islands, varying in length from seventy to one hundred miles, and a great number of smaller islands, ranging from fifteen or twenty miles in length, down to the tiny coral islet only half a mile across. Some of the larger islands present a massive profile attaining a height, in the case of Guadalcanar and Bougainville, of 8,000 to 10,000 feet. These are essentially volcanic, the rocks indicating great geological age, their lower slopes, to a height of 500 feet, flanked by comparatively recent calcareous formations. Of the smaller islands, some are volcanic, whilst others are composed mainly or entirely of coral limestone, or in part of friable deposits containing numerous organisms, and exhibiting the characters of the muds which were found on the Challenger expedition to be at present forming around oceanic volcanic islands, in depths of from 150 to 500 fathoms. Sometimes these recent deposits cover a central volcanic peak which has once been submerged. To the geologist, therefore, the islands offer a field at once varied and instructive; nor are their features less interesting from a zoological, botanical, or ethnological point of view. There are difficulties in the way of observation, it is true, some of them still insurmountable—the interior of many of the islands is inaccessible, the inhabitants have the credit of being something more than unfriendly to Europeans, and in some places the climate and surface conditions are such as conduce to fevers and other serious ailments. Nevertheless, these books are a testimony to how much may be done by a man who is in earnest, and who has the faculty of inspiring the natives with confidence. The troubles of the naturalist and his rewards are graphically set forth by the author in his introductory chapter:—

> Amongst the Solomon Islands [says he] the student of nature may be compared to a man who, having found a mine of great wealth, is only allowed to carry away just as much of the precious ore as he can bear about his person. For there can be no region in the world where he experiences more tantalization. Day after day he skirts the shores of islands of which science has no ken. Month after month he may scan, as I have done, lofty mountain-masses never yet explored, whose peaks rise through the clouds 7,000 to 10,000 feet above the sea. He may discern on the mountain-slopes the columns of blue smoke which mark the abodes of men who have never beheld the white man. But he cannot land except accompanied by a strong party; and he has therefore to be content usually with viewing such scenes from the deck of his vessel. Fortunately, however, there are some parts of the Solomon Group where the hostility of the natives has been to a great extent overcome by the influence of the missionaries and of the traders; but the interiors of the larger islands are, almost without exception, inhabited by fierce and treacherous tribes who forbid all approach. . . .
> When geologizing in these islands one labours under the very serious disadvantage of being unable to get any view or form any idea of the surroundings, on account of the dense forest-growth clothing both the slopes and summits of the hills, which is often impassable except by the rude native tracks that are completely hemmed in by trees on either side. Bush-walking, where there is no native track, is a very tedious process, and requires the constant use of the compass. In districts of coral limestone, such traverses are equally trying to the soles of one's boots and to the measure of one's temper. After being provokingly entangled in a thicket for some minutes, the persevering traveller walks briskly along through a comparatively clear space, when a creeper suddenly trips up his feet and over he goes to the ground. Picking himself up, he no sooner starts again when he finds his face in the middle of a strong web which some huge-bodied spider has been laboriously constructing. However, clearing away the web from his features, he struggles along until coming to the fallen trunk of some giant of the forest which obstructs his path, he with all confidence plants his foot firmly on it and sinks knee-deep into rotten-wood. With resignation he lifts his foot out of the mess and proceeds on his way, when he feels an uncomfortable sensation inside his helmet, in which, on leisurely removing it from his head, he finds his old friend the spider, with a body as big as a filbert, quite at his ease. Shaking it out in a hurry, he hastens along with his composure of mind somewhat ruffled. Going down a steep slope, he clasps a stout-looking areca palm to prevent himself falling, when down comes the rotten palm, and the long-suffering traveller finds himself once more on the ground. To these inconveniences must be added the peculiarly oppressive heat of a tropical forest, the continual perspiration in which the skin is bathed, and the frequent difficulty of getting water. There are, therefore, many drawbacks to the enjoyment of such excursions undertaken without an aim. But let there be some object to be gained, and it is astonishing how small a success amply repays the naturalist for all the toil. As an example of the tedious nature of bush-walking in these regions, I may state that, crossing the small island of Santa Anna from south to north—a distance of 2½ miles—occupied on one occasion five hours. For nearly the whole distance my path lay either through a dense forest-growth which had never been cleared since this little island first rose as a coral-atoll above the waves, or amongst tangled undergrowth which often succeeded effectually in barring the way. Rarely could I obtain a glimpse of my surroundings, and in consequence it was on my pocket-compass that I entirely depended. Coral-rock honeycombed into sharp tearing edges covered the slopes, my way lying between the large masses of this rock that lay about in strange confusion, the smaller blocks swaying about under my weight as if eager to rid themselves of their unusual burden. At one place the coral limestone over a space of about a hundred yards was perforated like a sieve by numerous holes two to three feet across and five to ten feet deep; but now and then a deep fissure appeared at the bottom of one of these cavities—leading Heaven knows where—in all probability the swallow-hole of some stream that once became engulphed in the solid rock. The spreading roots of trees, together with ferns and shrubs, often nearly concealed these man-traps from my view; and I found it necessary to clear the way for every step, a very tedious process at the close of a tiresome day's excursion.

We should like to continue the quotation, but there are limits to our space.

It is exceedingly difficult in works embodying the results of so wide a range of observation to select any particular portion for special notice; we prefer, therefore, to endeavour to give a general idea of their contents. The author begins his larger volume with an account of the government of the islands, which is for the most part a system of hereditary chieftainships. Some of the native chiefs are men of intelligence and capacity, and well affected towards Europeans. Gorai, chief of the Shortland group, who "takes pleasure in asserting that he is 'all same white man,' at the same time deprecating the inferior position of his race with the remark, 'White man, he savez too much. Poor black man! He no savez nothing,'" is a notable example; and the author recounts a geological excursion taken in his company in his own war-canoe. The Treasury Island chief, Mule or Mulekopa, is likewise a man of ability, though exhibiting less amiable qualities, and there are chiefs of some of the smaller islands similarly well spoken of.

The "head-hunting" propensities of the natives are described at considerable length, together with the raids undertaken to procure the necessary victims and the superstitions connected with the practice. Head-hunting is still carried on to some extent in connexion with cannibalism, but much more from the simple desire of the chiefs to accumulate skulls as a token of power or of prowess. It has also a sacrificial aspect; in case of the death of a chief a head must be provided, and the launching of a new war-canoe or the completion of a tamboo-house must be signalized in the same way. Within the radius of the head-hunting forays no native can be said to enjoy security of life for a single day, and at times even white men have been made victims of the infatuation. The custom is now carried on less openly than of old and, let us hope, less actively.

Slavery is a recognized institution throughout the group. The slaves are members of other tribes who have either been taken in war or otherwise captured, and they are the objects of open traffic. They are not ill treated, nor is the service required of them severe; nevertheless, their position is not an enviable one, especially if a head should chance to be required. Cannibalism is still in vogue on some of the islands, but on others it has completely died out. Polygamy, of course, prevails, and the position of the female sex, as amongst other savage races, is a degraded one—the women, in fact, are the drudges of the community. The social condition of the natives, their religious beliefs, funeral ceremonies, and the like, are fully entered into by the author, and a further chapter gives a detailed account of their houses, pottery, domestic utensils, weapons, and tools, well illustrated by photo-lithographic plates.

The food of the islanders is more varied than might be supposed. The banana, the taro, the sweet potato, the yam, and the sugar-cane are the chief objects of cultivation; and these are supplemented by the cocoa-nut, bread-fruit, and sago-palm, which owe less to the fostering hand of man. A few fruits, such as the papaw and mango, are grown, and there are numerous edible wild fruits and vegetables, which in times of scarcity would help materially to supply the ordinary wants of the people. The diet is essentially vegetable, though by no means exclusively so. Fish, opossums (Cuscus), and pigs furnish the principal animal food; shell-fish are largely eaten, the flesh of the large monitor-lizard is much esteemed, and even the crocodile is not rejected. The people of both sexes and of all ages smoke tobacco, and betel-chewing is a common indulgence.

The author describes in detail the physical characters of the inhabitants, furnishing various tables of comparative measurements, and discusses at some length the question of their race-affinities; then enlarges on matters of dress, tattooing, decorations, songs, music, and dances. An interesting chapter is devoted to sporting matters—canoes, fishing, and hunting—another of more professional nature to prevalent diseases, deformities, and the like; and then an essay on the language of the islands of Bougainville Straits, accompanied by a lengthy vocabulary—for information on these points we must perforce refer the reader to the book itself. The author sums up his account of the personal characteristics of the natives as follows:—

In recalling my own experiences, I can scarcely remember a single instance in which I was aught but kindly treated by a race of savages who have been so often characterized as the most treacherous and bloodthirsty in the Pacific. I was constantly in their power, since, in my excursions, I very rarely had any other companions. I will, therefore, frame my estimate of their character in the words of the French navigator that they would not have been able to resist the temptation of harming me, if there were not in their disposition something of the sense of honour and affection.

Lovers of old-world history and maritime adventure will be grateful to Dr. Guppy for his translation of the Journal of Gallego, which contains an account of the discovery of these lands by the Spaniards soon after the middle of the sixteenth century. We learn that in the year 1566, by order of Philip II. of Spain, an expedition was fitted out by Lope Garcia de Castro, Governor of Peru, "for the discovery of certain islands and a continent, concerning which His Catholic Majesty had summoned a number of persons versed in mathematics, in order to deliberate on a plan to be followed." Two ships, the Capitana and the Almiranta, were selected from the fleet and equipped for the service, and they sailed from Callao, the port of the City of Kings, on the 19th of November of the year named, under the command of Alvaro de Mendana, Hernando Gallego being chief pilot. We do not propose to follow the details of the story. Land was first sighted on the 15th of June, 1567, and within another fortnight the explorers appear to have been in the immediate region of their future discoveries. Most of the islands at which they touched during the subsequent cruise have been identified, and the general accuracy of Gallego's observations thereby corroborated. The investigation of the islands was continued for many months, until serious difficulties arose—the vessels "were getting worm-eaten and rotten," provisions were running short and could no longer be obtained from the natives, the natives themselves were aroused and menacing; and eventually it was represented to the captains that no good would accrue from the endeavour to push discovery further in that direction. It was determined, therefore, to rest satisfied with what had been accomplished, and not to risk the loss of results obtained with so much labour by prolonging the voyage. Accordingly, on the 11th of August, 1568, they set sail from these "Isles of Salomon" on their homeward voyage, little thinking that two centuries would elapse before the lands they had discovered would again be visited by Europeans. In December of the same year, after encountering many accidents and suffering many hardships, they reached the shores of California; then, sailing southwards and touching at several intermediate ports, they arrived again at the point whence they started on the 26th of June, 1569.

It is a remarkable fact that the existence of this Journal of Gallego remained practically unknown until the second quarter of the present century, the supposition being that it was originally kept secret through jealousy of the English explorers, and especially in order to keep Drake, who had recently appeared in the South Seas, in ignorance of the position of the newly-discovered islands.

The author continues the History of discovery in a chapter entitled "The Story of a Lost Archipelago," and then devotes himself to the natural history and climate of the group. There are notes on the botany of Bougainville Straits, and a list of the plants collected in that region; a chapter on reptiles and batrachians, with a story of a crocodile hunt; and another chapter on general zoology, containing, inter alia, interesting references to cocoanut-eating crabs, hermit crabs, millipedes, and edible birds' nests; and a synopsis of the land and fresh-water shells. Lastly, there is a chapter on climate, with a comprehensive register of meteorological observations.

We have left ourselves little room to notice Dr. Guppy's second work, which treats chiefly of the geology and physical aspects of the islands; but this is perhaps of the less consequence as the volume is manifestly intended more for the scientific student than for the general reader. With some of the results we are already familiar through the Memoirs previously published by the Royal Society of Edinburgh. It is perhaps sufficient to say that the recorded observations have thrown most important light on the structure and geological history of the islands of the coral seas.

With the description of the various islands of the group, their suitability for colonization is briefly discussed. Treasury Island, Shortland Island, and Santa Anna are spoken of with more or less favour as a possible field for European settlers; and the sugar-cane, cotton, and coffee are suggested as crops for cultivation. We fear, however, that the recent experience of tropical colonists has not been such as to encourage the settlement of new and comparatively little known regions. The area of cultivation of the staple products of the tropics has of late years increased so much, and competition has become so severe, that it is only in localities presenting exceptional advantages of soil, climate, accessibility, labour supply, and the like, that the settler can hope for success proportionate to his labours.

In conclusion, it will be seen that these are by no means books of travel in the ordinary sense of the term. We have sometimes even regretted that they did not contain a little more of an element of personal narrative. They are, however, brimful of facts and observations of much greater permanent value, and they will probably long remain our chief authority on all matters connected with this interesting section of Melanesia.

DEAN COLET.*

A FEW years ago Dean Colet seemed forgotten. As Mr. Lupton observes, his name is not so much as mentioned by Hume. Lingard naturally omits it—he could hardly have noticed the friend of Erasmus without condemnation, and showed his usual good taste in refraining. But other people also neglected him, and when Mr. Seebohm, in his volume on the early Oxford Reformers, gave Colet so prominent a place beside More and Erasmus, there were readers not wholly unintelligent who hardly knew his name. Mr. Lupton remarks that, though Colet desired to die among the Carthusians of Shene, he did not leave any money for masses in his will. The gifts he gave to monasteries must have been the smallest part of his otherwise lavish charities. It will be remembered that Sir Thomas More, while still young, retired for a time to the Charterhouse, near London, and it would seem that the Carthusians alone of all the numerous monastic and fraternal orders kept anything of their primitive piety. It was upon them (for their consistency) that the hand of Henry VIII. fell with the heaviest weight, yet even Layton and Bedell, Cromwell's inquisitors, could allege nothing against them.

John Colet occupies a position almost alone among his contemporaries. A priest, a citizen, a scholar, and at the same time the possessor of an ample fortune and a good estate, he seemed destined from his youth to rise high in the world. He publicly lectured on the Epistles of St. Paul when taking his degree at Oxford. His lectures are preserved, not, as Mr. Lupton observes, at his old University, but at Cambridge, in the public library, and in the libraries of Corpus Christi and Emmanuel Colleges. Mr. Lupton gives some extracts with a view to enable his readers to form a fair estimate of Colet's expositions in their variety and originality of treatment. At Oxford he met More, who entered Lincoln College while Colet was lecturing. In 1498 Erasmus, who had come over at the invitation of Lord Mountjoy, a former pupil, was also at Oxford, where he was welcomed by Colet in a courteous Latin letter, to which Erasmus replied; thus beginning a correspondence which was to last all their lives. A friend told Colet, many years later, "that each of you owes much to the other, but which of the two owes most to the other I am doubtful." Erasmus remained in England till 1500, but Colet continued at Oxford for four years longer, lecturing gratuitously. That he did not attain to any University office is not strange, as his wealth enabled him to live well without such trammels, and he certainly "held a dignified, if not a publicly recognized, position in the University." He had been presented to the rectory of Dennington, in Suffolk, in 1485, by his cousin, Sir William Knevet, and his arms still hang in the vestry. In 1490 his father, Sir Henry Colet, gave him the rectory of Thurning, a place of which the alderman was lord of the manor. He resigned in 1494, perhaps on account of his presentation to Stepney, also by his father. He resigned Stepney at the time of his father's death, about September 1505. He also held the prebendal stall of Goodeaster, in St. Martin-le-Grand, and several other canonries; so that in these days he would be considered "a bloated pluralist"; but, to judge from what we read of his contemporaries, he was singularly moderate in his acceptance of such preferments. Yet his whole income from the Church, even after he had become Dean of St. Paul's, only amounted to 217*l.*, which Mr. Lupton estimates as equal to about 2,600*l.* now. He spent, through his steward, the whole of his official income on the expenses of his household, which must have been large, owing to his hospitality. He was appointed Dean of St. Paul's in 1505. Mr. Lupton's account of the Cathedral and Colet's ministrations is very interesting, in spite of the heaviness of his style and his constant, and sometimes very misleading, use of such expressions as "former" and "latter." Colet's household was enlarged by his reception of young scholars of promise; and his great foundation, St. Paul's School, in 1512, which he endowed during his lifetime, must have severely taxed even his ample revenues. He appointed for the stipend of the high master no less a sum than 34*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* a year, with a livery gown worth 1*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* If we remember that the Lord Chancellor at that period had 66*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for his yearly salary, Colet's endowment of the high master appears munificent. It is characteristic of Mr. Lupton's way of writing a biography that Colet's appointment to the deanery is inferred, not directly told; and the date is the subject of some discussion, not in the text, but in the foot-notes.

Colet was only fifty-three at the time of his death in 1519. He had already done everything necessary for the continuance of the school. Mr. Lupton clearly distinguishes it from the old Cathedral school for the choir boys, which had been mismanaged by the Chapter. In some of the oldest of the St. Paul's documents mention is made of the "magister scholarum," who afterwards blossoms into the chancellor. The chancellor of Colet's time was William Lichfield, a man for whom the Dean had no respect or liking. He gave his father's house at Stepney to the high master for a country villa. How the foundation has improved may be judged from a footnote on p. 264. Mr. Lupton's love of footnotes is remarkable, and why the information here given should not stand part of the text, and an important part of it, no one can possibly tell. It seems that the new and ruddy building in Hammersmith, more politely called "West Kensington," provides room for 500 boys, and can be extended to take in twice as many. In due time there is to be a similar school for 400 girls. The national school built on Colet's land at Stepney accommodates 593 boys and as many girls and infants. "It is probable, therefore, that in a few years' time something like 3,000 young people, from all classes of society, will be daily receiving their education under the honoured name of Dean Colet." The best passages of Mr. Lupton's very careful book—"painful" is the old adjective for this kind of work—are those in which he describes the country home of the Colets, and those in which he tells us about the Cathedral church, and Colet's destroyed monument, and the portraits of him which remain. There is a full and accurate index.

THE word "decisive," as applied to an action, is of course susceptible of different interpretations; and, as Professor Creasy admitted in the preface to his well-known book, The Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World, it is probable that no two historical inquirers would entirely agree in their lists of decisive actions. It may be applied to such battles as Waterloo, Solferino, Königgrätz, or to the fall of Sebastopol and the surrender of Lee after Five Forks; to such military events, in fact, as terminate an important campaign and immediately lead to important treaties. It may be still further restricted to crises in the world's history—like the battles of Châlons in the fifth, of Tours in the eighth, of Hastings in the eleventh centuries, the defeat of the "Invincible Armada," the British surrender at Saratoga, the "Battle of Nations" at Leipzig—"a contrary event of which," to use Hallam's criterion, "would have essentially varied the drama of the world in all its subsequent scenes." On the other hand, the term may legitimately be extended to all military conflicts the issue of which had an unmistakable influence on the subsequent course of a campaign—Lucknow and Cawnpore for instance, Gettysburg or Gravelotte; and similarly to those which, like the battle of Navarino or the capture of the citadel of Antwerp from the Dutch, have a final settling influence on protracted national struggles for independence.

In his selection of twenty-five so-called "Decisive Battles since Waterloo," Mr. Thomas Knox has adopted a catholic criterion, which embraces under the general rubric decisive all the more important military events of the world from 1815 to 1887. His analytical compilation, albeit undoubtedly the work of a civilian, is a valuable one, not only to the student of contemporary history, but also to the soldier. For Mr. Knox has conscientiously epitomized the standard works of professional writers, exhaustive but ponderous, and thus presented a cleverly concatenated account of military events in the nineteenth century, and their influence on the political history of our own times.

Dealing with the numerous wars which went on during the forty years of the so-called "Great Peace," the author begins with the West, and recounts the long series of popular "movements" which in 1824 culminated in the Battle of Ayacucho, the final overthrow of the power of Spain in America. Mr. Knox naturally pays more attention to the military events of the New World than would a European writer, and this is one of the numerous points of interest in his work. A curious fact connected with the widespread struggle for independence among Spanish American possessions is that it really originated in a feeling of intense loyalty to the legitimate occupier of the Spanish throne at the time of the French invasion of the Peninsula, a feeling which displayed itself in passive resistance or open rebellion, according to circumstances, to the authority of the French usurper. The complete misunderstanding of the true import of the national movement by Ferdinand's advisers when he returned to power, and their uncompromising attempts to suppress what looked like a mere revolutionary tendency, led to the ultimate defeat everywhere of the Royalist troops. If the accounts of General San Martin's exploits are not overcoloured, his feat of crossing the Andes from Chili to Peru undoubtedly rivals, if it does not surpass, Bonaparte's passage of the Alps. The author is especially enthusiastic about the naval deeds of Lord Cochrane, which helped much to bring about the end of Spanish rule in South America.

We can hardly look upon the British victory at Prome in 1825 as a decisive battle in any sense. It was not considered in that light at the time, and the numerous expeditions we have been obliged to send to Burmah since then would point to the same opinion. Mr. Knox's reason for numbering it in his selection—namely, that it was "the beginning of the end of the Burmese kingdom"—is decidedly inadequate, and reveals that weakness noticeable in so many compilations, the tendency to make room for every by-result of special investigation without much consideration for its absolute relevancy.

During the fifteen years which followed Waterloo, exhausted Europe was at peace with itself, and all its warring was directed against Mohammedans. An English expedition was sent against Algiers; three years later broke out the Greek insurrection; in 1826 began the Russo-Persian war; then two years later the Russo-Turkish conflict, terminated by the capture of Silistria in 1829; finally, in 1830 was achieved by the French the final destruction of Algerine power on the Mediterranean. The author has selected the battle of Navarino, the siege of Silistria, and the battle of Staoueli, which entailed the surrender of Algiers, as the decisive events of that period. Whatever may be said about the fall of the Turkish fortress on the Danube, there can be no doubt about the annihilation of the Ottoman fleet in the Bay of Navarino by the combined forces of England, France, and Russia ranking among truly decisive battles—"untoward event" as it certainly was in many ways.

Almost of equal importance was the radical remedy used by the French to put a stop to the intolerable state of things kept up in the Mediterranean by the Turkish rulers of Algeria, and their scientifically organized system of piracy. On this score the admirably conducted descent at Sidi Ferruch, the battle of Staoueli, on the 3rd of July, 1830, and the entrance of General Bourmont into the city of the Deys, twenty-four hours later, must be reckoned among the events which were of permanent importance to Europe at large.

The capture by the French troops under the Prince of Orleans of the South Citadel of Antwerp ranks likewise among decisive events. It emphasized the determination of Europe to see the independence of Belgium recognized, and guaranteed its neutrality. The story of Chassé's heroic defence of the superb old fortress built by Paciotto in the days of Spanish domination, and of the no less brilliant attack of the French under such restrictions as are rarely seen in warfare—namely, the necessity of respecting the neutrality of the town itself, which lay under the guns of the citadel—is a fascinating as well as unique chapter in military history, and one to which Mr. Knox has done full justice.

To the bulk of European readers the capture of Mexico in 1847 by the troops of the United States is perhaps not so well known as the feat deserves. But to Americans the culminating event of the campaign undertaken in support of the claims of Texas for autonomy is naturally of high interest. Mr. Knox devotes a lengthy chapter and several plans to its illustration; indeed, more attention than to the fall of Sebastopol, which, after an excellent account of the Sikh wars and the battle of Gujerat in 1849, is somewhat too summarily treated.

It would take more space than we can dispose of to advert, even in the most sketchy manner, to the results wrought by the issue of the important battles of the last forty years. All that can be said is that Mr. Knox's choice shows, with few exceptions, a discriminating insight into the relative importance of military achievements. With Cawnpore and Lucknow as central points of interest, is rapidly expounded the momentous drama of the Indian Mutiny; the capture of the Pei-ho Forts is made to foretell the opening of the Middle Empire to the outer barbarian; the battle of Solferino is treated as the turning-point in the history of the contest for Italian unity. Then follows, and naturally at greater length, the analysis of the three great events of the War of Secession, the three days of Gettysburg, the fall of Vicksburg, and Lee's capitula tion after Five Forks in 1865.

The battle of Sadowa in the following year, which consummated the breaking-up of the old Germanic Confederation and inaugurated the preponderance of Prussia at the same time as it assured the union of Venetia with Lombardy and the legislative independence of Hungary, is perhaps the most representative instance of a decisive battle, and might have been narrated in greater detail. Of the actions in the Franco-German War, Mr. Knox has chosen Gravelotte and Sedan; the former because it resulted in the imprisonment of Bazaine in Metz, and with the latter resulting in the wholesale capture of Napoleon's army and the utter collapse of the Second Empire.

The events round Plevna naturally form the central picture of the Russo-Turkish War, and the last chapters are devoted to Russian enterprise in Central Asia, the capture of Khiva in 1873 and Geok Tepe eight years later, to the battle of Miraflores, which in 1881 settled the fate of Peru in its contest with Chili; and finally to El Obeid, Khartoum, and our melancholy experiences in the Soudan.

Of all *un*decided battles, the engagement in the Hampton Roads between the Monitor and the Merrimac, on the 9th of July, 1862, was perhaps the most typical. But Mr. Knox has, and with good show of reason, included this "draw" among decisive actions—"It revolutionized the navies of the world, and showed that the wooden ships, which had long held control of the ocean, were of no further use for fighting purposes. Commenting upon the news of that event, the London Times said:—Whereas we had available for immediate purposes one hundred and forty-nine first-class war-ships, we have now two, the Warrior, and her sister Ironsides. There is not now a ship in the English navy, apart from these two, that it would not be madness to trust to an engagement with that little Monitor."

Thus the undecided contest between these two improvised armour-clads—one of which, the Merrimac, was destroyed by order of her commander after the evacuation of Norfolk, and the other foundered in a gale at sea—practically opened the present era of naval warfare.

THE MAMMOTH AND THE FLOOD.*

MR. HOWORTH treats the Bible narrative as only one out of many testimonies to the Universal Deluge. The conclusions which he formulates are six:—(1) that a great catastrophe took place at the close of the mammoth period, which overwhelmed that animal with its companions, over a very large part of the earth's surface; (2) that this catastrophe involved a widespread flood of water, which not only killed the animals, but buried them; (3) that it was accompanied by a great fall of temperature in Siberia; (4) that this catastrophe took place when man was already occupying the earth, and constitutes the gap which is almost universally admitted to exist between Palæolithic and Neolithic man; (5) that the primæval Flood which occurs in the traditions of so many races may probably be identified with this catastrophe; (6) that, widespread as this Flood was, considerable areas escaped, and from them man, animals, and plants spread out again and reoccupied those districts which had been desolated. This is a startling programme, with far-reaching issues, which will no doubt provoke plenty of that keen criticism which Mr. Howorth invites. In the work before us the problem is approached from the archæological and palæontological side only; but we are glad to learn that it is shortly to be followed by a second, dealing with the geological aspect of it. For the present, therefore, we have only half the evidence—that to be derived from the narratives of travellers and explorers—but this has been collected with extraordinary industry, and, so far as we are able to judge, with complete fairness. We cannot say that we fully agree with Mr. Howorth in his violent attack on "uniformity," towards which, while speaking with invariable respect of Sir C. Lyell himself, he adopts a scolding and abusive tone unworthy of a scientific treatise. He seems to have set up an idol for the sake of smashing it; and we fail to find any difference in kind between the deluge of his imagination and those which have taken place in our own time—for instance, in Java and Iceland. But as regards the special thesis he has set himself to defend, that water was the agent which destroyed the mammoth and its companions, we must admit that he has made out a very strong case. This we will try to state as fairly as we can, but it is no easy task to detail in a limited space even the leading points of an argument which depends on a multitude of minute facts, gathered from the whole surface of the globe.

The existence of ivory in Siberia in a sub-fossil condition, but still sufficiently durable to be used for all the purposes to which recent ivory is applied, has been known since the middle ages, and formed one of the earliest exports from Siberia to China. The very name given to the gigantic creature which produced it, Mammoth or Mammont—probably a corruption of Behemoth—was introduced by the Arab traders who initiated the traffic in fossil ivory in the tenth century. It was not, however, until the middle of the eighteenth century that the trade became considerable. In or about 1750, Liachof, a Russian merchant, discovered vast stores of elephant tusks and bones in the northern districts of Siberia, and especially on the islands off the mouth of the Lena, which have since borne his name. The ivory brought thence, says the traveller Wrangell, "is often as fresh and white as that from Africa." Since Liachof's discovery it has been computed that the tusks of at least twenty thousand mammoths have been exported, while an even larger number are too much decayed to be worth removal, and others are so large that they have to be sawn up on the spot where they are found. These buried hecatombs of elephants abound throughout the frozen soil of Siberia, but they are more numerous the further we advance northwards, and most plentiful of all on the islands above named and in those termed New Siberia. More remarkable still are the mammoth mummies—several of which have been disinterred, whole carcases not unfrequently standing upright in the frozen soil, with their flesh "as fresh as if just taken out of an Esquimaux câche or a Yakout subterranean meat-safe." The most widely known of these is that discovered in 1806 by an English botanist named Adams, and the skeleton, or such parts of it as could be recovered—for in the interval between part of it being laid bare and the information reaching Adams wild animals had preyed on the flesh and carried off many of the bones—is now in the museum at St. Petersburg. Carcases of rhinoceros have also been found under similar conditions. It is agreed on all hands that these bodies must have been submitted to "continuous congelation without a break" ever since they died; in other words, the catastrophe which slew them must also have buried them and so changed the climate that their flesh has been preserved to the present day. Mr. Howorth shows, we think conclusively, that the animals lived in Siberia, and were not transported thither after death from some other place. The bones show no appearance of detrition; the largest numbers and those in the finest condition are found at a distance from the rivers; and, further, their numbers decrease as we go further south. Again, though the climate could not have been as cold while they were alive as it is now, it is evident that it was by no means a warm one; for there is ample evidence that they were protected by a thick coating of hair and wool. Collateral proof of a change in the climate is afforded by the débris of trees—"large stems, with their roots fast in the soil"—found in places where no vegetation, save lichens, grows at present; and that the elephants fed on these trees may be conjectured partly from their long recurved tusks, which would be peculiarly useful in pulling down branches, partly from the analogy of the rhinoceros—for the contents of a mammoth's stomach have not as yet been observed. In 1876, however, the cavities of the teeth of a rhinoceros yielded fragments of the leaves of coniferous and other trees.

After discussing very fully what may be termed, if we may coin a word, the death-history of the Mammoth in Northern Asia, Mr. Howorth passes to Europe, and attacks the curious question of the fauna of the Mammoth period, which appears, from its remains, to have been composed of animals the most dissimilar in structure and habits; and he proposes an ingenious hypothesis to explain how it came to pass that polar-bears, lemmings, marmots, and reindeer were contemporaneous with hippopotamus, lion, and elephant. Without going into details, his contention is that portions of Europe—e.g. Switzerland and Scandinavia—were then icebound and sterile, that the levels immediately below the high mountain-ranges were inhabited by mammals and birds now living in high latitudes and mountain-fells, and that the river-valleys, sheltered by dense forests, were warm and luxuriant, and afforded a congenial shelter to animals now confined to the tropics. It is hardly necessary to add that his hypothesis does not postulate that the animals in question lived together as a happy family, but that within a comparatively short distance of each other animals were to be met with which now require wholly dissimilar climatic conditions. By what agency, however, were these animals brought together, so that we find in the same pit the bones of the whole of the above-mentioned fauna—young and old together (a very important point)—nearly always unworn, and frequently with the limb-bones in juxtaposition? Mr. Howorth rejects the usual theories, and pleads for "rushing water on a great scale." This agency > would drown the animals, and yet would not mutilate the bodies. It would kill them all with complete impartiality, irrespective of their strength, age, or size. It would take up clay and earth, and cover the bodies with it. . . . The occurrence of immense câches, in which the remains of wild animals are incongruously mixed together pell-mell, often on high ground, seems unaccountable, save on the theory that they were driven to take shelter together on some point of vantage, in view of an advancing flood of water, a position which is paralleled by the great floods which occur occasionally in the tropics, where we find the tiger and its victims all collecting together on some dry space, and reduced to a common condition of timidity and helplessness by a flood which has overwhelmed the flat country. . . . In the present case all were overtaken by the water, tossed and tumbled together in a common destruction, and then covered thickly with a mantle of clay or gravel—a mantle, be it remembered, spread over immense areas, without a break external or internal, and in which we can find no traces of local disturbance, such as would be caused by any process of subsequent burying, and showing that bones and covering were laid down together.

In support of this theory of drowning he cites, among other facts, the rhinoceros found by Pallas, the head of which still showed "the blood-vessels and even the fine capillaries filled with brown coagulated blood"—a condition which is just what might be expected in an animal which died from drowning; the position of many of the mammoth skeletons; and the curious fact that some of those in Siberia are standing upright, with their tails turned to the south, as though the deluge had come from that direction. Water, again, he contends, would explain the presence of the Pleistocene mammals in caverns and fissures to which they could not have been brought by hyænas, lions, or other beasts of prey.

The evidence afforded by the remains of our own species is marshalled by Mr. Howorth with great dexterity in support of his theory. Those who have studied this question most carefully divide primæval man into Palæolithic and Neolithic; and it is agreed that the former race was contemporaneous with the Pleistocene fauna and flora, the latter with modern wild animals. The former was a race of hunters, who dwelt in caves; the latter an agricultural people who built houses (not uniformly, but occasionally), kept domesticated animals, and possessed a knowledge of the arts of weaving and making pottery. The remains of the two races are never found together. The French and Belgian archæologists are particularly emphatic in pointing out the distinct line of demarcation which separates them; and our own distinguished geologist, Mr. James Geikie, argues on the same side. "The implements of the one period," he says, "are never found commingled with those of the other, nor do the characteristic faunas of the two ages ever occur together in one and the same undisturbed deposit." In certain cases, for instance, a layer of barren loam marks the gap between the two deposits; in others a mass of stalagmite. The culture of the later period, as was pointed out long ago by M. Lartet, could not be derived from that of the earlier. A striking illustration of this gap, or interval, is afforded by the history of the horse. The horse was common everywhere in Pleistocene times, but in France, Belgium, and Switzerland it is absent from Neolithic caves and lake-dwellings. On the other hand, it occurs abundantly in corresponding places belonging to the later Bronze age. The obvious inference is that it was reintroduced by a later culture. Again, though common in Pleistocene deposits in Algeria, it is absent from the older Egyptian monuments; in America, where it abounded in the same strata, it had become extinct when the Spaniards occupied Mexico; and Mr. Howorth might have added that the Indians worshipped as a divinity a sick horse left behind by Cortes in his famous expedition to Honduras. Various expedients have been resorted to to explain the cause of an effect so universally recognized; but Mr. Howorth is unquestionably right in insisting that a true explanation must account for the complete disappearance of one type of man, with a distinct fauna and flora, and the reappearance of another type with a new and equally distinct fauna and flora, but without any intermediate forms to link the two together. An immense flood, which M. Dupont had already invoked to explain similar phenomena in Belgium, is no doubt a "raison suffisante."

Here Mr. Howorth closes his case for the Old World, and proceeds to "test the problem" in North and South America, the West Indies, and New Zealand. Over these regions, however, though the chapters dealing with them occupy nearly half the volume, and form by no means the least interesting part of it, space compels us to follow him with a very rapid step. Throughout the American continent the great mammals—the Mammoth in the far North, the Mastodon and Megatherium in more temperate regions, and the Glyptodon, Toxodon, and Scelidotherium in the South—are found buried under conditions almost identical with those noticed in corresponding cases in the Old World. The skeletons of Mastodons especially are found entire, the contents of their stomachs lying still intact within their ribs, young and old together, and often in a position which implies that the animal was swimming when it perished. Again, the "whole area of the Pampas is one wide sepulchre"; the bones found therein are fresh, filled with animal matter, and with no appearance of detrition. Here, however, the problem is complicated by the fact that, while the large mammals have perished, the smaller have survived. To what cause are we to ascribe the destruction of the huge Glyptodon and the preservation of the small armadillo? "It is impossible," as Darwin puts it, "to reflect on the changed state of the American continent without the deepest astonishment. Formerly it must have swarmed with great monsters; now we find mere pigmies." But, after stating the various theories suggested to account for these facts, the great naturalist discards them all, and leaves the problem unsolved. D'Orbigny, on the other hand, whose explorations in South America give him a right to speak and to be listened to, is less cautious, and believes that in the upheaval of the Cordilleras we may find the cause of which we are in search. This theory Mr. Howorth adopts; for says he:—"It explains how the huge unwieldy beasts and the animals living on the level plains were overwhelmed, while the smaller creatures—those with a more nimble gait or those living on places of vantage—escaped; and it not only explains the destruction of the animals, but their burial." The same catastrophe is made responsible for the formation of the West Indian Archipelago, and the destruction of the fauna, of which scattered fragments alone remain; while a similar convulsion is evoked to explain the phenomena observed in New Zealand, where "in the caves, on the mud-flats near the sea-shore, and on the turbary deposits, both of the North and South Islands, large collections of bones are found mixed together in utter confusion, as though a number of struthious birds of different genera and species, overtaken and driven together by a common peril, had perished in one general catastrophe." If we understand Mr. Howorth aright, he imagines that the flood which devastated New Zealand was partial in its operations, leaving behind a certain quantity of Moa-birds to be hunted, and finally extirpated, by the Maoris, whose legends respecting their existence he is disposed to accept. In a concluding chapter the evidence of tradition is accumulated, beginning, of course, with the Bible, but into this part of the subject we have no space to enter.

In the course of these remarks we have more than once praised Mr. Howorth for his industry. We wish we could extend our praise to his accuracy. It is true that he pleads, in extenuation of possible mistakes, "the double burden of bad health and too many other claims on time and leisure"; but neither sickness nor occupation can excuse the extraordinary carelessness with which his book is printed. We should have thought that an ordinary press-reader would have drawn attention to faults in grammar for which a schoolboy ought to be birched; and as for the quotations, many of which we have been at the pains of testing, it is a rare thing to find one that is correct. Even three lines from Lucretius contain two serious blunders. Mr. Howorth has yet to learn that accuracy in these matters can only be insured by comparing all quoted matter with the original text after his own work has been set up in type.

AUCASSIN ET NICOLETTE.*

THAT after Aucassin and Nicolette has been known for nearly a hundred and fifty years, after it has by means of the edition in the Bibliothèque Elzévirienne been in the hands of all lovers of Old French for thirty, and after it has been made, with at any rate a select class of English readers, familiar by Mr. Pater's handling in his Renaissance Studies for fifteen, two Englishmen should at last simultaneously, and unknown to each other, make up their minds to translate it is only a repetition of one of the commonest, though one of the most mysterious, facts of letters. It always happens, and nobody (except Puck) knows how it happens. Mr. Bourdillon's edition and translation had the start of Mr. Lang's, who (translating merely) duly acknowledges obligations to Mr. Bourdillon's text and apparatus. But we believe that the two versions were originally executed without either of the translators knowing that the other was engaged thereon. As it happens, it is less of a pity than usual, and both books have their place. For, though Mr. Bourdillon's translation is decidedly inferior (in manners and for reasons to be mentioned presently) to Mr. Lang's, the inclusion of the text, which in its purity is not easily accessible, except in the merely scholastic edition of Suchier, with glossary, notes, and other aids, gives his book a distinct, and we should hope a permanent, value. Both volumes are well got up, Mr. Bourdillon's (the larger by a good deal) being printed on Dutch paper and Mr. Lang's on Japanese, which, by the way, is very pretty to look at, but absolutely refuses to yield to an ordinary paper-knife.

Of the interest of the piece itself it is necessary to say a little, though very little. Mr. Bourdillon has been a thought too copious in his introduction, which is as long as the story itself, but he has not exaggerated the charm of his text. It stands quite alone, and abounds in agreeable suggestion of problems which the wise are apt to perceive and enjoy, while the foolish make them the subject of dull dissertation and baseless theory. Of absolutely unknown authorship, and not very clearly known date; written in the northernmost dialect of French and yet expressing almost wholly southern feeling; mixing the purest romantic charm, a romantic charm hardly to be paralleled except in the balcony scenes of Romeo and Juliet, with farce almost as broad as Mercutio's own, and much more enigmatical; exhibiting in mere form the union of verse and prose as integral parts of the narrative—a style nowhere exactly to be found earlier—Aucassin et Nicolette is one of the most curious, as it is certainly one of the most charming, pieces of the curious and charming literature to which it belongs. As a curiosity, the burlesque episode of Torelore (a kind of kingdom of Cockaigne to which Aucassin journeys, and where he finds the King gravely submitting to the custom of the couvade and his subjects engaging in apparently furious battles, where the weapons are apples, new cheeses, and mushrooms) is rather slighted by both our translators. To the literary historian it is interesting as showing, probably in one of the earliest extant instances, the influence of the popularity of the fabliaux, which, a little later in date than the purely heroic chansons and the romantic and courtly Arthurian stories, were evidently achieving a vogue which made Jongleurs think it necessary to adapt comic interludes to serious pieces. Apart from this, however, it cannot, of course, for a moment compare in attraction with the wonderful series of pictures of romantic love and romantic beauty successively unfolded by the "Viel Caitif," as the author seems to style himself ("caitif," it may perhaps be just necessary to say, is as far as possible from being "caitiff" in our sense, but is identical with "chétif" and "captif," means "prisoner," and has a certain special application in literary history, which may or may not come in here, to Crusaders captured by the Saracens). The first sketches both of Aucassin and Nicolette, the battle where the lover shows himself a John-a-Dreams of war, the escape of Nicolette first from the tower and then from the city, the building of her bower in the forest, and the meeting of the lovers—these are only a few of dozens of delightful scenes. Nor would even this series, full of half præ-Raphaelite, half Byzantine beauty as its figures are, be as attractive as it is were it not for the touches, something more than merely sensuous, which appear here and there. The chief of these is, no doubt, the famous outburst where Aucassin scandalizes the Vicomte by extolling the superior joys of "the other place" as compared with Paradise. Here, again, we are not quite at one with either of our authors. Mr. Bourdillon's apology to the pious-minded is surely superfluous, and argues either a certain lack of humour in himself or a great disdain for his readers. Mr. Lang's passing reference to it as what people must often have thought "in those incredulous ages of faith" surprises us still more. Clearly Aucassin is not in the least "incredulous"; on the contrary, he accepts both the orthodox ideas of the other world and the orthodox notion of the two ways leading to its two provinces. But, with the half-petulant, half-audacious daring of a Provençal, he declares his preference for the other way, not having, like his luckier contemporary (or thereabouts), Thomas the Rhymer, a chance of a third road, which seems to have combined the advantages of both. It is in this passage that the pagan and rebellious side of Southern French thought which broke out so daringly in the Albigensian movement shows itself. It is not "incredulous" at all; it believes, but it does not tremble—it revolts.

However, this is a digression. There is little to say about Mr. Bourdillon's introduction except that, as has been said already, it might have been cut down with some advantage, and nothing that need be said about his text and his helps to its study, but recommendation. For our own part, we confess, the text is so delightful that we rather wonder how any one who can read it could bring himself to put it into any other language; but remarks of this sort on reviewers' parts are, we believe, regarded as impertinent. So let us say something about the two translations, if anybody must needs have a translation. We have said that here Mr. Lang seems to us to have the advantage—an advantage not merely of detail in carrying out, but of system and theory in conceiving. Of course such a story as Aucassin et Nicolette, which is told in all but the most archaic literary form of its own language, cannot possibly be Englished without a certain archaism. Of course, also, this kind of archaizing is a very perilous pastime; but Mr. Lang is an older hand at it than Mr. Bourdillon, and he has avoided or got the better of two dangers into which Mr. Bourdillon has sometimes fallen. The one is the attempt to produce an archaic effect, not so much by archaic use of still existing words, as by using words which have themselves dropped out of use. Mr. Lang, of course, also does this, but he does it more warily. Mr. Bourdillon, for instance, apologizes for throwing the emphasis on the last syllable of Carthage—a thing for which there is good authority direct and analogical, and to which we have not the slightest objection. But we are by no means so sure of the propriety of using "bright of blee" in modern English version when bright of face or brow does as well, and we are quite sure that "Aucassin, the kind, the gent" is unallowable. Of course "gent" for gentle is a very good old word in itself, and if Mr. Bourdillon had applied it, as he might with better authority, to Nicolette, though we should not have liked it much, we should not have absolutely ruled it out. "Aucassin the gent" unfortunately suggests the little creatures sucking sticks, and with short coats and curled hair, who are connected with the word now for all time. The other danger is mixing with the archaisms phrases and words decidedly modern, as here:—

> Her lithe form, her face, her bloom
> Do the heart of me illume.

Chaucer never would have written anything like that distich. Mr. Bourdillon, we say, not seldom falls into both these faults, from which Mr. Lang is almost entirely free. On the other hand, Mr. Lang takes certain liberties with the actual text which Mr. Bourdillon avoids, as in the rendering of "noix gauges," which certainly are nuts, and certainly are not apples. Yet Mr. Bourdillon has been even too conscientious in keeping the demonstrative in the passage about Paradise. "Those old cloaks, &c." gives a farcical air in English, and is besides, though a literal translation, really stronger than "ces" as used in Old French, and therefore literal at the expense of faithfulness. Both translators keep the ugly word "nasal" instead of "nose-guard" or "nose-plate," which would surely be better; but Mr. Lang's study of Malory has stood him in good stead for the fighting generally.

However, this kind of comparison is in both senses rather ungrateful. Mr. Bourdillon's version will let English readers very fairly see the beauty of a singularly beautiful work, if it does not show quite such experience in the handling of verse and prose in the archaic manner as Mr. Lang's. And Mr. Lang's, if it is unaccompanied, like Mr. Bourdillon's, with the original and the apparatus thereto appertaining, will make very charming reading of itself. A piece so delightful, so decidedly the best of its own kind, and so short withal, is very well suited as an exercise-ground for those who love translation, and though the study of Old French is spreading, it is hardly wide enough yet to let the taint of "crib" rest on any such translation. Aucassin and Nicolette had a better country (though there were "beasts serpentine" in it—it was surely a pity that Mr. Bourdillon did not keep this pleasing adjective) than the nut-brown maid and her lover could have had in an English greenwood, however good. The flowery lodge in the forest would have proved a bad defence in an English May or even in such a Japanese summer as M. Viard (who—we politely presume him to be as good a man of war—is not so chivalrous as Aucassin) has just described in Madame Chrysanthème. The last century was pleased to see in Aucassin et Nicolette the love fashions of the "bon vieux temps," and certainly they have never anywhere been more charmingly displayed or vindicated.

A TREATISE ON DANCING.*

When a youth or maiden goes to a dance, and, in the absence of the momentarily beloved object, or for any other sufficient reason, dances heartily right through the entertainment, how much ground does he or she cover in the course of the evening? Mr. Edward Scott says not less than fourteen miles. The statement is worth dissecting, because Mr. Scott is an earnest student of the choric science, and once wrote a little book on the subject of far less than usual demerit. This is how he arrives at his result:—

> Do you ["my fair and fragile reader"] think you would go six times round a moderate-sized ball-room, say, making a circuit of eighty yards, during a waltz? Yes; at least, even allowing for rest. That, then, is four hundred and eighty yards if you went in a line. But you are turning nearly all the time, say, on an average, once in each yard of onward progress, and the circumference of a circle is rather more than three times its diameter, which will bring each waltz to over three-quarters of a mile, or, at least, fourteen miles for the eighteen waltzes. I do not say that this computation is scientifically accurate. . . .

We say that it is wildly inaccurate. The principal blunder is in the first sentence, which puts the circuit danced in a "moderate-sized ball-room" at eighty yards, or two hundred and forty feet. As the circuit covered by the dancers in a round dance is never more than a circle or ellipse, leaving outside nearly as much of the room as there is inside, this involves the assumption that, to be "moderate-sized," a ball-room has to be about a hundred feet square. Let Mr. Scott consider how fortunate dancers are if they get a room forty feet square, and then perpend a little. If he substituted sixty feet for eighty yards he would still have made a liberal allowance. Besides this, his theory that dancers turn "on the average" once in every yard is fantastic; but, on the other hand, an average of six times round to each waltz is modest. On the whole, we imagine that it is rare to dance more than three miles in an evening, and that those who have done so feel decidedly virtuous.

There are some other points in which Mr. Scott's treatise Grace and Folly indicates peculiar views. The author thinks balls ought not to last more than four hours, and here he is wanting in consideration for the claims of supper, and he opines that those balls are most successful "where only short intervals are allowed between the dances." O Mr. Scott! Mr. Scott! You forget that, after all, dancing is, in the first place, only the means to an end. A well-executed dance, it is true, produces more intimacy than five minutes spent in most other ways; but what is the good of allowing an intimacy to blossom if you leave it no time to flourish? A good dancer will talk and dance at the same time, no doubt, but the tenderest conversation en route is ice compared to the confidences of the corridor or the conservatory. The only event which would reconcile judicious hostesses to Mr. Scott's proposed curtailment of the intervals would be a general recurrence to the excellent old practice indicated in Miss Austen's and other prehistoric novels of claiming the society of each partner for two consecutive dances, itself an innovation on the still older plan of exclusive possession for the whole evening.

Mr. Scott is extremely serious about dancing, as it is only right that a professor of the art should be. He makes due reference to David, and to various other personages and events in ancient and mediæval history, and quotes with approval a passage bearing on the subject from a work which he describes as "Juventis Mundi" and attributes to Mr. Gladstone. In particular, he gives a vivid and entertaining account of the pleasing exercise formerly known by the name of "Joan Saunderson." We wish it were danced now. His present work will not, and is not intended to, teach any one to dance; but it may be glanced through not unprofitably by those interested in the subject. Most English readers will learn something of the language invented and talked by the countrymen of Mr. W. D. Howells when they discover that in it people standing at one end of the figure in some kind of Lancers are called "heads," instead of "tops," because—well, because it is more refined.

THE VICTORIA PICKWICK.*

THE publication of the two handsome volumes appropriately styled the Victoria Pickwick Papers celebrates the Jubilee of the most popular book of Her Majesty's reign. Nothing more worthily commemorative of the event could be desired. It possesses several features of interest that belong to it alone, and no other form of the book can be said to be a competitor in the estimate of collectors, except a copy of the original of 1836–7 bound as issued in parts, with the familiar pale green cover, and the author's occasional addresses to the reader. This, of course, is valued, as all first editions of famous books are when unspoiled by the binder. The Victoria edition includes all that belongs to the original, even to a fac-simile of the cover, with the addition of the publisher's announcement of the work, the later prefaces, and reproductions of the original designs by a photogravure process of Messrs. Annan & Swan, among which are five now first published. The prefaces, addresses, and notes of Dickens, with all passages subsequently rejected, and an introduction by Mr. C. Plumptre Johnson, form an interesting body of prolegomena; while appended to several of the plates are curious and instructive hints and criticisms for the artist's use, reproduced from the author's autograph. With regard to textual authority and beauty of type and paper the edition is altogether admirable. The illustrations, however, may fairly be said to engross attention. The works of Dickens have been subjected to pictorial treatment of the most varied kind in the long progress from Seymour to Mr. Luke Fildes; and the Pickwick Papers, notwithstanding the threatening circumstances that attended its issue at the outset, is generally admitted to be among the more fortunate. Despite all that has been written on the early illustrations of Pickwick, the study of these photo-engravings of the original drawings of Seymour, R. W. Buss, and "Phiz" will be found to be by many not far short of a revelation. Everybody knows the story of the difficulties that beset author and publishers in providing designs for the first three parts. Now, for the first time, these difficulties receive literal illustration. Mr. Johnson quotes a statement, prepared by the artist in 1872, that sets forth the circumstances in which R. W. Buss became Seymour's successor, and the causes of the failure that led to the happy employment of "Phiz." Buss, it appears, was loth to undertake the work, as he had "never had an etching-needle in his hand," and was "entirely ignorant" of the practice of etching. His attempts naturally failed, and when Part III. appeared, "with two illustrations by R. W. Buss," the etchings were the work of another. The comparison of these plates with the original drawings now reproduced and with two other designs, "Pickwick at the Review" and the "Influence of the Salmon" (51, 110), goes a long way to vindicate the artist's reputation. These drawings are considerably more vigorous and fresh than the two etchings, though their quality does not in the least affect the superior illustrative value of the designs by "Phiz." The two new designs by this artist are "The Warden's Room" and "Mr. Winkle's First Shot," which is a capital design of the prostrate sportsman surrounded by his dismayed friends. The anxiety of Mr. Snodgrass and the bewilderment of Mr. Pickwick are most laughably pourtrayed. A comparison of "The Fat Boy Awake" by R. W. Buss and the same theme treated by "Phiz" is very instructive. The spirit and vivacity of the second drawing are incontestably superior; indeed, it is one of Hablot Browne's best. One more new drawing is by John Leech, and excellently whimsical it is. It represents Tom Smart's midnight colloquy with the ancient chair, and is slightly touched with colour.

If Buss's work seems to lose individuality in the etchings, some of Seymour's etchings appear to have more vitality than the original drawings, to judge from these facsimiles. This, at least, strikes us in "Mr. Winkle and his Refractory Steed," and in the clever design "The Dying Clown." Mr. Johnson declares the drawings to be "certainly inferior," and he has, we presume, seen and compared the originals. The claim set up for Seymour that he originated the Pickwick Club and its immortal chief was clearly disproved by Dickens in 1847. Mr. Johnson remarks of this much discussed matter, "The idea of a Nimrod club was Seymour's. Seymour's, too, were the well-known figures of Pickwick and his followers." This, of course, is true only in a very limited sense. The figure of Pickwick as he appears in Seymour's delightful drawing of the convivial club was in part suggested by Mr. Edward Chapman's description of a real person, as Dickens was careful to explain in dealing with Seymour's supposed share in the invention of the book. Seymour's Pickwick is an extremely happy conception, it is true, and "Phiz" was too good an artist to make any violent departure from the type. No doubt, as Mr. Johnson suggests, Seymour's design for the cover, of which a reduction appears on the binding of these volumes, hints at other sporting adventures than the placid joys of rook shooting, but Dickens gave the most conclusive reasons for rejecting the hypothesis that the Pickwick Club could have in any circumstances developed into a Nimrod club. It was destined to be mildly antiquarian, if decidedly peripatetic, while studying life in the Home Counties. The excursion to Bath, like much else, was an accident or afterthought in the periodical growth of the book. With respect to the illustrations to the Victoria edition, no one can question the wisdom of giving artistic reproductions in the place of defective impressions of worn plates, even though the faces in several instances, and the figures in a few, are not "clearly made out," as Dickens observes, though in another sense, in a note on the margin of one impression. This defect, so far as it concerns the expression of faces, is perhaps to be found in the drawings, and was, therefore, unavoidable.

BIOGRAPHIES OF WORDS AND THE HOME OF THE ARYAS.*

MR. MAX MÜLLER'S new book is a collection of essays, chiefly reprinted from Good Words, and of letters out of other periodicals and from various people. The topics are etymological and antiquarian; words are traced to their sources, or what Mr. Max Müller holds to be their sources; their changes of significance are examined; the recent arguments as to the original home of the people who spoke Aryan are discussed; and the "Agriologist" is "talked at" rather than argued with. The studies of words are full of interest, even when we are not convinced by Mr. Max Müller's art. The diverse hypotheses as to the "Home of the Aryas" are less absorbing, because it seems hopeless to expect a solution of the problem. "Somewhere in Asia" is Mr. Max Müller's solution, nearly as vague as the only indication The Mulligan ever gave as to his own abode. The talking at "Agriologists" is rather a waste of force. Mr. Max Müller's treatment of his opponents (who call themselves anthropologists) is not satisfactory. First he names them "Agriologists," which means, we presume, "students of savages." That begs the question; the anthropologist studies men in all states of civilization, and Greece is really much more interesting to him than Australia. For Australians and Bushmen, indeed, he would not care a doit, if some of their ways did not appear to afford an explanation of certain oddities that survived among Greeks and Sanskrit-speaking peoples. But Mr. Max Müller dislikes, not only the Agriologists, as he calls them, but the very word "savage." It is a good English word, and has parallels in French and other tongues. It begs no question, like Naturvölker. Used by anthropologists, it denotes men in a certain social condition, rising from Australian Black Fellows and the Bushmen to near the status of the Maoris. But, if Mr. Max Müller will suggest any other word, we will as liefly use it, or even an algebraic sign, like x, if he prefers it. There must be some way of speaking about races who are in the Stone age, are cannibals, are polyandrous, exogamous, without agriculture, and so forth. We will also call Totems "Otems," if he likes, or Kobongs in Australia, Aituas in Samoa, Pacarissas in the Inca empire, and so forth. We would do anything rather than quarrel about mere words, as long as they say what we mean.

These concessions are sportsmanlike, especially as Mr. Max Müller when he deals with Agriologists and their arguments does not usually name them nor their works. This may be dignified, but it is not convenient. A critic or a reader wants to know who is being talked at, and would like to compare that person's account of his own views with Mr. Max Müller's statement thereof. Who are the "students of Agriology" who try to "laugh away" his derivation of Father? Where do they laugh? Mr. Max Müller says that "father was intended by the early Aryas as a feeder, protector, and lord." He means "or lord," for he adds, "which of these three meanings was present to the mind of the original framers of the word it is impossible to say." But it is undeniable that if all Aryan words for father mean either "lord," "protector," or "feeder," the people who first used the word had given the father a recognized status in the family. We would still be ignorant whether one child could call many men "father," and had to look to a polyandrous association for food and protection or not. But it would be plain that, in some way and to some extent, fatherhood was recognized. It would follow that the Aryans, before their dispersion, had emerged from mere promiscuity, and the recognition of none but maternal kinship. But "who's a denigiing of it?" The lowest Australians, even where they count kindred by the mother's side, expect the father to feed his offspring, and do not allow him, we believe, to feed on it. Has any Agriologist been alleging that when they dispersed, the Aryas were lower than the Kamilaroi? What the Agriologist probably says is that he doubts whether father, or the root PÂ, had originally any one of Mr. Max Müller's alternative senses. We may incline to derive pâ from the babblings of babyhood. But Mr. Max Müller "cannot listen to the Agriologist," even though he allows that the sinner has "great names" on his side. Very well, don't listen; it may not be scholarly to listen, we may say to Mr. Max Müller; but do tell us who the wicked men are that "laugh away" your facts, and where the laughter may be heard, and who maintains that, when the words common to all Aryan tongues were evolved, the speakers were lower than perhaps the lowest known—what shall we call them if we may not say savages? And do you find that among races really gynæcocratic the language bears witness to the institution? That is a point for the philologist.

Anthropologists are inclined to believe that all races have come through a state of society in which kinship was reckoned on the mother's side. This would point, probably, to a time when fatherhood was uncertain, as a rule, and marriage, as a rule, not what it is, or should be, now. Mr. Max Müller appears to call the state of society thus indicated "metrocratic." He says, "Whenever language has been forced to give evidence in support of metrocratic and similar theories, the attempt has always failed." We are not so very sure of that. We shall not argue about ἀδελφός. It may be as Mr. Max Müller thinks, or it may be as his unnamed opponents hold; certainty cannot be attained. But ὁμοσίπυοι and ὁμόκαποι (Ar. Pol. 1, 2, 14, 15) are words for kinsfolk that donnent furieusement à penser. We do not observe that Mr. Max Muller notices them, nor ὁμογαλάκτες, which is yet more in point. Mr. Max Müller avers that students of prehistoric ages have drawn a picture of "bloody savagery," derived mostly from "uncivilized races of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries." We do not know that savagery is more "bloody" than a civilization of Krupp guns, guillotines, torpedoes, and the like. But the prehistoric student derives much of his material, of course, from races known t Aristotle, who, as Mr. Newman says, "notes the frequency of γυναικοκρατία among barbarians," and alludes to many of their customs. We have Strabo's savages, and those of Herodotus, not to speak of all the voyagers between Hecatæus and Marco Polo, between Marco Polo and Brébeuf. The prehistoric student's hypothesis is that people who were destitute of the metals, and lived mainly on shell-fish and the chase—say, twenty thousand years ago—were probably much akin in mental character and social habits to people who lived in the same way thirty years ago. But it is reserved for Mr. Max Müller to assure us that the Aryans certainly used stone weapons before their separation, and cannot be shown to have used metal. We shall not infer that the Aryans were savages before their separation. But we venture to say that few known races unacquainted with the metals have been much better than savages. However, it is very hard to discuss Mr. Max Müller's battles, when he does not tell us who his opponents are, nor where their contentions are to be found.

Some critics may think they have caught Mr. Max Müller in an inconsistency. As we do not feel sure that we understand his position, we cannot say whether those critics will be right or not. In his Introduction he asserts that "every Root predicates an abstract or general concept," even in the languages of "so-called savages." We shall call them Men Fridays, for the rest of this article, to please Mr. Max Müller. Thus, "all words are based on abstract concepts," and "abstraction is proved to have come first," not last (pp. x. xi.). But, almost immediately after announcing that "abstraction comes first," and that "all words are based on abstract concepts," Mr. Max Müller avers that "every word expresses in the beginning something that could be handled, or smelt, or seen, or heard." Then was the root always a sign of an abstract conception, while the word was so very concrete? And, if abstraction came first, why had "every word to spend some time in the cradle and the nursery, and during that period there is little call for abstract ideas and sublime conceptions" (p. 17)?

Are these statements eventually contradictory or not? If abstraction is out of place "in the cradle," how did it "come first"? "The very ground floor of our language is made up of abstract terms," and yet in the cradle of language "there is little call for abstract ideas." What is the puzzled reader of Good Words to think of this philosophy of cradles and ground floors? Perhaps the truth is that the conscious and the unconscious use of general ideas by mankind have got rather mixed in these speculations. But we frankly admit that we feel a little lost, and Mr. Max Müller may not be contradicting himself at all.

Among Mr. Max Müller's biographies of words the most curious is devoted to Fors, Fortuna. Preller derives Fors from fero, as sors from sero. Mr. Max Müller does not notice this analogy of Fors and sors, fero and sero, but looks for Fors in Sanskrit roots. He does not think that Fors is the Dea quæ fert. He thinks that, like almost every other immortal thing, Fors is the Dawn!

Who, then, was this Fors, the first-born, who can be conceived both as the daughter and as the mother of Jupiter? According to the language of Aryan mythology, the first born of the bright gods is the Dawn. She is called Agriyâ, the first . . . . the same Dawn is also called the daughter of Dyaus (Zeus) . . . . There are, in fact, few praises bestowed in the Veda on Ushas, the Dawn, which cannot be transferred to Fortuna, thus showing her to have been originally, like Ushas, the bright light of each day, worshipped from the earliest days as the Fortuna hujusce diei.

Because you can praise a Roman goddess in the terms which an Indian applied to an Indian goddess, therefore they are the same goddess! One might as well argue that Queen Elizabeth was Mary Stuart, or that Carow's Celia was Waller's Saccharissa. Did any men ever reason like philologists? As to the etymological argument that Fors descends from a Sanskrit root HAR, how often must Mr. Max Müller be reminded of his own doctrine that Latin is not derived nor descended from Sanskrit? Ex hypothesi, the Latin races had split off before Sanskrit began to be spoken. We are quite content with Fors from fero, as with sors from sero. But we fancy that the other philologists will accept the Dawn Fors when they accept the Dawn Athene and the Dawn Daphne. Indeed, all speculations on Roots, on their original sense, on the extent to which that sense may be traced in words connected with them, seem rather hazardous. The discussion of a word like persona, with the remarkable fluctuations in its meaning which have affected creeds, is a more satisfactory and more interesting essay. The difficulty of discovering the origin of the Latin litera is frankly acknowledged, with this excellent moral, "All that remains for the present is to confess our ignorance, a very good lesson now and then, to the etymologist as well as to everybody else." Ignorance is now admitted as to the knowledge of iron by the Aryas before their separation. On this point the negative and affirmative have been alternately in favour, doubt is really the scientific attitude. As to soma, again, the sacred plant of the Vedas, it may have been hops, or the vine, or something else. Mr. Thiselton Dyer says, "I should not wonder if the hop were really a sort a plant, though widely remote in character and geographical position from its prototype." Yet another "chip," to use Mr. Max Müller's old word, is concerned with ethnology in India, and takes the form of a letter to Mr. H. H. Risley. Mr. Müller says that "statements that in Australia members of the same Totem are encouraged to marry are received with incredulity." The custom thus indicated is certainly most unusual, and an anthropologist would like to know the authority for it, and whether a confusion has not been made between the group an Australian must marry within and that within which he may not marry (Frazer, Totemism, p. 69). But Mr. Max Müller tells us neither who received the statement with incredulity nor who is its author. Of course Mr. Max Müller is quite right in attacking the logic of people (whoever they may be) who maintain that the pig "may have been the Totem of the Jews," because the pig might not be eaten. As a general rule, a Totem may not be eaten, except on solemn occasions of ritual, but it does not follow that every beast which may not be eaten was once a Totem. This argument would resemble the doctrine that Fors = Dawn, because similar epithets of praise are applied to each goddess. We are not told who the ethnologists are that proclaim the pig a Jewish Totem; he may have been a Totem; but there is no use in saying so without proof, and it is absurd to suppose that, if the Jews were ever Totemists, they had only one Totem. Some philological logic needs to have a watchful eye kept upon it, and so, apparently, does the logic of some ethnologists. The students of either science must keep the others in order. For example, why does Mr. Max Müller say there is no mention of fish being eaten in the Homeric poems or the Veda? We know this is incorrect about Homer (Od. xii. 331), not to mention Homeric allusions to oyster-catching and angling.

NEW MUSIC.

THE past year has been distinguished by the production of a great number of patriotic cantatas and songs, doubtless the result of the Jubilee and the inspiring circumstances attending upon that event. Among the most recent of these, none has had greater merit than "Our Watchword," a short patriotic cantata by Mr. Edward G. Croager, set to admirable and stirring words by Miss Mildred Beresford Hope. The music is bright and spirited and the baritone solo, "The knights of old prepared," most effective. The chorus, too, is excellent, and sure to create a favourable impression when sung by a good choir. This cantata, which is published by Messrs. Weekes & Co., has the advantage of not being very difficult.

From Messrs. Enoch & Sons we have also received a number of new songs. "Stars of Earth," the words written, arranged, and adapted, with violin and cello obbligato, by Mr. Michael Watson, to a celebrated cavatina by Joachim Raff, is a work of very great merit. The air is extremely beautiful, and Mr. Watson's share of the work is admirable. "The Golden Anchor," by Mr. Milton Wellings, is written in this composer's well-known style, and is likely to become popular. Mr. Cowen's new songs, "Tears" and "The Kissing Gate," are, the first a semi-sacred song, and the second a light and sprightly semi-serio song, but not very original. A bright little song, for baritone or bass, is "The Mountebank's Story," by Mr. Michael Watson; but the words are not particularly good. Mr. H. Pontet's new song, "Angel Tears," has sentimental words and a rather doleful but catchy melody. It can be cordially recommended to school-teachers. A common-place song, in the usual dying-soldier style, is "The Soldier's Dream," by Mr. P. Rodney, whose Sion, a "sacred song," with harmonium accompaniment, will doubtless soon become popular in religious circles and Sunday schools. A very lively song is "When we were Young," by Mr. John Crook, which Messrs. Arthur Roberts and J. J. Dallas have rendered popular in The Old Guard. "The Dashing Militaire," by Robert Planquette, is also taken from The Old Guard, and may be well described in the rather old-fashioned way, as being "a rattling good after-dinner song."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

It is not uninteresting, especially as henceforward we shall have no excuse for treating Les lettres et les arts (Boussod et Valadon) in this article, to take its last appearance as intended for the English public in a French dress (the last number of the old year) and contrast it with the first number of Art and Letters for the new year. The old form (which seems a little more natural) opens with one of M. Lynch's tinted pieces, an agreeable, if slightly "airified," young woman playing the piano, with a sort of béret or toque on her head. This is corresponded to in the new by another agreeable young woman, the character of whose general appearance is almost sufficiently indicated by remarking that her creator is M. Ch. Chaplin. She has nothing on her head, and has kindly disposed the little which she has on anywhere so as to be as slight an obstacle to curiosity as possible. But both are pretty pictures. In the leading or opening letterpress January and English has perhaps the advantage over December and French, for the continuation of M. Halévy's "Notes on the Commune" is more attractive than M. Pouvillon's "Impressions of Cauterets." In the earlier number M. de Monvel has a very well composed "interior" of very modern ladies and gentlemen, waiting for a fashionable doctor; M. A. Moreau a spirited "Cachucha"; while "Au nom du Roi" is brightly and quaintly illustrated with coloured vignettes of the extravaganza kind. There is nothing very noteworthy in the letterpress of the number. In the transformed January, after escaping the snares of M. Chaplin's Delilah, we come, as we have said, to M. Halévy's "Recollections," which, though they must needs lose in style, lose nothing in matter by translation. A picture of the devoted "fisher with the line" taking advantage of misrule to pursue his sport in close-time under the very eaves of burning palaces and others adorn the paper, which contains some more of M. Halévy's odd Anglophobia. "History on Fans" has many small illustrations and two very fine full-page examples. There is a good reproduction of M. Meissonier's "Ney," with some verses, the necessity of translating which reveals a weak point in the scheme. M. Lynch is here again, as usual, with his graceful évaporées; and the frontispiece above described is followed up by a paper on its clever author, our countryman, French as he seems. More of his very charming studies of nature unadorned, or very little adorned, are given. The author, M. Masson, says that M. Chaplin "has not only painted the Parisienne, he has robed her." Now we should not quite have said that. Let us end by noticing M. Sarcey's notices of Mlles. Bartet and Samarc.

Messrs. Rivingtons (1) have added two good and useful little reading-books to their list—an edition of the Cid and some extracts from M. Hector Malot's Sans famille.

The "Bibliothèque Populaire des Ecoles de Dessin" (2), of which the little book on Tiles which is before us is a member, is a capital example of cheap literature, the volumes being published at seventy-five centimes, and the example now under consideration containing some scores of excellent engravings. The tiles represented are all actual examples, and the designs, geometrical, arabesque, or figure, are always curious, and sometimes beautiful.

No particular principle seems to guide the selection of the pretty little pocket volumes which form M. Dupret's "Collection bleue" (3). Of those before us M. Ginisty's book is made up of articles on odd collectors' fancies—murderers' letters, locks and keys, and so forth. The passage of Dion Chrysostom which M. Fauvel has translated is a pretty picture in the style of the late Greek sophists, somewhat artificial, but still agreeable enough, of Greek country life under the Roman Empire. The writers of this kind and time are rather too much neglected by ordinary classical education, and it is well that attention should be drawn to them.

M. Delagrave's Voyages dans tous les mondes (4) are well-got-up little volumes, neatly bound, which is always an advantage, and well printed, but not illustrated. M. Müller has naturally been supplied with the bulk of his rather oddly conceived book (Why not "Voyages of Grocers"? or "Voyages of Fishers with the Line"?—this latter has a geographical suggestion of itself) by Regnard's well-known travels, without which the notion would perhaps not have occurred to him. The rest is chiefly made up of the still more famous prose and verse Voyage of Chapelle and Bachaumont, and of the numerous imitations which it called forth, some of them by very famous persons, during the eighteenth century. M. Challamel has made a good and careful sketch of the topographical and social appearance of mediæval France; a sketch suffering only from the usual, and indeed inevitable, drawback of such things—that the "Middle Ages" being a very long period, and the information about them much scattered in date and place, there is a danger of exhibiting in juxtaposition things that were never actually juxtaposed.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

Elizabeth Gilbert and her Work for the Blind, by Frances Martin (Macmillan & Co.), is an interesting record of the life and labours of the founder of the Association for promoting the General Welfare of the Blind. The success that attended Miss Gilbert's benevolent exertions is perhaps less notable than the faith and courage she exhibited at the outset of her career, against formidable prejudices and in circumstances that were peculiarly trying. Afflicted with loss of sight from early childhood, Miss Gilbert passed the first twenty-five years of her life in comparative seclusion at Oxford, enjoying exceptional educational advantages and far removed from actual contact with the world of suffering she subsequently did so much to alleviate. She was surrounded with conditions of life that seemed to offer no way of escape into spheres of activity, and a visit to the School for the Blind at St. John's Wood in 1842 aroused the first impulse towards the important work of her life. The lot of the poor and friendless blind, necessarily among the hardest conceivable, was especially deplorable at this date. Asylums and schools there were, but no institutions that provided employment for the adult blind who were willing to work at useful and remunerative handicrafts. It was for this class of sufferers, rendered blind by accident or illness, often in the prime of life, that Miss Gilbert devised the scheme which was started in a very humble style in Holborn in 1854, and three years later resulted in the founding of the Association now so well known.

Life and Labour, by Samuel Smiles, LL.D. (Murray), is exceedingly like other books by Dr. Smiles, such as Self-Help and Character. Its nature is sufficiently indicated to readers of those books by merely citing the title and author. It is an encyclopædic collection of facts illustrating the industry, culture, and habits of famous men, quite as tiresome to read as the volumes mentioned, and as profitable to dip into at the propitious moment. There is for many people, we do not doubt, a recreative virtue in this book, the more effectual, perhaps, when the contents are administered in small doses. Fortunately this plan is perfectly feasible by the judicious arrangement of the various chapters.

Mr. Edwin Hodder's Life of Samuel Morley (Hodder & Stoughton) possesses little of the characteristics of biography and cannot greatly assist the average newspaper reader of mature age by its somewhat prolix narrative of the external facts of an active life. There is a prodigious amount of husk and very little kernel. Samuel Morley was a public man by the possession of other qualities than those that made him influential in certain political circles. The politician and Nonconformist are so prominent in these pages that we seem to be reading the annals of political dissent rather than the biography of a man who was never a leading politician. Mr. Hodder has produced a bulky volume from material which, though large in amount, comprised, he says, "little of the kind that a biographer prizes." Mr. Morley was not a voluminous correspondent, and he left no journals or diaries. This, of course, explains to some extent the incompleteness of the book, though it does not account for the liberal gift of Mr. Hodder's tediousness. There is more real revelation of character in one letter from Mr. Morley to his son, Mr. Arnold Morley (p. 284), than in a hundred pages of Mr. Hodder's explicit chronicle. In this letter the writer refers to Mr. Disraeli's prompt resignation in 1868 as "entitling him to the hearty acknowledgments of the Liberal party," and adds, with exquisite naïveté, "He really has some good points about him."

For an American series of biographies—the "Boys' and Girls' Library"—Mr. Edward Everett Hale has "studied anew" The Life of George Washington (Putnam's Sons), being intent on presenting "the human Washington," as distinguished from Washington the demigod, as he is generally represented in American literature. There is much to be said in favour of Mr.

Hale's attempt to present Washington to the youth of America free from the distorting influence of the national afflatus. His book is not a bad one for young people, though we should prefer for them a good abstract of Irving's work. Mr. Hale lapses at times into the use of the present tense with curious abruptness, and he is by no means true to his ideal as regards padding.

The British Roll of Honour, by Peter Lund Simmonds, F.L.S. (Dean & Sons), is an illustrated directory of the decorated. It contains descriptions of English and foreign knightly orders, and a list of British subjects who have been honoured with decorations, with full particulars of their nature, dates of acquisition, and addresses.

A Midsummer Night Dream, by E.V.B. (Eton College Press), is a little memorial book on the Jubilee festivities at Eton, printed for the benefit of the Windsor bazaar held last November.

Mr. W. H. Groser's Scripture Natural History (Religious Tract Society) is a useful little volume for Bible teachers and readers, which treats of the "Trees and plants mentioned in the Bible," and forms one of the series of excellent handbooks entitled "By-paths of Bible Knowledge."

Easy Studies in Flower Painting, by Ada Hanbury (Sockl & Nathan), are six coloured plates of floral designs, broad and effective in arrangement and sound in drawing, with instructions for students printed at the foot of each design. The shades in the white petals of camellia and arum are a trifle too cold; otherwise these plates are admirable for the purpose of teachers.

The Rev. John Brown, D.D., is the editor of a well-printed and annotated reprint of the sixth edition (1668)—the oldest in existence, save the first (1666)—of Bunyan's Grace Abounding (Hodder & Stoughton).

We have received the thirteenth volume of Sir Walter Scott's edition of the Works of John Dryden, revised and corrected by Mr. George Saintsbury (Edinburgh: Paterson), comprising the Essay on Satire, and the translations from Juvenal, Persius, and Virgil's Pastorals.

"Bohn's Shilling Library" is a cheap reissue of volumes in the well-known Standard Library of Mr. Bohn, now published by Messrs. Bell & Sons in stout paper covers, or in limp cloth binding that is extremely neat, at eighteenpence. Of these reprints, which are unabridged and in clear type, we have Bacon's Essays, edited by Joseph Devey; Lessing's Laokoon, translated by E. C. Beasley; Cary's version of Dante's Inferno and Miss Anna Swanwick's translation of the First Part of Goethe's Faust.

The Year's Art, 1888, compiled by Marcus B. Huish (Virtue & Co.), is embellished with a series of portraits of the Academicians, some of whom are not flattered by the process employed. As a reference volume and record of the last year, this handbook retains all those features that have been found useful to artists and dealers.

We have received Vanity Fair Album; the Christmas number of the Court and Society Review; the Century Guild Hobby Horse for January (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.); Part I. of the Miniature Cyclopedia (Cassell & Co.); the Handy Volume Atlas of the British Empire (Philip & Son); the Girl's Handy Book (Suttaby); Charades for Children, by J. Keith Angus (Hatchards); Sybil's Dutch Dolls, by F. S. Janet Burne (Field & Tuer); Boys' Games and Girls' Games, by E. D. Bourne (Griffith, Farran, & Co.); Letts & Co.'s Household Account Book; the Norfolk and Norwich Annual (Jarrold); the Protestant Dissenter's Almanac 1888 (Banks & Son), and Weldon & Co.'s Fancy Dress for Children and Fancy Dress for Ladies.

Among our new editions are Mr. Thomson Hankey's Principles of Banking (Effingham Wilson); Practical Biology, by Professor Huxley and Dr. H. N. Martin, revised by Professors G. B. Howe and D. H. Scott (Macmillan); Mr. Francis Parkman's Pioneers of France in the New World (Boston: Little & Co.); George Eliot's Life, by J. W. Cross, in one volume (Blackwood); Hawthorne, by Henry James, "English Men of Letters" (Macmillan); and That Little Girl, by Curtis Yorke (Jarrold).

We have also received the Œdipus Tyrannus, arranged for performance at Cambridge, with music by Professor C. Villiers Stanford (Macmillan & Bowes); Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Books I.–IV., in Morley's "Universal Library" (Routledge); Memoir of Bishop Willson, by Bishop Ullathorne (Burns & Oates); The Church and the Law, by H. P. Thomson (Rivingtons); Tales of Ancient India, by Edmund C. Cox (Thacker & Co.); Twenty-three Years in a House of Mercy, by H. N. (Rivingtons); Mr. W. D. Foulkes' Slav or Saxon (Putnam's Sons); Mr. Fox Russell's Horsekeeping for Amateurs (Upcott Gill); Ballad of Hâdji; and other Poems, by Ian Hamilton (Kegan Paul); the "Cambridge Bible for Schools," Second Book of Kings, annotated by the Rev. J. Rawson Lumby, D.D. (University Press); On the Teaching of History in Schools, by Oscar Browning (Longmans & Co.); the Neo-Hellenic Manual (Allen & Co.); Kristo Dal Pal: a Study, by Nagendra Natt Ghose (Calcutta: Lahéri); Mr. J. W. Slater's Sewage Treatment, Purification and Utilization (Whittaker); An Inquiry into Socialism, by T. Kirkup (Longmans); The Brook, by Lord Tennyson, illustrated by A. Woodruff (Macmillan); The Lay of St. Jucundus, by Edith W. Robinson, illustrated by George Hodgson (Sonnenschein); and Poems, by Edgar Hewitt (Wyman).

WORKS BY PROFESSOR MOMERIE.

I

AGNOSTICISM. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"To readers who do not demand that 'the scheme of salvation in its fulness' should be enunciated in every sermon, this volume, which is happily free from rhetoric, and for the most part from any ostentation of the reading which it indicates, will be interesting from its acuteness, learning, and insight."—Saturday Review.

II

PERSONALITY; the Beginning and End of Metaphysics, and a Necessary Assumption in all Positive Philosophy. Third Edition, revised. Crown 8vo. 3s.

"This is a little book, but it contains more sound philosophy than many pretentious treatises......In an admirably lucid way the author scatters to the winds the baseless assumptions of the sense philosophy."—British Quarterly Review.

III

DEFECTS of MODERN CHRISTIANITY; and other Sermons. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"Throughout Mr. Momerie's attractive little volume the morning air of the new world breathes through the dry leaves of the old theology."—Westminster Review.

"There is an intellectuality, spirituality, and a simplicity in Mr. Momerie's sermons that should make them models for young preachers."—Christian Union.

IV

THE BASIS of RELIGION; being an Examination of "Natural Religion." Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"The result of profound study and earnest thought ....This attempt to sketch out a basis for rational theology is fitted to the needs of the times.........Professor Momerie has won for himself a name as one of the most powerful and original thinkers of the day." Globe.

V

THE ORIGIN of EVIL; and other Sermons. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"Professor Momerie has done well to publish his sermons; they are good reading......... A real contribution to the side of common-sense religion" Saturday Review.

"We decidedly recommend them to persons perplexed by the speculations of modern science."—Spectator.

"These sermons are some of the very best produced in this country within the last hundred years."—Inquirer.

VI

PREACHING and HEARING; and other Sermons. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

"The author, himself one of the most eloquent preachers of the day, is eminently qualified to do justice to his subject. He has brought to it an experience and scholarly proficiency which few men could have done."—Christian Union.

BELIEF in GOD. Crown 8vo. 3s.

"We have no doubt that its clear forcible style, and its vigorous reasonings on behalf of belief in a supernatural power, at once personal and infinite, will recommend it to a large number of intelligent readers."—Scotsman.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE BASTILLE. By Captain the Hon. D. A. BINGHAM. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Illustrations, 32s.

"....Readers will find unfailing delight in Captain Bingham's book, because, no matter where they open it, they will be sure to light upon a new fact, or to find fresh light thrown upon familiar knowledge.. .Captain Bingham has produced a substantial contribution to our knowledge of a very difficult, very fascinating, and greatly misrepresented period of French history."—St. James's Gazette.

MONARCHS I HAVE MET. By W. BEATTY-KINGSTON, Author of "Music and Manners." 2 vols. demy 8vo. 24s.

"Mr. Beatty-Kingston has given the world a charmingly written series of 'Word Sketches' which reflect with perfect accuracy the peculiar little traits of character and disposition displayed by his august models, and which present Court life in an entirely novel aspect. He enables his readers to look upon regal splendours and princely deeds from a standpoint hitherto unattainable by ordinary mortals......The reader in this conspicuously able book will meet with a fund of entertaining and instructive anecdote and story." Morning Post.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS in a WAGGON: Sport and Travels in South Africa. By ANDREW A. ANDERSON. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 24s.

"A thoroughly conscientious and well-informed work is that by Andrew A. Anderson ......'Twenty-five Years in a Waggon' is a perfect mine of information as regards the forest and veldt."—Graphic.

"A really interesting book about South Central Africa......Mr. Anderson has achieved a great and useful purpose, and withal so joyously that the reader's gratitude is almost boundless."—Spectator.

UNDINE: a Romance. Translated from the German of DE LA MOTTE FOUQUÉ. With an Introduction by JULIA CARTWRIGHT, and Illustrated by Heywood Sumner. Crown 4to. 5s.

"A work looked upon by Heine, Coleridge, and others as an exquisite conception. In the opinion of Edgar Poe, the pathos of the tale is only equalled by the scene of Little Nell's death by Charles Dickens. The language even in the translation is full of poetry, and forms one of the most charming of Christmas stories. The present edition is beautifully illustrated and elegantly bound, and will undoubtedly be in great request as a gift-book at this season of the year."—Court Journal.

THE "RUSSIA'S HOPE"; or, Britannia no longer Rules the Waves. Showing how the Muscovite Bear got at the British Whale. Translated from the original Russian by CHARLES JAMES COOKE. Crown 8vo. 1s. [This day.

 Uniform with "Lectures on Ecclesiastes."

"This scholarly and yet most effective and popular book........No one who takes up the volume is willing to lay it down till he gets to the end of it........A volume which could not have been written by a mere expert in Hebrew scholarship, or a mere layman who had not mastered the drift of the immense mass of modern and ancient criticism on this remarkable book."—Spectator.

THE THEORY and USE of a PHYSICAL BALANCE.

By JAMES WALKER, M.A., Demonstrator at the Clarendon Laboratory. Demy 8vo. with Lithographs, stiff cover, 3s. 6d. [Just published.

This account of the Physical Balance was intended originally as a chapter of a book on Practical Physics for the use of students at the Clarendon Laboratory. As it is probable that the publication of the complete course may be delayed, it has been thought advisable to publish the chapters as they are ready without waiting for the rest of the work.

PERSONAL REMEMBRANCES of SIR

FREDERICK POLLOCK, Second Baronet, sometime Queen's Remembrancer. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s.

The Times says:—"Multum in parvo might be the motto of this book......Sir Frederick Pollock's moderately sized volumes may be praised for lucid and lively condensation, and their interest is as diversified as it is comprehensive.........The writer has made acquaintance with most of the well-known wits and men of light and leading in the arts and sciences, in law and literature......In reluctantly taking leave of the 'Remembrances,' we can only repeat that they are as free from prolixity as they are full of variety."

The Globe says:—"One of the most entertaining autobiographies which the season has produced."

The World says:—"Sir Frederick Pollock has many good stories to tell......He has always been, as every one knows, a firm patron of the theatre, and its pages contain many stories thereof and many sensible notes thereon."

NEW NOVELS.

PAUL PATOFF. By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "A Roman Singer," "Mr. Isaacs," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Athenæum says:—"The originality of it, the charm of the description, and the brilliancy of the narrative are undeniable. Mr. Crawford's pictures of Constantinople and the Bosphorus show some of the highest qualities of his vivid and graceful style."

The St. James's Gazette says: "The action of the story never flags. Movement is one of the principal charms of this very entertaining book........Those who neglect to read 'Paul Patoff' will throw away a very pleasurable opportunity."

The Times says:—"There is much to fascinate us in 'Paul Patoff.' We are given a vivid picture of Modern Constantinople; and the author's instinct has told him in what dark corners of Stamboul the Western mind finds the deepest fascination."

THE NEW ANTIGONE. A Romance. 3 vols.

Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Times says:—"A daring outline and fine workmanship give this novel a claim to more than ordinary attention........Few more dramatic situations could be conceived, and it is unnecessary to peruse the story further to illustrate the genuine power and originality of the author. We have spoken of fine workmanship; and the 'New Antigone' is full of evidence that we stand in the presence of a finished author........He has a command of elegant metaphor, a brilliant imagination, and a genius for subjective analysis. But we may say on the whole that the 'New Antigone' will succeed if destined to succeed at all, by the striking manner in which daring heresies are brought upon the stage."

HARMONIA. By the Author of "Estelle

Russell." 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Academy says: "'Harmonia' is not so much a story with the orthodox hero, heroine, and plot, as a sketch of a little community whose character is simple and well marked, and whose manners are more or less primitive........'Harmonia' is a new 'city' in one of the United States lying south of 'Dixie's line' and the story deals with the characters and fortunes of some of the earliest citizens, who constitute a rather miscellaneous crowd......but, indeed, the book is good throughout."

MRS. PENICOTT'S LODGER; and other

Stories. By Lady SOPHIA PALMER. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The Spectator says: "Lady Sophia Palmer shows a great deal of power in these stories."

ISMAY'S CHILDREN. By the Author of

"Flitters, Tatters, and the Counsellor," "Hogan, M.P.," "The Hon. Miss Ferrard." 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Guardian says:—"Amongst the various books which have been recently written on Ireland, it is not too much to say that 'Ismay's Children' is one that has depicted most powerfully and accurately the condition and opinions of the Irish peasantry. 'Ismay's Children' is a series of studies, a gallery of portraits, all excellent........The story is the best introduction we know to the history of the Irish land question........marked with impartiality and truth."

The Manchester Examiner:—"The book gives one of the most vigorous and graphic pictures of the hard realities of Irish life in the rural districts which has ever been printed. 'Ismay's Children' is evidently an outcome not of imaginative power alone—though there is plenty of that—but of intimate personal knowledge.......The book, as a whole, captivates the imagination and bites itself into the memory."

THE CHOICE of BOOKS; and other Literary

Pieces. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Globe 8vo. 6s.

 Also a LARGE-PAPER EDITION, choicely printed on hand-made paper, and bound in buckram, 8vo. 15s.

Manuals and Text Books of Geography.

"I feel strongly the great importance of the subject, not only as a mental discipline and essential part of a liberal education, but as more especially necessary for Englishmen, many of whom will be called upon in after life to turn their geographical knowledge to practical and serious account."—One of the opinions of Head-Masters of English Public Schools in the Report of THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY on Geographical Education, 1885.

MODERN.

THE STUDENT'S MANUAL of MODERN GEOGRAPHY; Mathematical, Physical, and Descriptive. By Canon W. L. BEVAN, M.A. New and Revised Edition. With 150 Maps and Woodcuts. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"Modern geography has up to quite a recent date been almost entirely neglected in many of our large schools, and where professedly taught has in too many instances been made the most repulsive instead of the most fascinating of studies. Such books must ever be not less welcome to teacher than to pupil."—Standard.

A SCHOOL MANUAL of MODERN GEOGRAPHY. By JOHN RICHARDSON. Post 8vo. 400 pp. 5s.

"After a careful examination we are bound to say that it is the most comprehensive, accurate, and methodical geography with which we are familiar, and bears on every page unmistakable traces of careful and industrious research. It fully sustains the high reputation of Mr. Murray's series of manuals, and we venture to predict for it a wide popularity. Bearing in mind its high character, it is a model of cheapness."—School Guardian.

A SMALLER MANUAL of MODERN GEOGRAPHY. By JOHN RICHARDSON. 16mo. 2s. 6d.

"We frankly acknowledge that we have never seen anything of its kind, and for its space at all approaching to this Smaller Geography."—English Churchman.

THE STUDENT'S GEOGRAPHY of BRITISH INDIA. By GEORGE SMITH, LL.D.

"This book is a marvel of labour and condensation, and its compiler states that he has prepared himself for his task for more than twenty years."—Spectator.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

NEW EDITION, THOROUGHLY REVISED.

Honorary Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. With Maps and Tables. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d. (127th Thousand.)

The necessity has long been recognized for a revised edition of this well-known book; but Mr. Green always felt that no revision would be satisfactory that was otherwise than complete, and he was unhappily not spared to carry this out himself. The book has therefore remained substantially unaltered until now. In this new edition, which was undertaken at the Author's express wish, Mrs. Green has been careful not to interfere with the plan or structure of the book; but, while guided in general by the later work of her husband in his larger history, she has not hesitated to avail herself also of books recently published, and of the ready help and advice of many of Mr. Green's historical friends, including the Bishop of Chester, Canon Creighton, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Lecky, and Professor Gardiner. Marginal notes and dates are for the first time given throughout, which will add to the convenience of the book for school use; and the chronological tables have been carefully revised.

A TREATISE on ALGEBRA. By CHARLES SMITH, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; Author of "Elementary Algebra," "Conic Sections," "An Elementary Treatise on Solid Geometry," &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

This book is designed for the use of Higher Classes of Schools and the Junior Students in the Universities. No pains have been spared to ensure variety and interest in the Examples. With this end in view, hundreds of Examination Papers have been consulted, including, with very few exceptions, every paper which has been set in Cambridge for many years past. Amongst the Examples will also be found many interesting theorems, which have been taken from different Mathematical journals.

NEW EDITION, THOROUGHLY REVISED AND ENLARGED.

THE LEWIS DEER RAIDERS.

THE failure of the prosecution of the Lewis deer raiders is a most untoward event, for reasons which shall be set forth presently. But it does not, as some ignorant or interested persons have pretended, show that the disease of Irish juries has spread to Scotland in the slightest degree. In the first place, the verdict was "Not guilty as libelled"—that is to say, "as indicted"—and the jury were so careful of this proviso that their foreman called special attention to its omission by an officer of the Court. In other words, the prisoners were found not guilty of mobbing and rioting, or inciting to mob and riot—the two charges to which, surely by a most fatal blunder, the Crown lawyers had confined the indictment. Secondly, the evidence was of anything but a satisfactory or well-arranged character. The strongest part of it was supplied by an informer, who had taken part in the riot. Even so, the proof of incitement at the particular meeting alleged to have been held for that purpose was very weak, and that of identity, or actual partaking, in some cases not strong. Again, it was frankly admitted by the keepers that they had made no effort whatever to exclude or turn off the invaders, but had confined themselves to keeping ahead of them as far as they could, and driving the deer away. Yet again, it was admitted that no resistance was offered to the officers of the law, and that the raiders quietly dispersed when the Riot Act was read, and peacefully surrendered to take their trial. Thus the destruction of the deer not being a criminal offence in itself, the whole thing resolved itself, under the peculiar management of the business, into a case of trespass in numbers, and this was not charged. It is true that the Judge discouraged the contention of prisoners' counsel on this head, and gave an opinion that the indictment did cover the facts proved. But it is said that his charge was imperfectly heard, and whether this was so or not, it gives a most uncertain sound as read. Perhaps it may be almost sufficient to say that some English observers, following the trial from day to day, not in the meagre accounts of the London press, but in the full reports of the Scotch newspapers, came to the conclusion that the Crown would be very unlikely to obtain a verdict; and this not on the principles of Scotch law (on which no Englishman till he reaches the House of Lords can dare to express an opinion), but simply on the evidence and the conduct of the case.

We fear, therefore, that in Scotland, as in England and in Ireland, the country has been but ill served by its servants. To utter even sarcastically in Radical hearing the opinion that Crown Law officers ought to be paid by fees on convictions might draw down upon the rash speaker some such consequences as those which have punished Mr. BALFOUR for holding conversation, whatever it was, with Mr. BLUNT; but there would be some reason for the sarcasm. In this case, as in the first abortive prosecution of the Lord Mayor of DUBLIN, and as in the matter of the person called SAUNDERS in London, the Government seems to have been anything but well advised or well served. In both these cases, however, it has been fortunately possible to repair the mischief done; it remains to be seen whether it will be equally possible in Scotland. One of the liberated rioters, exhibiting at once his gratitude for escape and his true character, is reported to have expressed to some loafers in the street outside the court his fear, or hope, that "there would "not be a deer left in Lewis by the time he came back," and something of the kind appears to be feared all over the Highlands and Islands. The people—and this is one of the main difficulties with them—are exceedingly ignorant and simple almost beyond belief; and the agitators who have already deluded them will be certain to represent the failure of the Edinburgh trial as a legal authorization of deer-raiding. Meanwhile there are other and still more serious disturbances in the same island. This time there is not even the odium ferinum for excuse, the mania which makes good Radicals alter the often-quoted dictum and love the tall deer as CAIN loved his brother. A sheep farm in Lewis is about to be vacant, and the Crofters demand that it shall be portioned out to swell their crofts. This demand Lady MATHESON, using the not illogical argument that if, as they say, they cannot pay the rent of so many acres, they will hardly be able to pay the rent of so many more, has declined; and accordingly riotous mobs have assembled, have torn down fences, have assaulted, injured, and driven back the police, so that the military have had to be called out. Here, it will be observed, the pretexts for the Park raid, trumpery as they were, are absolutely wanting. There is no rich intruder "exterminating" the people (Park, it should be observed, had been found wholly unsuitable to any kind of cultivation or grazing) for his sport. There is no ostensibly peaceful procession to do a not intrinsically criminal act; but plain damage to property and violence to persons. The law which, whether in a poetical or a metaphorical fit, no one knows, has decided that if I buy, breed, or otherwise acquire one animal with horns, it is my property, but that if I buy, breed, or otherwise produce and acquire another animal with horns, it is nobody's property and everybody's, has had no such merry conceit about farmers' fences or policemen's heads. The Galson rioters have been acting, if reports are true, with the grossest illegality; yet it is impossible to deny that the Park raid and its result will throw obstacles in the way of their due punishment, though it makes that punishment more desirable than ever.

There is another part of the LORD JUSTICE CLERK'S summing up, besides his undecided dwelling on the legal aspect of rioting or unlawful assembly, which seems to us unfortunate. He pronounced the raiders "well-behaved "peasants," whereas from another part of his own speech it appeared that he thought them very ill-behaved indeed, and he expressed his "fear that it was only too true that "destitution" was the cause of their action and his "greatest sympathy with their sufferings." This is pretty, popular, and consonant with much cant of the day; but it does not seem to us judicious or judicial. Even the actual pressure of hunger does not excuse an illegal act; and nobody pretends that any one of the Lewis raiders was driven by the actual pressure of hunger to rise, kill, and eat a deer. On the contrary, the admitted motive of the rioters was, by spoiling the lessee's sport, to get him to throw up the forest, and so, in the long run, to get the land for themselves. This is a calculated scheme extending over a long period, during which the actual pressure of hunger would have time to finish off a population ten times as great as that of the Lews. But there is more than this. No one but the most impudent or the most ignorant person can say that the destitution of Lewis, whatever it is, is due to the land system or to deer forests. It is due to the fatal habit which seems ingrained in these islanders of expecting that a certain unit of property or holding will bear an indefinite increase of occupants. The one Divine command which a certain portion of the Highlanders and Islanders of Scotland take as positive is the command to increase and multiply, and, except by removing their neighbour's landmark, they make no provision for feeding the increase. Even their fishing is left to a great extent for others to profit by, as any one can tell who has seen the long lines of East Coast boats travelling down Loch Ness in May and June on the way to the Hebrides. And nothing can be more certain than that, if Lady MATHESON gave the whole cultivable part of her property—it is not a large part—as a reserve to be divided among their pauper families, the result in a very short time would be merely a frightful increase of pauperism. The cruellest thing, therefore, that can be done, even from the purely humanitarian point of view, is to encourage the Crofters; what the kindest thing is any one can learn from the very well-known history of the methods by which the late Mr. SMITH turned Scilly from a nest of paupers into one of the most flourishing parts of the kingdom. The MATHESON family, unluckily for its island and itself, did not adopt this policy at a time when public opinion was in a healthier and less flaccid condition than it is at present, and it is not alleged that any drastic measures are intended even now. It is simply sought to check as far as possible the further growth of the evil, and any hesitation or blundering in applying the legal assistance necessary for that purpose is not only a mistake, but a grievous crime.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

THE Government is perhaps justified in complying with the supposed demand for constructive legislation. If it is desirable to create new institutions, a scheme of Local Government may perhaps be entitled to precedence. Lord SALISBURY has already announced the intention of the Cabinet to restrict the scope of the forthcoming measure to England and Scotland, and it has since been said that the Scotch Bill will be postponed. The result of including Ireland in the Franchise Act of 1885 has not been encouraging, nor is it desirable to incorporate the branches of the National League. In Great Britain it is not impossible that the administration of local business may be improved by the introduction of the representative element. The best argument for the change is the success of the Municipal Corporation Act in providing for the government of towns. The machinery may probably need various modifications when it is applied to rural districts, if only because the members of the governing bodies will be dispersed over a wide area. Town councillors can attend to municipal affairs without neglecting their counting-houses or their shops. The representatives of counties or of hundreds cannot be expected to spend half their time in attendance on council or committee meetings at a town which may be fifty miles from their homes. Experience will show whether the constituencies give a preference to candidates, if they can be found, who enjoy comparative leisure. The Boards of Guardians, which will probably be incorporated in the County Councils, have, on the whole, discharged their duties fairly. Any antagonism which may have arisen between the ex officio members and the elected Guardians may probably serve as a warning to the framers of the Local Government Bill. In some parts of the kingdom mixed Boards have been established, under local Acts, for special purposes. It will be worth the while of the Government to inquire into the practical working of such experiments. Instruction may also be derived from the operation of the Local Boards, which have for many years exercised some of the functions of municipal Corporations in populous districts. The duties which are imposed on the urban and rural sanitary authorities by the Public Health Acts will be discharged or superintended by the County Boards or Councils.

The Boundaries Commission, which has been appointed under an Act of last Session, has already furnished an example of the friction which arises from legislative innovations. The Sub-Commissioners have, in pursuance of their instructions, formed numerous schemes for making the bounds of various independent jurisdictions coincide. As a general rule, they propose a change wherever Poor-law Unions extend into two or more counties; and, as the supposed irregularity is found in almost every part of the country, their proposals have already excited much local dissatisfaction. The frequent overlapping of districts created for different purposes is not always a practical inconvenience, though it may look like an anomaly on the map. It matters little or nothing to Poor-law Guardians whether their place of meeting, which is generally the workhouse, is within or without any neighbouring county boundary; nor is it at all necessary that parishes associated for Poor-law administration should be situated within the same county. The roads and the railways which make communication easy and inexpensive frequently follow the river valleys which have from time immemorial been boundaries of counties. The Unions were marked out for the purposes of the new Poor Law with a general regard to facility of communication; but there is probably room for improvement in this respect. A general shifting of limits for the sake of administrative symmetry will, whatever may be the recommendations of a change, cause much irritation and annoyance. It is not yet known whether the Commissioners will be willing or able to modify their plans in accordance with local wishes. They will certainly encounter objections in all cases in which they propose to detach considerable parts of counties from their ancient connexion.

Some inference as to the nature of the Government scheme may be deduced from the proposals of the Commission. The probable reason for making the boundaries of counties and of Unions identical is that a municipal hierarchy or gradation of powers is thought expedient. If the County Board is to be a Court of Appeal from the decisions of minor local bodies, it will of course be necessary to include the smaller area within the larger. The special attention which has been paid by the Commissioners to the territorial relation between Counties and Unions seems to imply an intention of transferring some of the powers of the present Boards of Guardians to the new authority. There may be plausible and perhaps valid reasons for such a measure, but it is not recommended by precedent. Municipal Corporations, though they possess great powers, have not superseded the Guardians in the administration of the Poor Law. There is no reason to suppose that any extension of the functions of existing municipalities will be included in the Bill, especially as there is no popular demand for an alteration of the present system. Large towns almost always wish, like Birmingham, to extend their limits, and the suburban areas as uniformly object to the increase of rates which follows the extension of municipal boundaries. The Local Government Bill will be sufficiently complicated without any disturbance of existing Corporations. It would probably be unwise to attach importance to rhetorical flourishes in which advocates of municipal organization may have indulged. Enthusiasts for local autonomy have sometimes persuaded themselves that County Governments are to become schools for statesmen who will have passed their apprenticeship in minor and subordinate assemblies. Less sanguine projectors will be content if the rural Corporations are moderately efficient, and especially if they are averse to jobs. It might possibly have been well to omit or postpone the transfer of the functions of Boards of Guardians to County Councils.

The Cabinet has perhaps by this time arrived at a decision on the question which, of all the issues raised by a Local Government Bill, possesses the highest political importance. In this matter, as in others, modern legislation has two objects which are not always compatible. It is desirable to contrive institutions which will be efficient for their purpose, and it is thought necessary to cultivate popular approval. The majority of those who are anxious to promote a Local Government Bill are perhaps not altogether friendly to a Conservative Government. Some of them care more for the effect of the measure on the popularity of the Government than for the efficient administration of local affairs. Upright statesmen, while they may despise secondary considerations of party feeling and expediency are nevertheless compelled to humour the prejudices of democratic factions. It was probably with reference to the Local Government Bill that Lord SALISBURY spoke at Liverpool of the conditions under which government is carried on when the Ministers of the day have not a majority in the House of Commons. He assured his own followers that he was loyal to their interests and opinions, but he indicated in sufficiently intelligible language his dependence on an alliance which, as he said, is not a coalition. The Liberal-Unionists are pardonably anxious to prove to the world at large, and especially to their former associates, that their Liberalism is as genuine and as warm as when they followed Mr. GLADSTONE. They may, perhaps, have anticipated the taunts of Sir CHARLES DILKE to the effect that Conservatives could not by possibility produce an adequate scheme of Local Government. On this special question the Liberal section of the majority will probably receive the powerful support of Mr. GOSCHEN. He also may probably be anxious to prove that his former zeal for municipal institutions has not been modified by his acceptance of office under Lord SALISBURY. The Cabinet will not be liable to blame if it concedes something to the demands of its indispensable allies. Lord SALISBURY would probably not have used language which might be interpreted as an apology for deference to the Liberal party if he had not been assured of the concurrence of his Conservative colleagues.

The main issue to be determined is the mode of election of the Boards or Councils which are to administer Local Government. A bold confidence in the good sense and honesty of the ratepaying inhabitants will be the simplest mode of meeting the difficulty, and perhaps it may also be the safest. The Municipal Corporation Act established household suffrage in towns for purposes of local government at a time when the Parliamentary franchise was confided to 10*l.* occupiers. It is impossible to deny that the result has confirmed the soundness of the measure which has now been in force for fifty years. The Corporations have been singularly free from corruption, and their governing bodies have not countenanced violence or disorder. A great advantage of a popular franchise is that the elected bodies are powerful in proportion to their representative quality. The Town Councils which are elected by household suffrage have spent for the public benefit vast sums which Courts of Quarter Sessions would never have ventured to raise. If there are to be municipalities, they ought to command popular confidence. Any scheme which introduces an admixture of official members or of nominees will become the object of hostile agitation, and it will in the end be made to conform to the established type. The Bills which were proposed and faintly supported by Lord BEACONSFIELD'S Cabinet could in no case have been final. The present Ministers have the opportunity of showing themselves not only free from prejudice, but prudent and long-sighted. If Lord HARTINGTON and his friends induce them to consent to a really Liberal measure, they will have done their allies a great practical service.

POETRY FOR MUSIC-HALLS.

HALLS of sweet music are the sonorous homes of popular culture. Unluckily, when the poet asks "Can no one tell me what she sings?" or what he sings, in the palaces of minstrelsy, the reply is rarely what the poet could wish. They certainly do not sing poetry, but rather vulgar ditties than otherwise, with refrains about "I'm a "jolly little chap all round," or "He's too jolly clever by "half." This, as a translator makes ÆSCHYLUS remark, is "to be numbered among things which are not as they "should be." The songs of a people should be written by a people's poets, not by raucous and slangy ballad-mongers. In ELIZABETH'S time, as we learn from Mr. ARCHER'S and Mr. BULLEN'S collections out of old music-books, the songs were poetry. Why should not new songs be poetry, too? They are asking this question in Paris, where an enterprising impresario of a café chantant means to have real poets for his minstrels. He begins with M. JEAN RICHEPIN, not a particularly proper poet, though a most energetic bard. M. JEAN RICHEPIN is all very well, he sticks at nothing; and M. FRANÇOIS COPPÉE may turn out a pretty and taking little piece of sentiment. M. THÉODORE DE BANVILLE may revive the fun of the old days when PAUL LIMAYRAC was a flower tra la, and all the Odes went rope-dancing. But M. SULLY PRUDHOMME, M. LECONTE DE LISLE, and the rest will, we fear, not succeed well at the music-halls.

As to England, we really cannot blame the music-halls for not employing poets, because our poets do not write songs. A good many things of Lord TENNYSON'S have been set—"Swallow, swallow," and "Sweet and low," and the other charming songs in the Princess. But who, except the members of the Browning Society, ever sang Mr. BROWNING? The sentiments of modern poetry are sometimes altogether too remote and personal and mystic for songs. If a poet never writes anything but sonnets (and myriads of these), who can sing him? The following examples prove, we think, that even our greatest poets cannot quite accommodate their "Æolian" lyres to a happy popularis aura.

Seniores priores, it is needless to sign this little piece, in which the sadness of eld whispers in the melodious reeds of youth:—

THE JOLLY LITTLE THING.

It is the Miller's Daughter—
  At least of old it used to be;
But Time, and Politics,
  Have sundered her and me.
And yet, methinks, I used to sing
  "She is a Jolly Little Thing!"

She was a Jolly Little Thing,
  But this, ah this, was long ago,
And sorrowful doth ivy cling
  About the lyre I used to know.
I used to know, I used to sing
  "She is a Jolly Little Thing."

The next is more thoughtful, but not so tunable and pleasant:—

THAT WAS I.

Not the Banjo Byron's cry!
  Nay 'twas I you heard last night;
Not the milk cart jingling by,
  Nay 'twas I!
Not the Waits put sleep to flight
As you thought (and well you might);
  That was me!
  Don't you see?
That was I!

Not the Cats from fence or tree,
  Not the creaking of the gate,
No, nor 'Arry, chanting free
  (That was me!)
Heedless of Householders' hate
I unloading all my freight,
  Song and glee,
  Soft and free,
That was me!

Our next example has been pronounced scarcely acceptable, on account of the obscurity of the idea and the difficulty of wedding the language to sweet music:—

MY PRETTY MAID.

O Child of sea-sand and salt surges,
  O Daughter of Flood and of Foam,
What problem upleaps and emerges
  When we meet thee afar from thy home?
Ah, clad in fair folds of strange fashion,
  Bedecked and bedizened about,
Is thy mother, thou minion of Passion,
  Aware thou art out?

The poet's sad lucidity characterizes the next song, which, we fear, will never be very much whistled by the butchers' boys. It is too wistfully contemplative and critical, in spite of the rather taking title:—

I REALLY CAN'T OBLEEGE.

Ah, I have "been on many lines,"
  I am on many still,
With Obermann among the pines,
  With Fausta on the hill.
But sing! I'd rather stand a siege—
I really, really, can't obleege!

Where the domed Velan with his snows
  Is dear to Baedeker,
And where the stripling Isis flows
  Beside the haymaker,
All Nature is the poet's liege—
But no, I really can't obleege!

On the whole, it does not seem that, as far as music-halls go, the accustomed minstrels are likely to be superseded by the acknowledged poets.

"EARLESS BUT UNABASHED."

WHEN Lord SALISBURY pilloried the lie about Conservative coquettings with Home Rule at Liverpool, he doubtless did not expect that it would be any more abashed than DEFOE in the famous and remarkably unjust couplet. But it is characteristic at once of the Gladstonian party at large and of the kind of champion to which it is reduced, that even the pillory and the scourge (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE seems to smart enough from that, though persons less galled than he might find it hard to discover the "Billingsgate" with which he charges the PRIME MINISTER) have not induced the dropping of this disgraceful weapon. Mr. GLADSTONE himself has, to do him justice, never, that we can remember, availed himself of it in any distinct or conspicuous fashion; nor has Mr. JOHN MORLEY nor Lord SPENCER nor Lord GRANVILLE. Indeed, Mr. GLADSTONE, who is rather fond of relating how he himself sounded Lord SALISBURY on the subject, has disabled himself, and ought to have disabled his party, from attempting any such charge, as the constantly repeated and, from their first utterance by Mr. Herbert Gladstone and Sir Barrington Simeon, promptly refuted and denied charges of Tory and Irish alliance. But the meaner sort of Gladstonians, having nothing else to say, repeat this charge constantly, and now Mr. Shaw Lefevre has made himself the mouthpiece of a new repetition of it. This may, at least, claim the merit of considerable audacity. A man does not usually go about boasting of his solvency and punctuality the morning after he has been posted as a defaulter, and it must have required some little courage in Mr. Shaw Lefevre to repeat the slander but three or four days after it had been authoritatively exposed. As, however, he has done this, it may be worth while to deal with his dealing—the only noteworthy part of an otherwise unimportant speech by an otherwise not very important person. If Mr. Shaw Lefevre fulfils his heroic threat of going back to Ireland and holding meetings to protest against Irish landlords who take the only possible course open to them against the tenants whom he and his friends have encouraged to dishonesty, it may be that he will meet the fate of Mr. Blunt, and we heartily hope he may.

The case for the slander as presented by Mr. Shaw Lefevre admits of tolerably thorough treatment. It is quite true that, as has been pointed out, Mr. Lefevre's omissions (putting what is to come out of question) are of themselves almost sufficient to damn him. A person who, in giving an account of the matter, takes no account of Lord Carnarvon's full personal explanation in the House of Lords, and of his express exoneration of his colleagues from all blame, discredits his own side so completely that, from the strictly controversial point of view, he can claim to be heard no further. If he is ignorant of the fact, his competence of knowledge to deal with the subject vanishes; if he knows it, but thinks it unimportant, his competence of judgment disappears; while it is unnecessary to say what must be thought of him if he knows it, thinks it important, but suppresses it. We shall not, however, take this rigid dialectic way with Mr. Shaw Lefevre. His suppression of Lord Carnarvon's evidence shall be allowed to taint his advocacy, but not to shut it out altogether. When we come to examine further, we find that it is entirely based on the statements of one person, and that these statements purport to be fetchings and carryings of portions of conversations which that person had with other persons, some of these conversations being allowed to have been confidential; while all, we suppose, were, in the ordinary sense, private. We should think that all Mr. Justin McCarthy's political opponents and some of his political friends would fight shy in future of an acquaintance who seems to regard conversation as a convenient source of matter for quotation on political platforms. Lord Randolph Churchill, in talking to Mr. McCarthy, seems to have been even more unfortunate than Mr. Balfour in his observations, whatever they really were, to Mr. Blunt. But the taste of Mr. Justin McCarthy's revelations is altogether a minor matter; the point of importance is their accuracy. We have no desire to impugn Mr. McCarthy's honour; he is believed to have at heart the, we fear, hopeless desire of serving two masters—of being a Parnellite and a respectable man. But it is as well to remind readers—especially as Mr. Shaw Lefevre in this very speech indulged in much sanctified talk about language containing truth enough [illegible] satisfy one's own conscience, but conveying a wrong impression to the hearers—that Mr. McCarthy is the author of the celebrated apology for the Manchester murder to the effect that "Sergeant Brett was in the way "of the bullet." And, besides, it is again unnecessary to assume deliberate misrepresentation on Mr. McCarthy's part. That the two parties to a conversation, especially if one of them happens to be deeply prejudiced in a certain sense, often retain the most widely differing, indeed the most hopelessly incompatible, notions of its exact tenor is a mere truism. And, as it happens, we have the version of the other party, Lord Carnarvon, which is absolutely incompatible with the version of Mr. McCarthy and still more with the charges which Mr. Lefevre founds on that version. We have said that we know nothing against Mr. McCarthy's honour. But we, and all persons who know anything of politics, know a good deal more about Lord Carnarvon's honour than that there is nothing against it in the charge-sheet or the gaoler's books. Lord Carnarvon is known, is acknowledged in this very political romance of The Wicked Marquess, a novel, by Justin McCarthy, M.P., to be a perfect Quixote and Bayard on this point of honour. Some of his political friends have at times been profane enough to wish that he were a little less punctilious and a little more practical. But, however that may be, we think that we are doing neither injustice nor discourtesy to Mr. McCarthy in saying that most people, whatever their political opinions, would rather take Lord Carnarvon's word against Mr. McCarthy than Mr. McCarthy's word against Lord Carnarvon.

Nor does even this finish the matter; for argument here, as in other Union v. Home Rule battles, is simply a process of driving the enemy helter-skelter out of position after position. Let us disregard Lord Carnarvon and Lord Salisbury as much as Mr. Shaw Lefevre disregards them, and see what is the value of what Mr. McCarthy does say as reported by Mr. Lefevre. He says that Lord Randolph Churchill talked loosely to him, and he is quite welcome to say anything that he likes on that score—it does not touch any one but Lord Randolph himself. He says (or does not say; see infra) that "the Tory Whip" (unnamed) and Sir H. Drummond Wolff came to him from Lord Salisbury to confabulate on Home Rule. Now, unluckily, the same evil fortune waits on Mr. McCarthy here. Sir H. Drummond Wolff, the only named person, contradicts his statement flatly and in toto. Mr. Akers Douglas contradicts it flatly and in toto. This misfortune of Mr. McCarthy's is getting a little monotonous. Perhaps conscious of this, he comes forward himself and says that the famous conversation was not about Home Rule at all; that the messengers were separate, not together; and, in short, that Mr. Shaw Lefevre's account of what he said, as Mr. Shaw Lefevre has since admitted, is utterly wrong. We might almost leave the two to settle it between them. But pass this hopeless imbroglio of reckless, self exposed calumny for the moment. Suppose we make the enormous argumentative grant it is needless to say for ar[illegible]ent's sake only—that somebody said something to Mr. McCarthy; what then? The somebody or somebodies said they came from Lord Salisbury, and talked to him on the subject of Home Rule, or of coercion, or of what not, first with uns[illegible] conditions, then with conditions which were m[illegible]y, but which, mark you, even this veracious [illegible] does not pronounce satisfactory, as he woul[illegible] a [illegible]reat hurry to do if he could. At the very [illegible]n, this assertion, made by the person who has, it [illegible] be doubted, misrepresented his interviews with Lord Carnarvon, who persists in grossly misrepresenting the so-called arrangement between the Tories and the Parnellites before Mr. Gladstone's overthrow, and who is again contradicted by his alleged interlocutors here, comes to no more than that Lord Salisbury is said to have sent parlementaires, not to arrange a surrender, but to ascertain what the Home Rule party did exactly want—a thing which, as Mr. Gladstone himself has told us, nobody ever knew. We do not think that such a mission to such persons would have been wise; we think it extremely unwise, and worse than the equally unwise dropping of the Coercion Act. But any soldier will laugh Mr. McCarthy to scorn if he asks him whether a general who employs his intelligence department to find out the enemy's exact demands is thereby guilty of surrender, or arrangement, or treason. And when it is further remembered that even so much as this only rests on testimony of the weakest and most tainted character, that it is mixed with things certainly false, that it is not confirmed by a single known fact, that it has opposed to it clear and categorical denials from Lord Salisbury, Lord Carnarvon, Lord St. Oswald, Lord Randolph Churchill, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Akers Douglas, Mr. Parnell himself, and every one against whom specific charges have ever been specifically made, we may pretty safely put Mr. Shaw Lefevre and Mr. Justin McCarthy, and all those who believe, or make believe, with them, into one or other of two capacious historical limbos. They may take their choice. In the one they will be in the company of Titus Oates and Anacreon-of-the-Guillotine Barère. In the other they will have more numerous, less famous, but a little less unsavoury company—that of those who believed in the "Plaaat," and in the dying shouts of those heroes who did not die at all, but were comfortably picked up by English boats.

FRANCE.

It would appear that a French Ministry habitually consoles itself for the weakness of its position at home by being exacting towards foreigners. There is nothing blameworthy in an even touchy regard for the national dignity; and we could wish that more of the same spirit was occasionally shown by one at least of France's neighbours. Still, without altogether condemning the attitude of M. FLOURENS towards Italy (we do not speak of the wisdom of the particular thing he is doing, but only of his general determination to have his way), it must be noted to present a remarkable contrast to the attitude of M. TIRARD and other French Premiers towards Radical disturbers at home, and especially the Municipal Council of Paris. This body has long been as much of a laughing-stock as is consistent with its undoubted power for mischief. It consists largely of ex-members of the Commune. It is on the most friendly terms with the most disorderly part of the population of Paris. It is rabidly anti-Clerical. As a natural consequence, it is in a state of permanent opposition to the national Government. So hard is it at work trying to make the capital of France not only an independent Republic, but the dominant power in the country, that it has habitually neglected its municipal duties, which are notoriously performed in the most extravagant and slovenly way. On one point it has been permanently contumacious. It obstinately refuses to allow the Prefect of the Seine, who represents the national Government and is appointed by it, to take up his quarters at the Hôtel de Ville. There is not the slightest doubt that he is legally entitled to be lodged there; but the Municipal Council will not vote the money to furnish his rooms, and avows its intention of keeping them empty until it is allowed to elect a Mayor of Paris who will be the recognized Radical leader. During the election of M. CARNOT the Council notoriously encouraged disorder in Paris. The members voted themselves in perm[illegible] [illegible]ession with the utmost solemnity. They sent de[illegible] to Versailles, who were to see that the Republic [illegible] by the election of M. FERRY. The Co[illegible] made an uns[illegible]essful attempt to get possession of the [illegible] of the [illegible]ground passage leading from the b[illegible] [illegible] Guard to the Hôtel de Ville. [illegible] get the keys, they mined, or pro[illegible] [illegible]assage. Zealous members harangued the Belleville [illegible] from windows, and the [illegible] general made believe to play the usual revo[illegible]. If order was kept in Paris, it was not only [illegible] help, but in spite of, the Municipal Council.

[illegible]embers had actually opened fire on the troops a[illegible] [illegible]rom the windows, they could hardly have gone [illegible]her in disorderly opposition to the Government. And yet they have not been called to account. The Ministry is afraid to touch the Council, and declines even to enforce its own [illegible] legal rights. On Monday M. LAMARZELLE, [illegible] of the Right, very unkindly asked M. TIRAR[illegible] what he meant to do with the Council, a[illegible] answer an assurance that the Ministry [illegible] nothing without further help from the Cham[illegible] not even compel the recalcitrant Councilmen [illegible] M. POUBELLE, the Prefect, to move into his lodgings. The lodgings of M. POUBELLE have long been a matter of dispute. There is not a shadow of a doubt that the Government has a legal right to install him by force, if necessary in the Hôtel de Ville. That question has long been decided by the Courts. But M. HOVELACQUE and his fellow-Councilmen will have no Prefect at the Hôtel de Ville, and successive Ministers have been afraid to apply force. The most courageous of them was M. GOBLET, who introduced a Municipal Councils Bill, in which there is a clause giving the Government power to do what it has already the right to do. On Monday M. TIRARD declared that the Ministry was about to introduce a special little Bill of its own for the purpose, and, until this Bill was duly passed, could not think of proceeding against the Council. Why any Bill was needed, and what is to be done if M. HOVELACQUE and the others remain contumacious, M. TIRARD did not say. As the Council has already defied the law with impunity, there would seem to be no reason why it should not go on doing so. This surrender to the Municipal Councillors was made funny as well as discreditable by M. TIRARD's loud assertions that he was not in the least afraid, but would assuredly assert the dignity of the law at some indefinite future period. The Municipal Council can afford to listen to these threats with some equanimity; for it can see that M. TIRARD is at least heartily afraid of the Radicals, who have good reasons for supporting the leaders of the revolutionary party in Paris. A Ministry which could act with the Right could make short work of the rabid Vestry at the Hôtel de Ville. The voters themselves could supply the town with a decent Council if they would only vote. But these are two conditions which it does not seem possible to supply in France. M. TIRARD showed on Monday that he is much more afraid of being accused of an alliance with the Right than of allowing mischief to go on. The Conservative or Moderate Republican voters of Paris will rather have an extravagant and fanatical Town Council than exert themselves. As a compensation, they will help indirectly to upset a Government which cannot govern strongly without their help. Between the pedantry of Moderate Republican Deputies and the laziness of "respectable voters," the Radicals, who are, after all, a small minority in the country and the Chamber, will continue to paralyse all government as before.

Italy must look considerably less formidable to M. TIRARD's Ministry than the Municipal Council of Paris, and is certainly being treated in a much more resolute fashion. The famous Florentine incident is so far from being settled that it is growing into a decidedly serious international quarrel, in which France at least shows no sign of wishing to be conciliatory. As the discussion goes on, it becomes clearer that what is in the mind of both parties is the old sore subject, the occupation of Tunis. The respective merits of the Italian Pretor and the French Consul are subordinate matters, and it is fortunate they are; for in the present condition of the evidence it is the reverse of easy to come to any decision about them. In the case of less exalted parties to a quarrel, it might be said that there must be a great deal of hard swearing on one or both sides. The Italian semi-official papers accuse the French Consul of want of courtesy and acts of a downright illegal character. The Diritto says that he did not acknowledge the receipt of letters from the Pretor, and that he generally expressed contempt for the Italian Courts. The French papers assert that undoubtedly such acts as these were committed, but that it was by the Italian Pretor. These statements would appear to be irreconcilable. Probably it would not be found necessary to reconcile them if something more serious than the accuracy of two officials were not in dispute. The property and debts of General HOUSSEIN PASHA have, in fact, been the occasion of an angry dispute between the Italian and French Governments as to the position which the latter occupies in Tunis. The Italians maintain that their conventions with the BEY remain in force, in spite of the French occupation, and that they were even confirmed by the Convention of 1884, which abolished the consular jurisdictions in Tunis. According to these treaties with the BEY, the property of Tunisian subjects who die in Italy is to be disposed of under the Italian law. The French Consul is accused of having taken possession of HOUSSEIN PASHA's estate, and of having sold part of it, although a suit brought by a Tunisian creditor of the General's was then pending in the Italian Courts. It would seem that this was a most irregular proceeding on the part of the Consul, and would have been so if General HOUSSEIN PASHA had been a born Frenchman. A Consul, except in Oriental countries, where he has recognized treaty rights, is not entitled to interfere with the working of the Courts of the country in which he is stationed. If the Italian version of the story is well founded, the Consul was guilty of misconduct; and, even according to the French account, he seems to have claimed powers which he would certainly not be allowed to exercise here. On any version of the story, the French Government has been offensively peremptory in demanding satisfaction. If the Pretor did go too far, he committed an error of judgment for which he might have been rebuked in some way provided by the Italian law. To insist that he should be dismissed for refusing to allow that a French Consul can exercise jurisdiction in Italy is most aggressive. This, however, is the course which the French Government has decided to take, and its determination can only be accounted for on the supposition that it suspects the Italians of wishing in some way or another to interfere with its own hold on Tunis, or at least to treat the occupation of the country as temporary, and is resolved to give them a warning snub. As M. FLOURENS has taken this offensive line, it is not wonderful that Signor CRISPI is inclined to retract his first concession, and reply to the demand for the dismissal of the Pretor by insisting on the recall of the Consul. The quarrel has already grown from a very small one to a very angry one; and both parties having decidedly lost their tempers, and as there is much at the back of the ostensible cause of dispute, it will not be surprising if the quarrel grows into a very big one indeed.

THE LIBERAL-UNIONISTS.

ALTHOUGH there is obvious inconvenience in the division of the Parliamentary majority into two independent sections, the balance of advantage is perhaps on the side of a continuance of the existing organizations. The Liberal-Unionist meeting which was lately held under the presidency of Lord NORTHBROOK showed no decline of political energy. The speeches of the Chairman, of Mr. FINLAY, of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, and of Mr. MACLEAN were both spirited and argumentative. Mr. FINLAY supplied the true answer to those who rely on Mr. GLADSTONE'S imaginary concessions, by proving that, even if he wished to be conciliatory, he is between the horns of an insoluble dilemma. The Irish members of a subordinate Parliament must either be admitted to seats in the Imperial Legislature or they must be excluded. Either alternative would involve an intolerable anomaly. The Home Rule Bill of two years ago, introduced with the consent of the Nationalist party, provided for the total exclusion of Irish representatives. It is not surprising that Mr. PARNELL and his associates cordially approved of an apparently self-denying ordinance. The absolute subjection of Ireland to an alien Parliament would be used as a conclusive argument for total and immediate separation. No constitutional Government in the world imposes on one of the constituent parts of its dominions a similar or analogous disability. Even the despotisms of former times provided for equality of rights among separate provinces. The consequence was that dependencies were often satisfied with the impartial authority of the Crown. The absolute monarchy which survived until recent times in Denmark never disturbed the loyalty of Schleswig or of Holstein to the common sovereign. Hungary was for the same reason content to be governed almost as despotically as Austria. As soon as Parliamentary institutions superseded the royal authority in the greater part of Europe, communities which had always stood on the same level with one another refused to acknowledge the supremacy of their former equals. The Danish Duchies invoked the aid of Germany against the Parliament of Copenhagen, and Hungary, after many trials, compelled its sovereign to re-establish its ancient constitutional rights. Even Unionists would hesitate to make Ireland an exception to the rights which are conceded to almost all civilized States. The precedent of Poland would only serve as an illustration of external injustice.

The reasons for allowing Irish members to retain their seats at Westminster seemed therefore conclusive until the arguments against the arrangement were considered. It is not certain that Mr. GLADSTONE'S original decision was erroneous, if it was assumed that Home Rule must be granted to Ireland. A proposal which he made during the debates on the Bill that Irish members should be allowed to sit and vote on certain specific occasions was wholly impracticable. If no restriction were imposed on their control of Imperial policy, they would enjoy far more than their legitimate share of Parliamentary power. Their votes on Imperial and British measures would be habitually given for the purpose of promoting objects of their own. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, and perhaps a few other followers of Mr. GLADSTONE, have persuaded themselves to believe that the policy of exclusion is abandoned; but in the authorized apology for Home Rule which was not long since edited by Mr. BRYCE, Lord THRING, who is believed to have drawn the Irish Bills under Mr. GLADSTONE'S instructions, published an elaborate defence of his original scheme. It is improbable that the leader of the party, himself a contributor to the compilation, should have disapproved of the opinions of his confidential adviser. It appears, on the whole, that, of two methods of dealing with Home Rule, both are fundamentally objectionable. The natural inference is that an object only to be attained under inadmissible conditions is in itself inconsistent with sound principles. Mr. FINLAY dealt not less forcibly with the question of separate legislation for Ulster. Mr. PARNELL'S objection to a scheme at which Mr. GLADSTONE has sometimes mysteriously hinted might perhaps be overcome; but the Protestant and loyal part of Ulster is not strong enough to stand by itself; and a little Northern Parliament could not offer security to the trading and industrial classes which in all other parts of Ireland are attached to the British connexion.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK as a consistent advocate of the representation of minorities naturally took the opportunity of exposing the unsoundness of the argument which is founded on the approximate unanimity of Mr. PARNELL'S nominees. On the assumption that one-third of the whole population is loyal, the Unionist members ought to be a third of the whole, instead of a sixth, as at present. The inference to be drawn from the calculation is, that no overwhelming moral weight belongs to the results of the existing representative system. It is true that Mr. GLADSTONE'S affected deference to the opinion of the eighty-six Nationalist members is obviously insincere and histrionic. He well knew that the Home Rulers would command an overwhelming majority when he appealed to the constituencies of Great Britain to render him independent of the Irish vote. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, of course, knows that he has no early prospect of succeeding in his plea for protecting minorities. There are formidable objections to any measure of the kind, and its success depends on the voluntary abdication of the majority. It is possible that at some future time popular constituencies will be so generous as to abolish the supremacy of the greatest number. At present it is impossible that the dominant multitude should be restricted to the exercise of its undisputed powers. The pretence that the public opinion of Ireland is expressed by the TANNERS and the BIGGARS is transparently hypocritical. There is no reason to doubt that a Home Rule Parliament would be composed of the same or similar materials. One of its objects, if Mr. DILLON may be believed, would be to punish all Irishmen who have done their duty under the present Constitution. The police have been often warned that when Home Rule is obtained they will be responsible to their new masters.

The reasons for maintaining the Union are necessarily the same whether they are advanced by Conservatives or by Liberal-Unionists. It is difficult for either party to say anything new after two years' duration of an uninterrupted controversy. The speeches at the Paddington meeting were unusually effective; but Mr. FINLAY himself had been anticipated, though not by any abler opponent of revolution. Liberal-Unionist meetings are chiefly interesting as they dispel doubts as to the activity and perseverance of the members of the party. It is not a little satisfactory to observe that some of the conventional formulas of the earlier stages of the movement have been practically abandoned. Neither Lord NORTHBROOK nor any other Liberal-Unionist thought it necessary to dilate on the virtues and merits of Mr. GLADSTONE, or on his own anxiety to rejoin him. Mr. BRIGHT has contributed more than his share to the conviction, which is now shared by other members of the party, that the author of a mischievous measure, introduced in the interest of his own ambition, is not altogether blameless. Lord HARTINGTON, who has not in any of his speeches deviated from the use of the most temperate language, has lately more than once disclaimed any continuing expectation of reunion with his former leader. The speakers at Paddington thought it unnecessary to profess even regret for the severance which has now become inveterate. Lord NORTHBROOK in his remarks on the Winchester election expressed or implied entire satisfaction with a victory which had been mainly achieved by the Conservatives. He doubted whether the whole strength of the Liberal-Unionist vote had been polled for the successful candidate, and yet he cordially welcomed the result of the contest. The tone of the discussion indicated the consciousness of the speakers that the defence of the Union was more than paramount in importance to all other political questions. As Sir JOHN LUBBOCK declared in his eloquent peroration, he and his friends are not disposed to sacrifice a Constitution which has been gradually built up during a thousand years.

Lord SALISBURY, in his speech at Liverpool, founded on the present division of parties some weighty advice to Conservative politicians. He reminded them that, although they formed the largest section of the House of Commons, they are in a minority as compared with the three other parties or groups. Speaking exclusively in the interest of his own regular followers, Lord SALISBURY warned them against impatience or distrust which might be provoked by the possible policy of the Government. While he paid Lord HARTINGTON a high and well-deserved compliment for disinterested loyalty, he acknowledged the necessity of deferring in some degree to the opinions or prejudices of a body of indispensable supporters. An alliance, as he said, falls far short of a coalition. If a rupture between the two bodies of Unionists could only be averted by acquiescence in some doubtful measure of secondary importance, the sacrifice might have to be made, and its motives ought to be understood. It is not known whether Lord SALISBURY had any special measure in view when he proclaimed the expediency of a perhaps unpalatable compromise. The Liberal-Unionists have not been unreasonable or extortionate, but in the last Session they compelled the Government on more than one occasion to weaken its measures in preference to losing their support. It may be hoped that under the guidance of Lord HARTINGTON the Liberal-Unionists will abstain from taking undue advantage of their exceptional position. They cannot but know that a defeat on an important issue, even if it had no connexion with the Union, might compel the resignation of the Government. The Liberal-Unionists would not be strong enough to provide a substitute. Lord SALISBURY stated that, in his judgment, a dissolution would be injurious to the public interest until order has been restored in Ireland. A resignation of the Ministry would be scarcely more desirable.

INDO-ANGLIAN LITERATURE.

NONE of us know, or ever can know, how poor a figure we cut when we write in the dead, or even, perhaps, in modern foreign languages. Boys of fourteen in Athens or Rome might possibly have exploded over the blunders of our best iambics and Latin prose, just as we certainly cannot restrain the smile at a volume of privately printed examples of Hindoo English which is before us. Perhaps, however, these are really more quaint than our elegiacs would appear to contemporaries of OVID. Not only is the Hindoo style strange, with its queer mixture of false classicism and false familiarity, but the Hindoo temper is stranger still. "Self-abasement and vanity" certainly mark in odd companionship many of these essays in English prose and verse. It is needless to add that plenty of Hindoo gentlemen write and speak as good English as any of us. As for Hindoo ladies, very few Englishwomen of our time have written as well in their native tongue as Miss TORU DUTT did in a variety of languages.

The petitions for employment in this book are a little pathetic as well as funny. Official work is the ideal of the Indo-Anglian, as well as of very many people at home. The "poor petition of A. H.," for example, setteth forth that his poverty "does not permit him to perform those solemn "duties which the great Creator of the Universe has imposed upon us"—namely, we presume, to get married. He therefore asks to be made a Moherer, that he may "perform his duties as a respectable being, and vindicate his "importance in the Creator." Another petitioner hopes that "in the All pervading soul once smile on Her" (the QUEEN'S) "behalf, the intense ice of the impending danger "will soon thaw away in a moment, like the morning "vapour of the summer; and I therefore beg of your "honour not to take these things in snuff, though set "down so freely." R. K. finds that "a person in my "department can scarcely live with his conscience upright, "unless he draws a handsome pay." Another frankly remarks that his son has "been unfortunately thrice plucked. "He is therefore eager to enter Government service." Once more:—"Now we understand that there are several posts "falling vacant under your disposal. . . . Then would it "be convenient for you to provide us with them?" There is a taking frankness and a gentlemanly indifference to qualification for the posts desired in these effusions. But we very much doubt if the Indian office-seeker is at all more impudent and pertinacious, though he is more diverting, than his kindred in England, France, or the United States. Here is a splendid "Office Note":—"Office cat, by reason "of death of rats, daily growing lean. Will superintendent "please increase the contingent allowance for her restora-"tion to stoutness?" Sometimes petitions, in very bad English, end with "cram" pieces, like the following, which has nothing to do with the matter in hand:—

The chief art of learning, as Locke has observed, is to attempt but little at a time. The furthest excursions of the mind are made by short flights, frequently repeated, the most lofty fabrics of science are founded by the continued accumulation of single propositions.

One gentleman cannot support his "four widows, three "little brothers, and an old grandmother." This is yet more superb:—

I hope your honor will condescend to hear the tale of this poor creature. I shall overflow with gratitute at this mark of your royal condocension. The bird like happiness has flown away from my nest like heart and has not hitherto returned from the period whence the rose of my father's life suffered the autumnal breath of death, in plain English he passed through the gates of Grave and from that hour the phantom of delight has never danced before me. I stand a unit in life's theatre, without a friend without a relative I am like a withered leaf to be carried hither and thither by every wind that blows.

But, if this poor fellow tells the truth, he had gone without dinner or supper for several days, although his accomplishments included English, Hindi, Urdu, Persian, and the Deonagri language. Of course one cannot tell how far the distress and the accomplishments are due to Oriental exaggeration. A Mahommedan gentleman writes better, but suggests that "the slightest attention of his Honour in "an indirect and underhand manner may be most effectual." In fact, "Remember Dowb" is the burden of this long letter, which is only more frank and dramatic in expression than most letters with a similar purpose. The vagueness of a petitioner who "cannot support his vast family of nearly "twenty-five" seems quite natural in a man so overgrown with olive branches. Dissimilar views on population are entertained by policemen's wives, who remark that "there "is no earthly use in their [the policemen's] coming home, "as it only adds fuel to the fire."

THE BOARD AND THE GOOD FAMILY MAN.

THE week which has passed since the Metropolitan Board of Works met to sit in solemn judgment on its Assistant Architect has produced nothing to modify the, we are afraid, derisive comment passed by the public on its proceedings. Even if the Board reconsidered its action yesterday (a point undecided at the time of writing), its case is not altered; for it is very obvious that this step was only taken under strong external pressure, and because the members had been awakened to some sense of shame by the general contemptuous opinion expressed on their first decision. It may also be said that the not inconsiderable interval which has elapsed since the case of Mr. HEBB first came before the Board has produced nothing to change the position which he and his employers then respectively occupied. At that period Mr. HEBB could only say that he was sorry for his indiscretion in asking for orders from managers of theatres, and was constrained to confess that he had no evidence to show that he had not sponged in the way alleged. The Board was then obviously of the opinion of its distinguished member Mr. WEBB, who thought that the Assistant Architect had, after all, only behaved like a kind father in begging for amusement for his little children. Now both parties stand where they did. When the Board met, having previously lunched, and proceeded to hear Mr. HEBB's defence before a public gallery, playfully heated to a temperature of 115 deg. Fahr., it heard a repetition of the preliminary plea. Mr. HEBB showed what Colonel HUGHES, M.P., thought a very nice spirit. He confessed his indiscretion, and threw himself on the mercy of the Board. He was of opinion that he had committed no crime, and begged his masters to overlook his error. The Board, soothed by lunch, and not unpleasantly tickled by the knowledge that an ill-disposed public was grilling in the gallery, touched him with the sceptre, and warned—not Mr. HEBB—but other persons, not to do it again.

We do not desire the death of the sinner, and quite agree with him that he has committed no crime. Crimes, unfortunately for some people, come before a very different court from the Metropolitan Board of Works. Mr. HEBB has only (and for this we have his own confession) been guilty of an entire want of self-respect, taste, and manners. For that it was perhaps a sufficient penance that he had to grovel in a public and abject way. As far as he is concerned, the fly may be left to stick to the wa' and rub out when the paint is dry. But the Metropolitan Board of Works is a body of great dignity and deserves more attention. These proceedings touch it too closely to allow of passing them over as if they chiefly affected a mere assistant architect. They go very much further. It appears from them that the Chairman was aware two years ago of the whole story. Then he learnt that the Board's servant had been indiscreet enough to ask for favours from the managers whom it was his duty to supervise. With this knowledge before him he did as good as nothing, and the Board is quite satisfied that enough was done. The Board cannot have been wholly ignorant that something was wrong. Mr. PRICE knew that letters "had been flourished before members of the House "of Commons." Mr. E. R. COOK, of Poplar, when himself a member, actually saw "Mr. BOLTON flourishing a bundle "of letters about and threatening to expose the Board." Not even this wild figure denouncing doom had any effect.

It was not until the letters had been of use "to the opposers "of the Board's Theatres Bill," until, in short, the whole story had been told to the HOME SECRETARY, that any notice was taken. The Board heard that Mr. HEBB had shotted his request for seats by observing to Mr. HARRIS that he had no wish to exercise his powers so as to "cause in- "convenience." This it thought no more than might be expected from a gentleman seeking amusement for his offspring. The patience of the Board was not wearied even when the character of its own members was brought into question. Mr. HEBB confessed that he had applied for favours for members of the Board. To be sure he could only recollect the name of one, who by a curious accident has long gone where he will not be subject to the temptation of asking for seats in any theatre. Others there were, but Mr. HEBB's memory did not reach to retaining their names. Was this discretion of his (the Assistant Architect of the Metropolitan Board of Works is not always indiscreet) part of that "nice spirit" which Colonel HUGHES, M.P., commended in the penitent? We have our opinion, but shall for the present keep it to ourselves. The whole story is sufficiently instructive, and not one, but two, morals may be drawn from it. The first is that the work of supervising theatres had better not be entrusted to a body which continues to employ assistant architects who have no desire to cause inconvenience to managers who are generous in giving orders. As the Metropolitan Board is, so will provincial bodies be, and so will their assistant architects. Another and wider moral is that we may see from the standard of manners and taste set up by the Board just what amount of solid reason there is for believing that elective Local Government bodies, or a Municipality for London, will be more economical and more high-minded than the "privileged" bodies at whom the reformer scolds.

MR. BLUNT AND OTHERS.

WE much regret to find that Mr. WILFRID BLUNT's behaviour in prison is not fulfilling the promise of the first hours of his captivity. He submitted to the prison regulations at the outset like a man; but he has since then involved himself, we are sorry to say, in an undignified squabble about his overcoat, and has further vented his resentment against Mr. BALFOUR by the promulgation of a story which only its sheer absurdity saves from being a very atrocious slander. The CHIEF SECRETARY's curt qualification of it as a "ridiculous lie" is about as full and ceremonious a contradiction as it deserves; more especially as the scanty foundation of truth on which the fiction was in all probability based must at once have suggested itself to the least ingenious mind. That Mr. BALFOUR should have formed, or having formed should have imparted to Mr. BLUNT of all men, a dark design of putting an end to the lives of valetudinarian agitators by subjecting them to punishments too severe for their strength, is, of course, ridiculous. But if, as is quite possible, the physical weakness of certain of these patriots was pleaded as a reason why they should be allowed to defy the law with impunity, Mr. BALFOUR may well have replied, and indeed would have been bound to reply, that, if they insisted on courting legal penalties which must necessarily bear harder upon them than upon stronger men, they would have nobody but themselves to thank for it. Medical certificates of infirm health cannot be recognized as licences for the commission of criminal acts, or society would be at the mercy of its least robust members. It is quite unnecessary, we think, to say more than this of Mr. BLUNT's cock-and-bull story, except perhaps to remark on the curious fact that its importance only seems to have dawned upon him since his imprisonment. For, although he seems to be under the impression that Mr. BALFOUR's words induced him to warn some of his Irish friends before the meeting at Mitchelstown, he will find it difficult to satisfy any one else that he was moved to take this course by his remembrance of a conversation which did not take place till a month afterwards.

Let us hope that Mr. BLUNT, having now surely done enough for fame, will submit to the remainder of his punishment in silence. He has made his little bid for notoriety, and it is unworthy to complain of having to pay the price. He can hardly have expected to be allowed to advertise himself at the expense of the public peace alone, and at no cost to himself, though the fact that he was not even treated as above the law does cause "grief and surprise" to Lord RIPON. Nor, we venture to think, will the fear of again, and still more seriously, grieving and surprising that strong-minded nobleman prevent the administrators of the law from applying the same rule in the case of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE if he should carry out his somewhat carefully guarded threat of following Mr. BLUNT's example at Woodford. Of course, if the meeting which Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE threatens to call at "some central point" of the Woodford district, in the event of the Irish law courts persisting in issuing legal process against defaulting tenants in defiance of his prohibition, be a lawful one—if it should prove to be really free from all the objections raised by Mr. HENN in the recent trials, and be rendered, through the "observance of proper conditions," unassailable "in point "of law or policy by Mr. BALFOUR and his subordinates," there will be no objection to Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's holding it. Whether it would in the slightest degree further his professed purpose of saving "the unfortunate tenants" from the fate which is impending over them—or, in other words, prevent the law from taking its course—is a question on which Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE does not, we are quite sure, deceive himself any more than he does other people. The step, however, would, he tells us, prevent him from "feeling "himself wanting in moral courage"; and, of course, if any member of the English party which has cringed to the threats of a handful of ruffians in America can find means to rid himself of this uncomfortable feeling at so cheap a rate, it would be heartless to grudge him the relief. He must not, however, go about to vindicate the moral courage which has knuckled down to lawlessness by defying the law. If he does, the Government which is confronting lawlessness and upholding law will be assuredly compelled to deal with him in precisely the same way as if he had never found salvation and Cabinet office by discovering that the policy of his party for more than eighty years was immoral and unwise. The notion of imprisoning an ex-Cabinet Minister has, of course, unspeakably scandalized the special patrons of the principle of equality before the law. It is truly edifying to observe the unanimity with which they have assumed that the Government and the judicial tribunals must hesitate, ought to hesitate, would be wrong if they did not hesitate, the one to prosecute, and the other to punish a "Right Honourable" for committing precisely the same offences which are at this moment being punished in the persons of scores of Irish peasants with whose very names our good English Radicals have never cared to acquaint themselves. It is a most instructive commentary on the sincerity of many an eloquent denunciation of "privilege." We trust that, if Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE does visit Ireland for the purpose which he threatens, he will spare these courtiers the pain of seeing him sent to gaol by observing "the proper conditions" of legality in his action. We confess, however, that we somewhat distrust his ability to discriminate in that regard, since it appears that a "careful examination" of the judgment in Mr. BLUNT's case has led him to a complete misapprehension of its import. If he will take counsel on this point from any unprejudiced person, he will find that the "judgment" did not "turn wholly" or at all on the connexion between the earlier and the later meeting at Woodford, though Mr. HENN indicated that he was guided by his view of that connexion in considering the propriety or otherwise of Mr. BLUNT's sentence.

It is really quite a relief to have done with all the gentlemen, right honourable and other, who are doing the theatrical business of the Home Rule agitation, and to get to the actual business manager himself. Mr. PARNELL has at last emerged sufficiently from his retirement to allow himself to be interviewed by the representative of an Irish newspaper, and has imparted himself to his interviewer on the political situation in a very interesting way. We are not surprised to find that he has seized at once on the important declaration of the PRIME MINISTER, to which we drew attention last week, and which we predicted would give much concern to the Opposition. This statement of Lord SALISBURY's—namely, that in the event of a hostile vote, or rather of a certain kind of hostile vote in the House of Commons, "the Government would have to consider whether "they should follow the constitutional custom of resigning "or dissolving," Mr. PARNELL finds to be "entirely without "precedent on the part of a Minister in his position." How this singular conclusion has been arrived at appears, however, from what immediately follows. The critic has simply misread or misconstrued the declaration which he was criticizing. He imagines Lord SALISBURY to have said that in consequence of "the great magnitude of the interests "involved" in the question of the Union he should refuse to treat a hostile vote on that question as one of want of confidence; and Mr. PARNELL adds the comment—so obvious that it should alone have led him to suspect his interpretation—that it is precisely when and because the interests involved in any question are "large and of great "importance, that a division having reference to such in-"terests is universally treated as a question of confidence." Lord SALISBURY never said or suggested, of course, that he would treat such a division otherwise. What he was speaking of was not hostile votes bearing directly on the question of the Union, but votes hostile to "certain "portions" of the Legislative measures which the Government purpose introducing during the present Session; and of these votes he said, in strict accordance with constitutional principle and precedent, that whenever it was within the discretion of the Government to treat, or not to treat, such a defeat as a question of confidence, they would be induced by considerations of the magnitude of the interests at stake in a dissolution, to choose the latter alternative. Founded as it is in so gross a misconception of Lord SALISBURY'S meaning, the speculative edifice which Mr. PARNELL has erected naturally falls to the ground. The grave dissension existing, "perhaps, in the Cabinet, certainly in the party," was really existent only in Mr. PARNELL'S mind. No one, however, will regret a delusion which has compelled the leader of the Home Rule party to offer such excellent counsel as he does to the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench and his other followers. It would be politic, he says, for Irish members and English Radicals to do everything they possibly can to facilitate Government business during the Session, so that no cry of Obstruction should be got up or alleged as an excuse for the entertainment of great matters of English policy. Let the Government get to work on their English Bills, he urges, and the Unionist majority will break up. We will allow you, he offers in other words, to proceed unobstructed with the business of the country if you will take the risks of proceeding with it. The Unionist party and the country will, without hesitation, cry "Done." They cannot promise Mr. PARNELL the best of the bargain, but they will strike it for their own part with all the good will in the world.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR ON DEPRESSION.

THE "faint hearts among Free-traders," to whom Sir LYON PLAYFAIR may be supposed to have largely addressed himself from the dinner-table of the City Liberal Club on Wednesday night, will hardly be persuaded to confidence by his oratory. Any dialogue between him and them must necessarily have a certain resemblance to the famous conversation between the cook and the ducks. They, the faint-hearted Free-traders, like the ducks, may object to being eaten even with the most scientific sauce by the development of commerce; but Sir LYON has substantially nothing to say to them except that they are wandering from the point. His business is to point out how the development of commerce does its work of mastication and swallowing. The lamentation of the unfortunate ducks who are to be masticated and swallowed he waives aside as matters of no consequence. It may seem to the victims of depression that it is of little advantage to them to be told calmly and as a matter of scientific truth that "in progress of time this "[the alternation of inflation and depression to wit] will "adjust itself; the weak will perish in the struggle for "existence, and the strong producers will survive." To those who have more than a suspicion that it will be their lot to perish, it is no particular consolation to be told that the process of "the struggle for existence" is all very scientific and good. To them Sir LYON PLAYFAIR would probably reply that he cannot help it, and that any attempt to interfere only makes things worse.

This attitude of his, looked at, not from the point of view of the "faint-hearted," but purely on its merits, is decidedly commendable, for it is both orthodox and logical. The thoroughgoing Free-trader is bound to believe that it is better any given class of the community should perish than that the whole should be hampered. This may not look humane or sympathetic, but it is perfectly intelligible. Sir LYON PLAYFAIR might himself be more whole in the faith, for he still retains a belief in the power of Government or of somebody at least to mitigate the working of the great machine of competition by giving the workman a "trained intelligence." A trained intelligence is an excellent thing, no doubt; but we do not quite see the force of Sir L. PLAYFAIR'S illustration of its excellence. He cites the case of the shoemaker who has been reduced by the invention of a machine to a 1-64th part of a shoemaker, and says that new improvements would not disturb him if his intelligence were trained, because he could replace his work in other branches of the business. If a new improvement were to appear which reduced every 1-64th of a shoemaker to a 1-128th, we imagine that every machine shoemaker would have to be content with half work and wages, or that one man would in future do the work and draw the wages of two. In such a case what could the trained intelligence of the other man do, except realize clearly the hopelessness of fighting the inevitable? He would none the less starve with the most intelligent understanding of the situation. Sir LYON PLAYFAIR devoted the greater part of his speech to showing that improvements in machinery and means of communication lead to wholesale "displace-"ments" of labour. In agricultural implement-making 600 men now do the work which employed 2,125 in 1873. In milling corn 75 per cent. of labour has been "displaced," and in metal-work about 33 per cent. As freight is low, manufactured goods and all other kinds of export can be placed in the foreign market so as to compete with the native producer far more favourably than was the case even a few years ago. All this improvement of machinery and of means of communication has led to an immense increase in production. The increase in the supply has been out of all proportion to the increase in the demand, and so the market is glutted, and prices are low. Displacement of labour is, of course, simply another and an explanatory-looking term for loss of work. The man who has been "displaced" from the factory to the street, will not be the better off for having his misfortune called by another name. The tendency of all modern industry is towards an immensely increased output by fewer hands, and on the supposition that the tendency is universal, we fail to see how "trained in-"telligence" can save the superfluous men from going into the ranks of the unemployed. Sir L. PLAYFAIR believes that a better time is coming; but, on his own showing, it cannot last unless business men agree not to spoil it by over-production. We have seldom heard a feebler reason for confidence. How are business men to agree to limit production? Is it at all likely that A will hold his hand while B is flooding the market and profiting by the boom? If he does, how will he be the better off two years later? He will be the worse off; for he will not have fattened his paws like the wicked B, and will, therefore, have the less to lick. The moral of Sir LYON PLAYFAIR'S speech would seem to be that "depression" is likely to be permanent, since the world has brought its powers of production and exchange to such a pitch that, on the smallest encouragement, the market can be swamped. For man, considered as a consumer, the prospect has its charms. For the producer it is less pleasant; and for the workman, who may be reduced from 1 to 1-64th at a moment's notice, it is less pleasant still. But Que faire? Sir LYON PLAYFAIR is contemptuous of nations which sacrifice foreign trade for the home market. When the home market is enough, there is something to be said for the policy; but for this country it is not enough, and we must needs keep everything cheap, and chance it.

GRIMTHORPE SEMPER VIRENS.

LORD GRIMTHORPE performed the difficult feat of surpassing himself in last Tuesday's Times. It is to be hoped that, if ever this malleus medicorum should be seriously ill, he will not try to cure himself with sugar of milk in globules. For his death, if it did not exactly eclipse the gaiety of nations, would certainly diminish the stock of harmless pleasures, especially among those "superior per-"sons" at whom he innocuously butts. He tell us, with a fine touch of the quality which, as Mr. DISRAELI once informed a political opponent, is not invective, that we have reached a lower logical bathos than the eminent physician who has the same initials as Dr. BUCKNILL, and whose identity is a very open secret. As it would be no praise to be called less violent than Lord Grimthorpe, so it is no reproach to be described as sillier than the real "J. C. B." But let that pass. The doctors can take care of themselves, and have very effectually done so. For Lord Grimthorpe we can feel nothing but pity for his unfortunate plight, and gratitude for the amusing exhibition he makes of it. Having failed in his design of sending allopathic practitioners to Coventry, he informs an attentive universe that he is himself going to Bath, and perhaps that is the best thing he can do. His enemies have revived its fame, and he will find many of them there; while, if the genius of the place should induce him to read Northanger Abbey, he will certainly improve his style, and perhaps recover his temper. Being a very great lawyer (at least on the very great authority of Lord Grimthorpe) he has been sadly chagrined by the decision of the Court of Appeal that Mr. Millican, whose cause he gratuitously pleaded with so much boisterous energy and self-confidence, has no remedy against the Governors of the Queen's College Hospital. If Mr. Millican were so ill advised as to go before the House of Lords, Lord Grimthorpe would be legally entitled to sit at the hearing of the case, and he might quote the precedent of the late Lord Devon, who had never been anything more exalted than a Master in Chancery. Meanwhile Lord Grimthorpe is deprived of Mr. Justice Manisty's improvident injunction, which he has been brandishing as a weapon of offence over the heads of the medical profession. He therefore characteristically takes refuge in an Irish precedent; and, on the imposing authority of two Resident Magistrates in a totally different case, implies that the managers of a hospital who will not have any dealings with homœopathists or homœopathy may be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for six calendar months. O sancta simplicitas!

Lord Grimthorpe still maintains that vaccination is a "strictly homœopathic proceeding," heedless or oblivious of the facts that it was discovered by Sir William Jenner before Hahnemann was heard of, that it is not a cure but a preventive, and that the disease which it produces is not the disease which it prevents. Lord Grimthorpe's "argument" in reply to these obvious considerations, and indeed his whole controversial tone, forcibly remind one of the theological disputant who, getting the worst of it in a discussion about original sin, which happened to be conducted at dinner, observed, with an air of asperity, "If I "were you, I wouldn't talk with my mouth full." He points out, as we pointed out before him, that the case in question had nothing to do with the respective merits of homœopathy and allopathy, or even with the treatment of one class of practitioners by another, but simply with the legal status of Mr. Millican at the Jubilee Hospital. That is perfectly true; but it only shows that Lord Grimthorpe forced a quarrel upon the doctors from mere pugnacity, as he is said to have once cross-examined a scientific witness in a case with which he was not professionally connected, and because he loves hot water, the hotter the better. His epithets of "cowardly," "dishonest," "idiotic," &c., with which he bespatters the doctors are mere digressions, as the gentleman said when the glass of wine was thrown in his face. He again brings up the old story, which did much duty six or seven years ago, about the insurance office in New York where "homœopathic lives" are insured at ten per cent. below the ordinary premiums. He does not explain how the Company find out that the assured do not secretly resort to allopaths. But we are disposed to think that the principle, if it could be carried out, is a sound one. The people who dabble in homœopathy usually enjoy excellent health, and do not want any medicine. The only book in which Lord Grimthorpe is understood to believe, except "Astronomy without Mathematics," contains the words "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that "are sick." Of course Lord Grimthorpe has his unverified stories about anonymous patients who have been cured by homœopathists where allopathy failed, just as the herb doctors and the wise women have theirs. Lord Grimthorpe believes, or affects to believe, that doctors are liars, rogues, bullies, and conscious ignoramuses. He is welcome to his opinion, and probably no doctor cares two straws what Lord Grimthorpe thinks of him. A more serious effort has been made to show that Dr. Lauder Brunton is on the side of the homœopathists because he says that the "law of similars" is not always false—rather a different thing from saying that it is always true. But Dr. Brunton himself denies the impeachment in decisive, not to say contemptuous, language. As for Dr. Dudgeon's emendation of the subjunctive for the indicative, which turns Hahnemann's proposition from a scientific dogma into a therapeutic rule, it only transforms unsound theory into unsafe practice.

LAW AND LAWLESSNESS.

THE trial of Messrs. Graham and Burns has resulted in the conviction of both prisoners on the charge of participating in an unlawful assembly on the 13th of November last. Of riot and assault the jury declared them to be not guilty—a finding the prisoners owe chiefly to the excellent promptitude by which their attempt to enter Trafalgar Square was arrested, and perhaps to the popular misapprehension of what constitutes an assault in law. On this point, as in others, the summing-up of Mr. Justice Charles was perfectly clear; but the jury appear to have preferred the mildest interpretation possible of the judge's simple and incontrovertible statement. The verdict, however, is completely satisfactory so far as it deals with the more serious offence for which Messrs. Graham and Burns were tried. And it is idle to lament that juries do not invariably deal with cases in the spirit of lawyers when their finding is a sufficient indication of the law. The sentence of six weeks' imprisonment was in the circumstances the least measure of correction that could satisfy justice. Compared with the swift retribution that overtook others concerned in gatherings in Trafalgar Square the sentence may even appear lenient. The dupes of professional agitators have too often suffered penalties which their leaders ought logically to share. This unnatural detachment of cause and effect need no longer distress the more thoughtful among them. Masters and men reap alike the disagreeable fruits of their disastrous and criminal attempts, and the open mind of the democrat must be exquisitely content with the level prospect. The pity of it is that the illustration is somewhat incomplete. The meeting of leaders and followers in common bonds might be more comprehensive. There is something wanted in the picturesque element. We miss Mr. Graham's leaders, and feel it was heartless in his bodyguard, the "men with sticks," to have left him on the field. As to the mischievous inciters of these men, whose valour is measurable by their respect for a whole skin, their elusiveness in the hour of risk is notorious, and no one is surprised at their absence from the fraternal fold. It should prove an excellent lesson for the persons previously convicted of rioting, be they merely dupes or professional defiers of the law, to find their leaders following them to prison. For, though their methods of work differed somewhat, their enterprise is of the same kind, just as the affair of the 13th of November was the illegitimate issue of the organized plans of riot and intimidation that naturally sprang from the improvised disturbance in February 1886. If Sir Charles Warren had proved to be as blind to this patent continuity of events, and as insensible to the necessity of providing against contingencies, as Mr. Graham's friends profess to believe he ought to have been, everybody knows that the disgraceful scenes of the previous year would have been infinitely surpassed on the November Sunday.

Apart from the verdict, which was universally regarded as inevitable, there is sound reason for the public to be satisfied by the judge's succinct statement of the law as to unlawful assemblies and the pretended "right" of public meeting in Trafalgar Square. The purpose of those who organize a public meeting may or may not be lawful, but the attempt to hold a meeting in defiance of the prohibition of the legally constituted authorities was defined to be unlawful. It was quite immaterial whether the objects of the conveners of the meeting were lawful if the authorities responsible for public safety and government were convinced that the project might lead to disturbances and cause fear to other persons. The judge defined in clear, express terms, not merely the right, but the duty, of Sir Charles Warren to prohibit the meeting proposed to be held on the 13th of November. Before that date Mr. Graham and Mr. Graham's abettors in the press knew perfectly well that the projected gathering was regarded by the authorities as an unlawful assembly. The judge completely disposed of the absurd contention that Trafalgar Square was a kind of forum secured in perpetuity to professional agitators and their ever-attendant throng of roughs, pickpockets, and other ill-disposed characters. If it is conceivable that Messrs. GRAHAM and BURNS were ignorant of the nature of an unlawful assembly, it is the more satisfactory that they should acquire knowledge from a jury of their countrymen. The result reduces the future action of the Government to the clearest limits. The ridiculous pretexts of "right" and undefined legality advanced by the friends of Mr. GRAHAM have been declared to be entirely baseless. The mere threats of mortified mischief-mongers that the question will be reopened may be treated with proper scorn.

THE BEGINNINGS OF A MYTH.

IT would be most unfair to hold Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH responsible for the construction which the Gladstonians have hastened to put upon his recent speech at Bristol. The glosses of these designing commentators fortunately defeat their own object by their very audacity. When, on the strength of the speech in question, the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is described in one such commentary as already half a Home Ruler, and is invited to take the final step which will bring him into line with Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL, we know what to think. The writer of such nonsense is, of course, only attempting to raise the depressed spirits of his party, and to make mischief among his opponents. The fulsome compliments, addressed from the same sincere quarter, to Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH on his "states-"manlike mind" and other valuable gifts, and the institution of the familiar eulogistic comparison between the Irish Secretary whom the eulogist was vilifying yesterday and the successor whom he is slandering to-day are all part of the same system of tactics. No one who has fully realized its complete unscrupulousness will be surprised to learn, if he did not know already, that Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH never uttered anything remotely resembling the declaration of a half-Home Ruler. His language on the Home Rule question consisted mainly of the unimpeachably orthodox, if not very fruitful, proposition, that, retaining under the control of the Central Government those matters which ought to be retained, Parliament might then "hand over everything that the in-"terests of the United Kingdom permit to be managed "locally in England to Irish local authorities properly con-"stituted, directly it is safe to do this without risk of the "power we confer being used as a lever to obtain practical "separation." It is true that the late Chief Secretary also urged that the Irish business reserved to the Central Government should be administered by political officials only nominally controlled by a single Minister, who cannot possibly find time for all the details of the administration of the country. This proposal may or may not be wise or unwise; and we confess that we doubt, for more reasons than one, the wisdom of multiplying Irish officials "directly responsible to Parliament"; but anyhow it is a question which concerns the arrangements of central, not of local, administration, and cannot therefore be twisted into any sort of connexion with Home Rule.

At the same time, there was perhaps a little false accentuation about Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH'S address. Unintentionally, no doubt, he laid somewhat too much stress on the prospective, and even problematic, policy to be adopted, and too little on the line of action which must be steadily persevered with for an indefinite time to come if Ireland is really to be restored to full political health. To this objection we think such a passage as the following is distinctly open:—"Of this I feel certain, "you may for a time govern Ireland by force; but, unless "you can convince Irishmen that it is impossible for them "to obtain a separate Parliament and Executive, and that, "on the other hand, they can have all their real wants "dealt with by the Imperial Parliament in the manner "which they themselves desire, you cannot permanently "cure the enormous mischief which has been done by "the adoption by Mr. GLADSTONE of the policy of Home "Rule." All this, no doubt, is perfectly unobjectionable doctrine; but we must be allowed to doubt whether it is exactly the doctrine which most needs enforcing at the present moment. Unless, says Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, "you can convince Irishmen that it is impossible for them "to obtain a separate Parliament and Executive," you cannot "permanently cure," &c. Well, the only way of convincing Irishmen of this—a way which is now being taken with great effect and still greater promise—is to govern them by what Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH calls "force"—that is to say, the amount of restraining pressure necessary to make them respect the authority and obey the orders of the Government under which they live and must continue to live. This—the only convincing process of conviction which can ever really reach the minds of people who rely, not upon their own strength, but upon the presumed weakness of their rulers, in their attack on an existing form of rule—has, as we have said, been applied with great effect and still greater promise; but the very surest way to undo the effect and to destroy the promise of that process is to announce to the people upon whom it is slowly operating that you believe it can only be kept up "for a time." It is precisely this belief, revealed by British Governments and detected by Irish malcontents, which has paralysed all the efforts of firm administrators to restore permanent supremacy to the law in Ireland. It is just because we have never yet succeeded in disabusing the Irish mind of the notion that what is called "coercion" is a mere passing phase of administrative treatment, and that England will tire of applying it before Ireland tires of resisting it—it is for this very reason that we have never succeeded in bringing home to the minds of Irishmen that conviction which Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH rightly considers it so important to impress upon them, but which, unfortunately, the words he had just that moment uttered were calculated to weaken. So long, indeed, as he prefaces statements of the kind by the reminder that you cannot govern Ireland except "for a time "by force" we may be quite sure that Irish Nationalists will pay very little attention to everything that follows the word "unless." His second condition of the possibility of governing Ireland otherwise than by force is, that Irishmen be made to feel that they can have all their real wants dealt with by the Imperial Parliament in the manner which they themselves desire. But one of their wants at this moment—and a want which they vehemently declare to be a real one—is to obtain that separate Parliament and Executive of the impossibility of which we are to convince them; so that it would here seem necessary to Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH'S argument that you should be able to govern Ireland "by force," not only "for a time," but for whatever length of time the "impossible" may continue to present itself to the Irish mind as a "real want." It is idle to tell an unreasonable claimant that your only hope of permanently resisting him is by inducing him to moderate his claims.

We have felt it our duty to take exception to this particular line of reasoning on the part of the late Chief Secretary, because we regard it as calculated to do some mischief in Ireland. That it indicates any wavering of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH'S Unionist convictions we do not for a moment believe. He may possibly be very much astonished that such a construction should have been put upon it; but, if so, that only shows that he has not yet done justice to the admirable mythopœic faculty of his opponents. We can assure him that, however guarded he may consider his language to have been, he has already given these artists ample material on which to work, and that, if he keeps his eye upon them, and refrains, in the interests of art, from any interference, he will have the privilege of seeing a myth in the making. He has been already told that he is half a Home Ruler. We give him three months of that ambiguous condition. When that time has gone by, he will find that he has blossomed out into a full-blown Parnellite. We shall hear of the "Clifton speech" in which Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH "denounced" the "rule of force," and avowed his conversion to the belief that Irishmen ought to be allowed to manage all their own affairs in Dublin—just as we hear of the "Newport speech," in which Lord SALISBURY promised to give his favourable consideration to a scheme for resettling the relations of Great Britain and Ireland after the Austro-Hungarian model. For this work of art we consider three months ample time; and when the myth has been completed it will, like all great works of art, prove imperishable. If Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH doubts this, let him ponder the unspeakably instructive correspondence which has taken place over the speech of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE at Tunstall and that right hon. gentleman's latest "explanation" thereof. Sir FREDERICK MILNER no doubt flattered himself that he had killed one of the myths which Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE had made play with, mistaking it for another. But no! it is here again, quite strong and hearty, and regarded as a perfectly reputable weapon for an ex-Cabinet Minister to pick up and apply to the purposes of party warfare, although the warrior who has now got hold of it does not quite understand its use or know exactly where he got it. He thought his authority was Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, but it appears it was not; so of course it must have been somebody else—Mr. PARNELL perhaps. Yes, let us take it that Mr. PARNELL will corroborate the statement that "other members of the "Cabinet besides Lord CARNARVON" were in favour, in 1885, of a Home Rule scheme. And, although Mr. PARNELL, who has long since told his own story on the subject, has never been able to associate any single one of Lord CARNARVON'S colleagues with Lord CARNARVON himself, and though, further, Mr. PARNELL is the very witness who blew the earlier myth—in which Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE still professes to believe—to the winds, his testimony, which is rejected on the first point, would be perfectly acceptable on the second. Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, as he studies these ingenuities, may see the fate in store for himself.

THE LONDON STARLING.

THE starling is, with the exception of the sparrow, probably the commonest of London birds. From the nature of its food it is not so ubiquitous, but in all the Parks and larger open grassed spaces it may be seen at all times of the year. Its food consists principally of worms and insects; but, notwithstanding that it possesses an enormous appetite, it can live and thrive where the rook, who feeds like it, would starve, the difference in size and therefore in the amount of food required having doubtless much to do with this. The number of starlings, in the Parks at least, does not appear to be diminishing, the decay of the trees, which has driven the rooks from their former haunts, having made life easier for these birds by providing them with excellent nesting places, a hole in a tree being considered by the starling a most comfortable nursery. Kensington Gardens, which unfortunately contains as many decaying trees as any park of its size in England, is in consequence largely frequented by these birds during the breeding season, as they find not only comfortable homes and plenty of food within a reasonable distance, but also immunity from disturbance, as since the park-keepers have been replaced by the metropolitan police, even the most adventurous boys have given up any idea of bird's-nesting there. However, it does not by any means confine itself to nesting in trees, as it thoroughly appreciates an unused chimney, and will take possession of any suitable hole or cranny in a house or other building. In the case more especially of buildings thickly covered with ivy, of which we are sorry to say few are to be found in London, it builds its nest and rears its young in close company with the house-sparrow, with which it appears to live on the best of terms, thus, we think, disproving one of the many charges that have been brought against it—to wit, that it like the daw, is occasionally given to making a meal of the young of its smaller and more feeble companions.

During the breeding season, more particularly, the starling is a noisy, merry bird, spending the whole of its spare moments in whistling, singing, and chattering, as if endeavouring to explain to the whole world how thoroughly it enjoys its life. It is also one of the busiest of birds, constantly running over the grass in pursuit of its food with a manner and gait that is best described by the word "fussy." While it is so engaged no living thing appears to be too small to escape its notice; it is not, however, content with the insects to be found on the surface, but is constantly stabbing and probing the ground with its bill in search of worms and larvæ. It is, in fact, a true friend to the gardener, though we can but admit that the charge brought against it of robbing cherry and other fruit trees has considerable foundation in fact, and that it will also, though this is probably not so heinous an offence in the eyes of the suburban gardener, help itself freely to grapes grown out of doors. Wherever sheep are kept, it is fond of perching on their backs, the cause of this habit being, no doubt, that it is enabled to vary its diet by making a meal of the ticks and other parasites to be found in the wool.

The starling is one of the most beautiful of British birds, though there are many that are more brilliantly coloured. The cock bird in his summer dress, with his bright yellow bill, and his spotted plumage shot with metallic colours, is, in our opinion, surpassed by very few. Even the smoke and dirt of London cannot destroy his beauty; and, unlike the sparrow, wherever he is found he looks and carries himself like a gentleman. This bird, indeed, deserves to be a much greater favourite than it is. Its beauty, and its merry chattering ways, to say nothing of its usefulness in destroying enormous numbers of insects and their larvæ, entitle it to respect and protection wherever it is found, even though it does make the gardener pay toll of his fruit. In addition to its other attractive qualities, it has a certain fearlessness of man, quite distinct from the aggressive impudence of the sparrow, a fearlessness apparently the outcome of a clear conscience, the very movements of the bird when searching for its food on a lawn conveying the idea that it knows it is engaged in a good work, and will therefore not be molested.

When the ground is covered with snow, starlings, especially in the suburbs, are generally found among the birds coming with great regularity to be fed by those bird-lovers who clear a space and throw down crumbs and scraps to help their feathered friends through what to them is a most trying time.

Though, as we have said, starlings are to be found in London and its suburbs at all times of the year, the main body leave town as soon as their young are strong on the wing—that is, towards the end of summer. Being birds with great power of flight, they are very wide rangers, and many of them, there is little doubt, leave this country during the winter; a yet larger number, however, migrate to the westward. Those that remain in this country form large flocks, which are during the day often to be seen in company with rooks, daws, and even lapwings. These flocks collect at night to roost, often forming huge bodies, the birds being literally in thousands. Yarrell gives an account of one of these "starling roosts" which existed in his time at King's Weston, near Bristol, "in a plantation of arbutus, laurustinus, &c.," to which, he tells us, the birds "repaired in an evening by millions from the low grounds about the Severn, their noise and stench being something altogether unusual."

Young starlings, until after their first moult, are in colour utterly unlike their parents, their plumage being of a dull brown. So unlike, in fact, are they that such good observers as Montagu and Bewick described and figured young starlings as specimens of the "solitary thrush," though how the mistake could have arisen it is hard to conceive, as we should imagine that any boy who had ever had an opportunity of bird's-nesting could have identified the species. During the time they remain in the nest the young birds are most voracious, nothing apparently coming amiss to them, and this voracity often leads to their destruction, or at least captivity, as they are so wanting in discrimination that even the human finger is readily seized under the mistaken idea that it can be swallowed and is good for food. The wily boy, knowing this, is often enabled to capture fledglings, whose nursery is far from his reach in the depths of a hollow tree. The proceeding is a simple one; he waits until he knows that the birds are nearly fledged, and therefore strong and fit for his purpose, when inserting his arm into the hole in which the nest is built, and spreading his fingers, he, as a rule, finds at least one of them seized, and is able, before the deluded bird has time to discover its mistake, to drag out his struggling victim. Starlings when taken from the nest are not difficult birds to rear, and if trouble is taken with their education, can be taught to articulate words, and even very short sentences, though they much more readily imitate other birds, or animals, than the human voice. This bird is indeed a mocking-bird, and may often be heard to mix the notes of other birds with its own peculiar song. From its wide-ranging habits it associates with all sorts of apparently incongruous companions, and may occasionally be heard to imitate exactly the wild cry of the redshank or other wader, the result, doubtless, of a visit, during the winter, to the banks of one of our tidal rivers, as it is a very common habit of this bird, especially in severe weather, to visit the banks left bare by the tide, as by so doing it can always ensure a meal.

Starlings are certainly on the increase in the country, and, as we have said, their numbers do not, in our opinion, materially decrease in London, or at least in the suburbs; nor do we think that, so long as the Parks at least remain, there is any cause to fear that they will cease to be reckoned among the birds of London.

PARNELLIUM SIDUS.

COURTESY to a newcomer in any field on the part of oldsters is always decent, and though there might be some things dubious, or more than dubious, in the antecedents of the new London evening halfpenny journal, which appeared for the first time last Tuesday, every well-conducted person must have taken it up in an amiable and tolerant spirit. It must naturally be annoying to a considerable party—such as, in numbers at least, the Gladstonian party certainly is—to find itself with only a single respectable supporter in the London press, that supporter being itself so half-hearted as to disapprove of the Plan of Campaign. And it is only surprising that so long a time has been allowed to elapse before attempting to supply the deficiency. Halfpenny evening newspapers have long been popular and not uninfluential things in the large country towns, and they have in one or two cases attained fair success in London itself. The last newspaper which bore the name of the Star was neither very able nor very fortunate; but there is something in starting with no great reputation to live up to, and with any bad luck which may be supposed to have attached to a name worn off by lapse of time. Something good might come even out of the Gladstonian-Parnellite Galilee.

It is to be feared that these amiable feelings may in impulsive persons hardly have survived the first swimming of the Star into their ken. It has, we doubt not, a staff of genius as great as the personal appearance of that staff is, on the Star's own showing, interesting; but the body does not seem to include a person experienced in the peculiar art of prospectus-writing. Captain Shandon, we greatly fear, though his original was a stout

Tory, would not have declined, other considerations being satisfactory, to write for the Star, the principles of which are quite of the other complexion; but Captain Shandon is dead. He would hardly have been likely to express in one sentence a sublime contempt for "the verbose and prolix articles to which most of our contemporaries adhere," and to make this sentence part of an article two columns and a half long. He might, indeed, have been guilty of tempting fortune by the opening statement, "This is the first number of a journal which is probably destined to be alive and active long after the hand that writes these lines is in the dust," for that is, of course, fair brag of a certain kind. Exegi monumentum, says the editor of the Star, though it must be confessed that probably no one ever performed that operation in a more legerdemainish fashion than by producing one number of a halfpenny paper. Then we are told that the Star "will judge all things from a Radical standpoint," not, of course, therefore, on their merits, or with the ridiculous affectation of impartiality and judicial evenness. The Star will judge the policy of the different political parties (except, of course, the Radical one) by "the condition of the charwoman that lives in St. Giles"; the foi du charbonnier being thus interestingly supplemented by the politique de la charwoman in the list of picturesque phrases. If anybody enables the charwoman "to put two pieces of sugar in her cup of tea instead of one, [he] will be worthy of everlasting thanks and ineffaceable glory." The Star, it thus appears, will not consider the effect on the charwoman of increased sugar, or the means by which she obtains the second lump. One lump or two lumps, that is the sole question. Or rather, it is not the sole. The Star has just said in effect that only if Empire provided two lumps, would it judge Empire favourably; but it now goes further again, perhaps at some slight loss of consistency:—"Empire, dominion, influence in the councils of Europe, all these and such like things to us are mere pestilent emptiness," though we can assure the Star that there is no such thing as pestilent emptiness—it is a contradiction in terms. "The elevation, the more constant employment, the better wage, the increase of food in the stomachs, dignity in the souls, joy, humanity, tenderness in the hearts of the people, these, and these things alone, represent to us progress, glory, national greatness." It is really a pity that Mr. Carlyle is not alive to write yet another Latterday Pamphlet.

The next paragraph reads like, and perhaps is an abstract of, the immortal works of Citizen Carnegie, by whom it was perhaps contributed. The method adopted in the first number to help to bring about the Citizen's millennium is to insert paragraphs of spiteful tittle-tattle about the Queen. The views of the paper on Ireland are expressed in equally familiar form. "We can see no reason why Irishmen should not have exactly the same right as Englishmen to choose their method of governing their own affairs." But there is the usual omission to mention any particular in which Irishmen have not the same right as Englishmen to choose their method of governing their affairs. Also there is a sentence which, for the sake of the editor of the Star, we trust he does not mean to put into practice. He says that "the Irishman is deprived of and the Englishman enjoys the four first fundamental rights of free citizenhood [whenever you see the termination "hood" know that nonsense is going to be talked]—free speech, free writing, free meeting, and free combination." If the Star tries any of these things, we fear that its editor is exceeding likely to find himself in Holloway Gaol. However, this is about the middle of his programme, and by this time he has warmed to his work. "The farmers of Ireland are robbed by the landlords; the poor of London are robbed by the Corporation and the Companies." The police and the Government practise "a system of violent suppression of popular rights"—which, by the way, the Star had just said that Englishmen enjoy. This astral body is going to give London cheap gas, cheap water, cheap meat, cheap fish, cheap houses, cheap rooms—in short, pots with hoops à discrétion; and apparently the means of these gifts is to be the taxation of ground-rents. The accuracy which characterizes the document may be further exampled by quotation:—"Of the pounds that the small tradesman pays for his house, of the shillings the seamstress pays for her room, at least a quarter goes to the idle and the opulent landowner that lives in luxury and ease in the West End of London." We need not trouble ourselves with the minor and usual details of a newspaper programme, except to note that the Star will in reporting "do away with the hackneyed style of obsolete journalism," and the men and women that figure in the forum [where is the forum?], and the pulpit and the law court, shall be presented as they are, living, breathing, in blushes or in tears." This promise is partly implemented, as they would say in Scotland, by the subsequent description of a lady who is rather a heroine with Radicals just now, as possessing "fiery and restless eyes" and "a rubicund complexion." Up to the present, however, the Star has chiefly had to confine itself, as far as the tears and blushes go, to personal descriptions of its own staff, which appears to consist of a leader-writer who is called "the Dook," a cashier who is called "the Gentleman," and a publisher who is like Lord Hartington, together with a sub-editor of "a far-off look and an emotional temper like Shelley"—or the Game Chicken, who might almost have been mistaken for Shelley. These details are, no doubt, interesting, and, in case they are not found satisfactory, the readers of the Star can turn to an edifying history of New York scandal—of which the editor was doubtless thinking when he wrote "All we can do is to be clean and decent." A good deal of the usual alternate fustian, brag, and vulgarity of the common American journal, an attack on Lord Hartington for having a basso profoundo (sic) pronunciation, an account of the private apartments of Mr. John Burns—such is the farrago sideris. And at the end of the programme the peroration comes:—"We have been called into existence by the disgust, contempt, and hate which the malignant and treacherous desertion of the Liberal cause by so-called Liberal papers has created among all true Radicals." This is at least a frank genealogical statement, for it is not every one who would confess that he was the child of hatred, disgust, and contempt. Are the qualities entailed on the family?

We have given more space to this curious little paper than it may be thought to deserve, because it is curious as literally the only thoroughgoing organ of the Gladstonian party in London, and, therefore, expressing the sentiments and the desires which must be supposed to be those which the active men of the party wish to inculcate. It is really interesting to sum up the creed of a true Gladstonian untrammelled by a respectable past. The articles appear to include: (1) the subordination of all considerations in politics to the filling of "the stomachs of the people"; (2) Republicanism; (3) something which is obscurely indicated as a vast reform of the Land Laws, and which must mean expropriation of some sort or other; (4) the provision of cheap houses and extra lumps of sugar by communal or municipal authorities; (5) ransom of house property (which, by the way, is known to be held in larger quantities by small owners than any kind of investment); (6) personal journalism; (7) the general expression of hatred, contempt, and disgust towards other newspapers. Now, that is a very edifying exposé of the kind of thing which is thought likely to appeal to Gladstonian feelings in the lower voter class. Fortunately, it comes a good deal too late. There is plenty of ignorance about, no doubt, and there are said to be still voters of not less than average intelligence, who are sure that dog-muzzling orders mean nothing but profit to muzzle-selling friends of the Government or the justices. But political Clubs of the sounder kind have already done much good, and will do more. It cannot be repeated too often how grave is the responsibility which rests on all persons who in any way have the opportunity to promote the establishment of such Clubs, and the general diffusion of political knowledge by all other means. The programme of the Star ought to be no small encouragement to such persons. For that programme is curiously free from all appeal to any but the very lowest motives. It assumes that, if "the people," who are to be alone considered, can be presented with sufficient bribes at the expense of the upper and richer classes, if they can be coaxed with lumps of sugar, flattered by praises of their dignity and exhortations against servility, and tickled by sensational accounts of trials, ill-natured or prurient gossip, that is all, not only that need be done, but that can be done. The programme, if it had been put forth by the other side as a skit, would have been denounced as a gross insult to the sovereign people. And we can only hope that the conductors of the Star will carry it out as closely as they can; for the more they do so the better for honest men.

LEO XIII. AND IRELAND.

How far there is any truth in the reports of some supposed negotiations between the British Government and the Holy See, we are not just now concerned to discuss. That there is at least great inaccuracy in the statements so confidently hazarded, there can be little doubt. Neither again do we propose to examine here the value of the rumour of Mr. Gladstone's intending to pay his respects at the Vatican in the hope of securing an illustrious convert to the cause of Home Rule. There would indeed be an amusing kind of poetical nemesis in the prostration of the author of The Vatican Decrees; their Bearing on Civil Allegiance, at the feet of the Pontiff whom—in the person of his predecessor—he so sternly rebuked for claiming a right to interfere with politics, in order to solicit his political assistance against the British Government. "It is not," we were solemnly assured in 1874, "for the dignity of the Crown and people of the United Kingdom to be diverted from a path which they have deliberately chosen [say, e.g. the maintenance of the Union unimpaired], and which it does not rest with all the myrmidons of the Apostolic Chamber [Irish bishops e.g.] either openly to obstruct or secretly to undermine . . . and a strong-headed and sound-hearted race will not be hindered, either by latent or by avowed dissents, due to the foreign influence of a caste, from the accomplishment of its mission in the world." It would be, we repeat, a curious nemesis to find the author of these words, and many like them, himself invoking that "foreign influence" to encourage and reinforce the by no means "latent dissents" of Irish priests and prelates from the discharge by Crown and people of the United Kingdom of their mission in the world. Still stranger things have happened, however. Prince Bismarck for instance has in a sense, though not quite the same sense, "gone to Canossa"; why should not Mr. Gladstone go there too? But that, as we said before, is not our point just now. It is more to the purpose to inquire, independently of any surmises as to who is going to ask him to do this or that, what action the Pope is likely to take, or may fairly be expected to take, in reference to the Parnellite agitation. According to a recent telegram, which may be accepted as substantially correct, he received the other day a deputation of Irish bishops and priests and questioned them on several points concerning the condition of Ireland. "After hearing their replies," the telegram proceeds, "his Holiness strongly exhorted the Irish ecclesiastics present to use all their influence to restore tranquillity and respect for law to their country, adding that by violence they would never obtain what they asked." It will be observed that, if this report fairly represents the admonition of his Holiness to his Irish visitors, he said nothing as to the merits or demerits of the end they are aiming at, but did pronounce a decided judgment as to the means by which they are striving to attain it. And here, as it appears to us, lies the true distinction between what it is and what it is not reasonable to expect from Leo XIII. as regards the Irish business. He is ex officio a judge, according to Vatican doctrine an infallible judge, on moral questions, but in political controversy, as such, he has no special call or prerogative to intervene. If then it be asked whether he ought not to condemn Parnellism, we may reply in scholastic phrase, distinguendum. Home Rule per se he may, and presumably does, disapprove, but he can hardly, as Pope, condemn it; Parnellism however means crime, and that he may and should condemn.

To be more explicit, we mean this. The Pope, as Head of the Universal Church, claims the right to be supreme teacher of the faithful on all questions of "faith and morals," and—it is important to note here—that claim is everywhere admitted throughout the world-wide communion over which he rules. He does not claim to be supreme judge on political questions, nor would such a claim be acknowledged. On these matters he must of course, like other men, have his opinion; and, from the position he occupies, and the large opportunities of observation it affords, the opinion, at least of such a Pope as Leo XIII., is likely to be sounder and more balanced than that of private individuals. And hence it is not unnatural that he should be asked, as on a recent instance he was asked, to arbitrate between the rival parties in a political dispute. But this is of course a wholly different thing from intervening by his own independent authority. And to arrogate to yourself an authority you do not possess is much likelier—as was abundantly exemplified under the last pontificate—to imperil than to strengthen the authority which is properly your own. We do not see then how Leo XIII. can be reasonably asked or expected to frame an ex cathedrâ judgment even on a political question so clear and so vital as that of Irish Home Rule. No doubt, affecting as it does the integrity, if not in its far-reaching consequences the very existence, of the British Empire, it cuts across and traverses all ordinary party distinctions, so that it is hard to see how there can be two opinions on the subject among patriotic Englishmen. But that does not immediately concern the Pope. Nor can he even be expected to bring any strong pressure to bear on the Irish bishops, if they assure him that in their opinion Home Rule is essential to the welfare of their country. He may indeed tell them—perhaps he has told them—that they are mistaken. But he can hardly censure them officially if they decline to accept his judgment. That his personal opinion on the subject coincides with that of the great majority of Englishmen is more than probable, from all that is known of his general attitude of mind. But he would not be within his rights in promulgating his personal opinion ex cathedrâ—though Pius IX. constantly did so—nor is it his business, as Pope, to safeguard the interests of the British Empire. It need hardly be added that, all other considerations apart, it would be to the full equally incongruous if he were to follow the advice so importunately, not to say impertinently, thrust upon him the other day by a tiny handful of English Roman Catholics headed by Lord Ripon, and pronounce a judgment in favour of Home Rule. But of that we may rest assured there is no likelihood at all, even though the repentant author of Vaticanism, who has learnt to burn so many of his idols and to adore so much which he once reviled, should end by invoking the papal authority which he so vehemently declared it a forfeiture of the birthright of free Englishmen to acknowledge.

But do we then mean to say that it is unreasonable to expect Leo XIII. to pronounce any judgment at all on the Parnellite crusade? By no means; for Parnellism means crime, and crime is as manifestly within as politics in the abstract are without the sphere of papal jurisdiction. The point may be illustrated from a circumstance which occurred the other day in the Irish Protestant Church. Mr. Galbraith was a member both of the Representative Church Body and of the National League, and the Archbishop of Armagh urged on him the duty of retiring from either the one or the other, not at all—as Mr. Galbraith objected—because his political views disqualified him for ecclesiastical office, but because his membership of the League committed him to the Plan of Campaign, which the primate rightly held to traverse the moral law contained in the decalogue—and the Primate's decision has been unanimously confirmed by the Representative Body—and because a Planner of Campaign would hardly be a suitable member of a Financial Committee dealing much with land. It is on precisely the same principle that Bishop O'Dwyer and Bishop Healy have condemned boycotting and the Plan of Campaign, not as tending to promote the cause of Home Rule—for they are themselves Home Rulers—but because theft and murder, as Bishop O'Dwyer puts it, "are always sinful." But this doctrine was at once peremptorily repudiated by the National League, and has since been more elaborately assailed in "a voluminous letter to the Freeman" by a certain Canon Doyle, who argues at great length that boycotting, so far from being irreligious or sinful or unjust, as Bishop O'Dwyer had maintained, is a Christian duty enjoined by St. Paul in the first Epistle to the Corinthians. And he adds, more Hibernico, that "St. Peter and St. Paul are evidently two Irishmen who were accidentally born in Judea." We do not quote this pestilent trash for its own sake, or to establish Canon Doyle's indisputable claims as a promising candidate for Colney Hatch, but simply because he is notoriously in the swim with the immense majority of his brother priests in Ireland, and with nine-tenths of the bishops. Only last Wednesday, for instance, a long letter was reported in the Times from his Grace of Meath—all Irish bishops are somehow "graces," possibly in order to compensate by a double dose of grace for the "double dose of original sin"—complaining bitterly of the "bigoted tyranny and intolerance" which hindered his "exercise of his Divine rights in the Divine duty of visiting" Mr. O'Brien in prison, which he chose to regard as equivalent to "banishing the priest, the Mass, the Sacraments, and the Catholic religion, root and branch, from the gaol." Again we do not quote this silly twaddle for its own sake, but because Bishop Nulty only reflects the tone and spirit of nine-tenths of his episcopal colleagues, who are hand and glove with an organization publicly denounced by two of the most respected of their number as identified with robbery and murder, and therefore sinful and unjust. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree," as the proverb runs; but then there is no supreme pastor or pontiff of the profession to settle the odium medicum, whereas for these Roman Catholic pastors and prelates there is a supreme teacher whose special function it is to decide finally on their differences in morals and theology. Here therefore, where there is so fundamental a divergence on the first principles of ethics between the bishops of the same national Church, it would seem to be not only the right but the duty of the Pope to settle the dispute by an authoritative decision. The question is confessedly one strictly within his cognizance, and there is a dignus vindice nodus. It may appear strange no doubt that Christian priests and bishops should be found angrily denouncing one of their own order who has ventured to affirm that theft and assassination are always sinful, but strange things do happen in Ireland. It is now some years since the late Mr. Pye Smyth—himself a Home Ruler and a devout Catholic—protested with his dying breath that "the Catholic Church had failed as a teacher of morality in Ireland"; had he lived to this day, he might perhaps have felt constrained to go a little further, and lament that, in the persons of its bishops and clergy, the Catholic Church in Ireland had made itself into an active propaganda of immoral teaching. We cannot at all events wonder that the Tablet, after citing specimens of the virulent abuse showered by the Nationalist press on the Bishop of Limerick, should intimate its conviction that "the Holy See will not long remain silent when treason and rebellion are openly applauded and attempted." Here it is reasonable to expect, as his own spiritual subjects evidently do expect, that the Pope will speak out, not on a question of politics, but on one of elementary natural and Christian morality. He can instruct the mitred mob-leaders of the Croke and Nulty type that Bishop O'Dwyer is right and they are wrong; and what is more, unless they are prepared, as they have not obviously threatened, to organize a schism, they will be compelled to listen to him. If in doing so he cannot avoid indirectly condemning Home Rule, by condemning the only methods by which it actually is, or can effectually be, prosecuted, that is no fault of his. He will simply have vindicated his office as supreme teacher of faith and morals by reasserting the paramount obligation of the Sixth and Eighth Commandments.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

DURING the incongruous Exhibition of Inventions and Music at South Kensington in 1885 much indignation was expressed at the neglect of the authorities in failing to issue a catalogue of the unique collection of musical instruments, documents, and relics then at the Albert Hall. When month followed month without a sign of the desired book, sanguine people yet hoped for some belated recognition of the occasion in the shape of a commemorative catalogue. At the time we joined with others in the natural demand, though feeling little surprise at the determined inaction of the authorities; for is there not at the South Kensington Museum a collection of historical musical instruments huddled promiscuously in dark passages, imprisoned in dingy cases, arranged on the most discouraging system conceivable in museums? The publication of the splendid volume by Mr. A. J. Hipkins and Mr. William Gibb (Musical Instruments. Edinburgh: A. & C. Black) revives the old indignation, while it goes a long way to atone for the consequences of official callousness. There is small danger of falling into errors of the superlative in describing this unique work, nor is it here proposed to dilate on the marvellous reproduction of Mr. William Gibb's water-colour drawings, the excellence of type, paper, and binding, or to attempt the impossible task of indicating the wealth of Mr. Hipkins's commentary. Though of primary interest to the musician, the volume possesses many other aspects of interest, one of which is of peculiar importance, as it concerns the deplorable decay of decorative art at the present time. "Historic, rare, and unique," are terms applied to the instruments figured by Mr. Gibb on the title-page of Mr. Hipkins's folio, and they are of course, in the first instance, of prime attraction with collectors. Beyond these claims, however, the gift of beauty, pure and simple, belongs to the majority of these ancient instruments; and it is natural to inquire why they are so beautiful in form and colour, so expressive of the finer graces of the art of ornament? That things are admired because they are old and rare is portion of the Philistine's creed, and affects the question not at all. The utilitarian will remind us that the beauty of a musical instrument is in its tone, and he will go so far as to admit the value of those violins and their congeners made by the famous makers of Brescia and Cremona. Nor will any musician dispute this contention. Beyond the recognition of the value of old musical instruments the cultured utilitarian will not go a step. To him the virginal, the spinet, the harpsichord, all "clavier" instruments, the precursors of the modern piano, are no further removed from the mere curios of a bric-à-brac shop than the quainter and more barbaric instruments of the East that are depicted by Mr. Gibb. These, also, are marvellous examples of refined colour and ornament, extremely beautiful in form, as may be seen in the exquisite drawings of Siamese instruments. Now the fascination that belongs to these instruments is wholly independent of the eloquent associations of famous violins, the virginal of Queen Elizabeth, the so-called David Rizzio's guitar, and Handel's clavichord. The decorative beauty of the instruments depicted by Mr. Gibb is, of course, absolutely separable from the attractiveness of antiquity or interesting associations. It is due to no accident that a spinet by Ruckers or a virginal by Keene or Leversedge harmonizes so admirably with Sheraton furniture; nor is its superior elegance of form, compared with a modern "grand" piano, caused entirely by its less bulky and elaborate mechanical structure. The passion for solidity in all things with which our ancestors in the last century are most unjustly credited might easily have been gratified by a harpsichord bound in the purgatory of heavy mahogany. The truth is, there was much more genuine appreciation of the beautiful, and a finer artistic spirit dominant in our workshops, in the days of Queen Anne and the first Georges, though perhaps far less popular acquaintance with the jargon of art criticism.

It is certainly very surprising how few examples in Mr. Gibb's noble array show any excess of ornament or any derangement of the functions of decorative art. Some, indeed, may have appeared a little garish when new, but it will try the keenness of the most fastidious to detect in the majority the least trace of the superfluity of niggling, on the one hand, or of the worse and heavier exploits of misdirected fancy. The fine reticence of the true artist is, of course, best shown in instruments by great makers, of which a typical instance may be noted in the guitar by Stradivarius dated 1680 (Plate 29), once supposed to be the only guitar by this maker, but now, as Mr. Hipkins says, another claimant exists in the Conservatoire at Paris. The sole ornament here consists of an arabesque rose on the sound board. Other instruments of world-wide renown, such as Mr. Charles Oldham's violin, the "Hellier" Stradivarius, Mr. David Laurie's two violins, the "Strad," formerly belonging to M. Alard, and the "Guarnerius," once in the Goding collection, are without ornament, excepting the first-named, where the scroll-like design around the instrument shown in Mr. Gibb's central drawing is very slight, though elegant. The Tourte bow, however, of the Guarnerius is mounted with gold, tortoiseshell, and mother-o'-pearl. The carver's work is most elaborate in the viola and the cetera, just as the art of inlay is best exampled by the guitar, the pandurina, the mandoline, and their allies. A remarkable specimen is the guitar from the Museum of Science and Art, Edinburgh, selected by Mr. Hipkins for its rare beauty of ornament. The back is composed of bold alternate bands of ivory and ebony, the neck and head are incised, while the face is decorated with exquisite inlaid designs in mother-o'-pearl and ebony, the finger-board showing delicate engravings of figures and landscapes on ivory. With all this display the decorative effect is extremely pleasing and harmonious. How this ornate treatment influences the tone of the instrument, if at all, is a problem to be decided by an expert like Mr. Hipkins. Some may prefer before this beautiful example the similar, though simpler, scheme of decoration presented by Mr. George Donaldson's ten-stringed Italian guitar, or Chiterna, or his shapely Neapolitan mandoline (Plate 23), both of which are delightful to contemplate. Perhaps the most wonderful example of carving is to be found in M. Alard's cetera by Stradivarius, dated 1700, "in form," says Mr. Hipkins, "one of the oldest of existing instruments." With this Mr. Hipkins compares in a very interesting note a cetera belonging to Mr. Donaldson. It is equally beautiful, the carved design in fine relief being the most artistic work of the kind shown in Mr. Gibb's gallery of drawings. Other notable examples of the carver's skill are to be found in the shell on the back of Queen Elizabeth's lute, the viola da gamba of the Brussels Conservatoire, and Earl Spencer's ivory "Oliphant," or Portuguese hunting-horn. In stringed instruments the inciser's craft is best displayed in the theorbo belonging to Mr. Donaldson, made by Giovanni Krebar of Padua, 1629. Ivory, delicately engraved, gives an appearance of marvellous lightness to this graceful instrument, though it is close upon three feet and a half in length, and is protuberant after its kind. Mr. Hipkins reminds us that Evelyn became a performer on the theorbo while in Italy. Among the valuable items of knowledge in his learned commentary we may cite a reference to Terburg's "Guitar Lesson" in the National Gallery. This picture, it seems, should be known as the "Theorbo Lesson," for the instrument depicted is "a very beautiful and accurate painting of a theorbo."

The contemplation of these treasures is likely to make us too sequacious of the theorbo and all the pleasant family of the lute, forgetful of the claims of key-board instruments, the progenitors of the pianoforte, the instrument of strongest domestic, not to say of broadest social, interest. To deal justice to this section of the work of Mr. Hipkins and Mr. Gibb is quite beyond our space; but one subject touched upon by Mr. Hipkins when treating of old keyed instruments is of great moment just now. Mr. Hipkins speaks encouragingly of the efforts of Mr. Alma Tadema, Mr. Burne Jones, and others who are laudably intent upon rescuing the modern "grand" from its unredeemed ugliness. There is, in truth, no reason why this instrument should not be as beautiful in form and decoration as in tone. That it is not so is as notorious as the external ugliness of modern organs, which are hideous beyond the dreams of architects. Here, again, the utilitarian intervenes. Tone is what we want in an instrument in daily and universal use. True enough; but this does not, or ought not to, exile decorative art or sound design completely from the field. There is, besides, tone and tone, as every one must admit who can distinguish a Broadwood "grand" and an Erard and is intelligent enough to pronounce both good. The clavier instruments for which Haydn, Handel, and Scarlatti wrote also possessed tone, and tone of a very thrilling and magnetic quality, as a well-preserved harpsichord or spinet may yet proclaim to the sensitive ear. Yet it is hard to exaggerate the beauty of those old instruments as presented in Mr. Gibb's drawings. Whether the tone of old keyed instruments moves us or not, whether it seems wiry and thin or a delicate magic to the ear, there is no reason, save the deplorable lack of taste now prevalent, why improvement in the modern piano should not have been accompanied by the like zeal for design and decoration. In addition to their unmeaning ugliness, many modern instruments suggest by their tone nothing so much as the burly street singer in Hood's ballad, whose voice had all Lablache's "body" in it, and nothing more. The many curious archaic instruments depicted by Mr. Gibb, and the absorbing antiquarian interest of Mr. Hipkins's introduction and comments, must be left for the enjoyment and instruction of the fortunate possessor of this magnificent book. These treasures are for the few. Nevertheless we hope it may be possible to see a separate issue of Mr. Hipkins's text, such as would serve as a memorial of the Music Exhibition; many of the precious instruments there included being figured and described in the volume. With regard to the advocacy of Mr. Hipkins of the adornment of musical instruments, no one can study his book without the warmest sympathy with his plea. His services to art in this matter will, it is to be hoped, bear good fruit. It is but fair to mention, in connexion with our remarks on the Albert Hall loan collection, Mr. W. H. James Weale's catalogue of the MSS. and books there exhibited, which is published by Mr. Quaritch.

THE SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANIES.

THE relations between the South-Eastern, the London and Brighton, and the London, Chatham, and Dover Companies, never very friendly, have of late, as they are wont to do, become very strained. For a considerable time the South-Eastern and the Chatham Companies have been fighting over the Folkestone traffic, and now the South-Eastern has roused the ire of the Brighton Company by claiming a share in the suburban traffic between London and Croydon. The Brighton has been in full enjoyment of that traffic for forty years, under an agreement entered into between the two Companies in 1848. About four years ago the South-Eastern Company put forward a claim to share in the traffic; but in 1886 the suit begun was withdrawn, and it was understood that the South-Eastern had renounced its claim. Once more, however, the claim is revived. In a letter addressed to the Brighton Chairman by Sir Edward Watkin, the Chairman of the South-Eastern, last November, he says that the "up" Croydon line belongs to the South-Eastern, which provided the capital by which it was built, and all along has paid interest upon the money, together with bearing the cost of maintenance, rates and taxes, signalling, stores, gas, &c. He further contends that it has not been shown to him that the Brighton Company has any right to use the line; but he magnanimously concedes that he will be willing to enter into negotiations for a joint user. To this Mr. Laing, the Chairman of the Brighton Company, replies that he will fight at any cost rather than allow the South-Eastern to compete with his Company for its suburban traffic. The constant state of warfare, open or covert, which the South-Eastern maintains with the two other Companies, has aroused some of the shareholders in the South-Eastern to make an attempt to displace Sir Edward Watkin from the chairmanship. The agitation was begun by a letter addressed to the several chairmen by a gentleman, who represents himself to be speaking on behalf of several shareholders in the three Companies, asking whether they are prepared to enter into a fusion. To this both Mr. Laing and Mr. Forbes, in substance, reply that they cordially approve of the principles laid down in the letter addressed to them, but that it is useless to talk of fusion since Sir Edward Watkin will not observe the agreements already entered into. Some of the passages of arms, indeed, between the three chairmen are exceedingly lively. Thus, in a letter to Sir Edward from Mr. Laing, the latter says:—"We ask nothing but the loyal observance of existing agreements deliberately entered into with a view of settling all conflicts of interest between the two Companies, without having them constantly disturbed by fresh claims and attacks on each other's territory and traffic never heard of when those agreements were made. We have never made, and never shall make, any such attacks or claims on you, and we have a right to expect that you will act towards us in the same spirit." Further, as already said, both Mr. Laing and Mr. Forbes imply that negotiations for a fusion are useless, inasmuch as Sir Edward will not observe agreements already entered into. And, lastly, Sir Edward accuses his brother chairman of misrepresentation, of course unintentional.

None of the three chairmen are altogether blameless; but there is this much to be said in favour of Mr. Laing and Mr. Forbes, that the South-Eastern is, and for years has been, constantly at loggerheads with their Companies; while their Companies have maintained fairly amicable relations with other neighbouring Companies. It may be objected, and it doubtless is true, that the fault ultimately rests with the shareholders. If they would exercise due supervision over their Directors, suicidal wars of rates and aggressions upon the territories of neighbouring lines could not take place; but we must accept shareholders as we find them. They entrust the management of their affairs to Directors in whom they have confidence, and they cannot be got to pay that close attention to the policy pursued by their Directors which is necessary to ensure that the will of the shareholders shall be obeyed. Practically, therefore, Boards of Directors are all-powerful in these matters, and in regard to the three Companies of which we are now treating, the respective chairmen are popularly believed to completely rule their Boards. The most desirable conclusion of the struggle going on between the three Companies would undoubtedly be a complete amalgamation. Even after amalgamation the business to be conducted would be smaller than that of some of our existing Companies, and that business could be conducted with greater efficiency and with much greater economy by a single Board than by three Boards with their corresponding staffs. But a complete amalgamation is out of the question. It would be opposed to the interests of Boards and staffs; and it must fairly be admitted that the settlement of the terms of amalgamation would be exceedingly difficult. For example, the capital of the London, Chatham, and Dover is entirely excessive. The line was built at great cost, and the cost was increased inordinately by the extravagant way in which the Company was financed. What, then, is the value of the ordinary stock of the Chatham and Dover Company? It is hardly probable that an amalgamated Company would make such an offer to the shareholders of the Chatham as would induce the latter to go into an amalgamation. And, though it would be easier to arrange terms with the two other Companies, there are many difficult and knotty points even in regard to those to be solved. Amalgamation for the present, then, being out of the question, there can be no doubt that a fusion is highly desirable. The plan suggested is a "pooling" of the receipts at competitive stations, the opening of the metropolitan stations of all three Companies to passengers by one or other, and the development and improving of cross-country traffic. All this is highly desirable; but we fear that as yet it is hardly more practicable than amalgamation. Even though engaged in constant war with its two neighbours, the South-Eastern at present does not afford to the public the accommodation which the public have a right to expect. The South-Eastern, at any rate, is not animated with that desire to meet the wishes of the travelling public which an efficient railway management ought to evince, and if it has not that desire to meet the wishes of the public, it is not easy to see what inducement there is for the present management to enter into a fusion. It is quite true that of late the South-Eastern has not been doing well. It is also true that it has failed in much of its recent litigation, notably in the Folkestone question with the Chatham and Dover Company. Yet there is no evidence that the present management has in any way changed its view of the proper conduct of the Company's affairs. Indeed, Sir Edward Watkin professes a willingness to discuss the question, and has invited the two other chairmen and the agitating shareholders of his own Company to submit to the Board a plan of fusion; but all parties seem to recognize that the submission of such a plan would be utterly useless.

As regards the agitation for the removal of Sir Edward Watkin the prospect of success does not seem great. His management of South-Eastern affairs is not such certainly as to recommend it to public favour, and even from the narrow point of view of a South-Eastern shareholder, it has not of late been very successful. But before the shareholders can be seriously asked to remove their present Chairman, a candidate must be forthcoming who will inspire them with confidence; and apparently no such candidate has been found. In all probability the shareholders, or a majority of them, will continue, as in the past, to entrust their Chairman with their proxies, not even taking the trouble to attend the meeting to hear for themselves the arguments on either side. As a rule, while dividends continue to be paid, shareholders are willing to let matters slide, thankful if they do not grow worse. It seems likely, therefore, that the conflict between the three Companies will go on; and if Sir Edward Watkin persists in his claim to share in the suburban traffic between London and Croydon, then a war of rates between the South-Eastern and the London and Brighton seems inevitable. A year ago Mr. Laing informed his shareholders that he would fight rather than yield a single point in the question, and the full sense of the meeting was with him. In the recent correspondence with Sir Edward Watkin he repeats the declaration in explicit and unmistakable language. Sir Edward, however, is not usually disposed to give way to threats, and, though it is quite true he receded from the claim put forward in 1884, it is quite possible that he may now press it forward. A war of rates, however, would be most mischievous to the interests of all the parties concerned. It may be said that the public would benefit; and so they would to some extent, at least for a time; but wars of rates must sooner or later come to an end. Those engaged in them, then, try to compensate themselves for their losses by mulcting the public even more heavily than before, and the slight advantage obtained while the war lasted would be more than lost in the long-continued exactions that would be made afterwards. In the meanwhile the fighting Companies would be impoverished; they would be less able than formerly to fulfil their duties to the public, and if the war lasted long, it is even possible that they might allow the lines to fall into a dangerous condition. From every point of view, therefore, it is to be hoped that a real fight between the two Companies may be avoided.

THE ELECTIONS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE Royal Academy is enjoying the blessing of those of whom all men do not speak well. It is a very excellent thing, alike for individuals and corporate bodies, to be kept standing at the bar of criticism, and to have to endure even unjust attacks. It may not be agreeable—it is not; but in most cases, when the abuse is not overdone, it is salutary. The result of all the criticism brought to bear on the Royal Academy has been that this institution, made conscious of the fierce light that beats upon it, has had to mend its ways, strengthen itself within, and commit fewer and fewer of its former indiscretions. The recent additions to its list of members have been praiseworthy, although the few changes brought about recently by death and retirement have given it little opportunity of reform. Yet the sole election of the winter before last was a good one—that of Mr. Seymour Lucas, the young historical painter, and of last winter an excellent one—that of Mr. Alfred Gilbert, a sculptor of the first rank. On Tuesday last the Academy had the unusual opportunity of electing three men to fill as many vacancies, and no one will be dissatisfied with Tuesday's return. In the place of Mr. Waterhouse, the architect, and Messrs. Stone and Fildes, painters, there were elected Mr. Blomfield, architect, Mr. Richmond, painter, and Mr. Onslow Ford, sculptor. We welcome each of these well-known and highly-appreciated artists to his new distinction.

People have asked for the last fifteen years why Mr. W. B. Richmond was not of the Academy. The answer is one which no one now need care to wait for. All that has been visible to the public is that Mr. Richmond began life as the son of an Academician and as a highly successful and precocious Academy student, that his pictures were early placed in prominent positions at the yearly show, and that then suddenly, as rare things will, he vanished from Burlington House, and turned up again as one of the main props of the new Grosvenor Gallery. What it was that happened, whether somebody blundered, and whether that somebody was Mr. Richmond himself or some captious member of the Council of the R. A., these are matters which must be left undecided until Mr. Richmond writes his memoirs. As early as 1861 we find this painter's name in the Catalogue of the Royal Academy, as exhibiting a very pre-Raphaelite portrait of his two brothers, highly coloured and lustrous, in the manner of Mr. Arthur Hughes. The artist was then but seventeen years of age. For the next five years he continued to exhibit portraits, and these only. Then he went South to Rome, and appears no more in the Catalogues until 1869, when his rich and impressive "Procession in Honour of Bacchus" gave him a position at once as a painter of imaginative subjects from antique life, in the school of Sir Frederick Leighton. In 1872 he blossomed out at the Academy with his heroic and beautiful "Lament of Ariadne," and with a crowd of portraits. Mr. Richmond was distinctly one of the attractions of that year, and when George Mason died there was considerable expectation that Mr. Richmond would be called to take his place. This was not done, however, and next year Mr. Richmond was absent from the exhibition. In 1874 he reappeared with a very large and very striking picture, the "Prometheus Bound." Frederick Walker died, and again Mr. Richmond received no recognition. Whether in consequence of this or not, the latter artist retired from further exhibition at Burlington House, until this last year he once more waved the white flag of a portrait. The reconciliation is a happy thing for all persons concerned, for the artist, for the Academy, and for the public, since, no doubt, Mr. Richmond will indulge us this year with some of his beautiful and characteristic work.

We chronicle the election of Mr. Onslow Ford to be A.R.A. with peculiar pleasure, for we believe we may challenge contradiction in saying that it was in these columns that the talent of the rising sculptor, then a very young man, was first insisted upon, and we have certainly observed the development of that talent with no little sympathy. His election, so closely succeeding those of Mr. Hamo Thornycroft and Mr. Alfred Gilbert, is a fresh proof of the victory which the new school of sculpture has achieved among us. The rapidity with which this, until lately the most conventional, the most effete, of our national arts, has been rather revolutionized than revived cannot have escaped the notice of any careful student of the subject. In the schools of the Royal Academy it has been noted for several years past that the originality and vigour shown by the sculptors far exceed anything to be found among the painters. The interest of the annual competition this year, as was widely remarked, centred around the sculptors, and the work, not only of the gold medallist, Mr. Frampton, but of a second student, Mr. Pegram, was of a quality to completely outlive that of the most prominent painters. In the movement of which these young men are part of the rank and file, Mr. Onslow Ford has been a leader. As a modeller he is not to-day surpassed in this country, and we should say that he wants but a little more confidence in his own power of imaginative selection to become one of the most interesting artists of the age. Born in 1852, he is still young, and, from a début so steady and a hand so sincere in its craft, we have much to expect in the future.

For the architecture of Mr. Blomfield, it is discreet and elegant. His practical knowledge will, perhaps, temper the zeal of one or two members who are artists rather too much and architects rather too little; and no one will be inclined to quarrel with the Royal Academy because of Mr. Blomfield.

OLYMPIA.

IT is certainly in many ways a pity that the Arabs who so adequately rivalled in popularity the Indians of the "Wild West" should have been compelled by circumstances to "fold their tents and silently steal away," not, however, to their "desert homes" this time, but in order to cross the Atlantic and favour New York and the Wild West itself with a visit, which will doubtless prove highly remunerative. It was no easy matter for the manager of Olympia to find an attraction equal to the one these worthy "sons of Araby" supplied, and we are not quite sure that a "Roman fête," represented by a large body of "supers," is likely so soon to efface the impression made by the interesting manœuvres of genuine Sons of the Desert and their gallant attack on a real train, from which, however, they were eventually repulsed by imitation Zouaves. Still the Roman pageant is notable even in this age of theatrical spectacle, and very well arranged. The costumes are glittering and gorgeous, but rather conventional. The moving picture, however, presented by the long procession of gladiators, slaves, archers, chariots, and horsemen, proceeding with remarkable regularity round the huge amphitheatre, under the powerful glow of the electric light, is, to say the least, imposing, and vividly recalls the descriptions we have all of us read in classical novels. In this pageant some three to four hundred persons figure, together with several elephants, one hundred and fifty horses, and no less than twenty beautiful reproductions of Roman chariots. The intricate evolutions of this numerous company are effected with admirable regularity. Unfortunately this superb spectacle concludes the entertainment, when everybody is preparing to leave the arena. But this, it seems, is inevitable, for it is necessary to completely clear the arena to make room for so elaborate a cavalcade. Far from being the only attraction, this Roman fête, as it is called, is, after all, only one item in a most entertaining programme. There is, for instance, an elephant and dog entr'acte, which is extremely amusing, and there are four clever ponies who vie with four equally intelligent horses in the performance of tricks which one would suppose to be quite beyond equine powers of executing. The comic pantomime, in which a funny fishing adventure is gone through by the clowns, is most diverting, and provokes much merriment, especially from the children, who very properly form a good third of the audience at this popular resort. Mr. Kremo's feats on the tight-rope are, as the programme truthfully asserts, "startling and sensational"—almost too much so for the nerves of many; and one feels relieved when Mr. Kremo comes to earth, with the lightness of Mercury, to smile his acknowledgment of the applause he provokes. Miss Jenny O'Brien is quite entitled to be declared the "Champion Equestrienne of the World." Nor should Mr. George Gilbert be forgotten, for he is a very daring rider and a graceful. Mlle. Gontard's triple tandem riding, the Morocco troupe of jumpers who leap about like grasshoppers, and Professor Corradini's educated horses, are one and all—together with many other performers far too numerous to mention here—worth seeing and deserving of public approbation. Olympia is just the place to take children to in the holiday time, and they certainly ought to be shown between the acts the splendid stables, which are well worth visiting by all who love horses. The amphitheatre is admirably heated and ventilated, and singularly free from draughts. There are two performances, one in the afternoon at three o'clock and another in the evening at eight; the earlier is intended especially for children, and is perhaps the more amusing of the two, inasmuch as the comic element is made purposely longer for their benefit.

PINAFORE—THE GERMAN REED ENTERTAINMENT.

THE revival of H.M.S. Pinafore at the Savoy Theatre is, on the whole, a greater success than most revivals. To those who saw it in its original form, even the increased splendour of scenery and nautical actions of the sailors cannot quite make up for the delightful freshness of idea and music which charmed the audiences of the first Pinafore; and they must miss the pretty, picturesque dresses of the original "sisters, cousins, and aunts" of the First Lord of the Admiralty, which are now replaced by tawdry colours and may-be fashionable, but in most cases ugly and unbecoming, headgears. However, once having got over some small disappointments which may possibly be put down to distance having lent enchantment to the view, there is no doubt that H.M.S. Pinafore is being heartily welcomed back again. There is also no doubt that Mr. George Grossmith sings and acts his part of Sir Joseph Porter with greater spirit than ever; whilst his dancing during the refrain of "Ring the merry bells on board ship" is irresistibly comic. Mr. Rutland Barrington, as Captain Corcoran, has greatly improved in his acting, and makes the pompous Captain more stolidly pompous than ever. Mr. J. G. Robertson sings and acts delightfully as Ralph Rackstraw; the only fault that can be found with him is that he occasionally forgets he is not singing at a concert and addresses his audience too exclusively. Dick Deadeye in Mr. Richard Temple's hands is acted to perfection, and excellently sung; whilst the characters of Bill Bobstay, boatswain's mate, and Bob Becket, carpenter's mate, are well sustained by Mr. R. Cummings and Mr. R. Lewis, and both act and sing remarkably well in the song "A British Tar is a Soaring Soul." The ladies of the company are not quite up to the mark, and, though Miss Rosina Brandram personates "Little Buttercup" with great credit, it is certainly not her part. The sailors have all evidently been well drilled by an expert, and need not be afraid of the criticisms of any members of the Queen's "Navee" who may happen to be present at their performance.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment at St. George's Hall consists at present of a first part, entitled Tally Ho! written by T. Malcolm Watson, music by Alfred J. Caldicott, and a new "holiday sketch," Our Servants' Ball, by Mr. Corney Grain. Tally Ho! is one of the prettiest, brightest little pieces that has been produced as the first part of the entertainment at St. George's Hall for a long time. The performers evidently enjoy acting it as much as their audience enjoy looking on at it. Its plot is simple enough. The scene is laid at a village smithy, where the young swell of the neighbourhood, Harry Vine, repairs to court the blacksmith's pretty sister, Rose Bradley. Harry Vine's stepmother, Lady Vine, discovers the courtship, and is not unnaturally indignant. She confides her troubles to the girl's brother and to her godfather, and makes them promise to help her part the lovers, which promise they obey to the letter, but not to the spirit; and after a few amusing complications, all ends happily for both young and old people. Mr. Alfred Reed as Edwin Sudbury, Esq., M.F.H., the old godfather, is inimitably funny, and acts with even more than his usual go. Miss Fanny Holland makes Lady Vine all that is haughty in the question of her stepson's love affairs, and at the same time weak as regards her own, and she sings a hunting-song, "The frost is gone, the sun is up," with admirable spirit. Rose Bradley is very prettily and gracefully acted by Miss Kate Kelly, whose sweet, fresh voice sounds very well in a duet, "A maid one day a fishing went," with Harry Vine (Mr. Ernest Laris), and in the trio, "When summer came with its wealth of flowers," which she sings with Harry Vine and Joe the Blacksmith. Mr. Templer Saxe makes a good Joe Bradley, though he overacts his part. His voice and Mr. Ernest Laris's come out particularly well in a very effective duet, "The fire throws out a cheerful light." There is also a very pretty quintet at the end of the little play. Altogether, the music is attractive and well constructed, and sets off a well-written, well-acted entertainment. It is almost needless to expatiate on Mr. Corney Grain's power of entrancing and amusing his audience; his versatility would be incredible, if one had not such constant proofs of it; and in Our Servants' Ball he has added another original sketch to the many he has already given us. In his song "The first thing in the morning" he gives an amusing description of the man as described by himself and as described by his valet—one of the cleverest of his songs; and he goes on with a lover's serenade to his lady-love, backed up with a refrain from her lady's-maid, which, if more severe, is equally amusing. He goes on with a description of a servants' ball, giving an imitation of the village choir—"a very village choir"—greeting the master of the country house where the ball takes place with a carol. It is almost impossible not to believe there is really a "very village choir," with its squeaky trebles and its deep and tuneless basses, singing the "simple" carol. The conversation which he gives as taking place between the gardener's wife and the cook, the way in which he describes the gardener's wife's dress, the dancing, the supper, the butler's speech, the sentimental footman's song, an exceedingly pretty song which he makes the old nurse sing, and the finale of the ball, all defy any amount of "telling" to convey a correct idea of this capital "holiday" sketch.

ICELANDIC SAGAS.*

THESE two bulky volumes form the first instalment of that series of historical documents relating to the settlements and descents of the Northmen on the British Islands which have been so long and so eagerly awaited by students. For many years past, in such intervals as his other work permitted him thus to employ, Mr. Vigfusson has been working away, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, at a complete text of such Icelandic sagas as bear upon our early history. These direct and manly chronicles have a peculiar claim upon our attention. They not merely remind us of the earliest instances when,

* Orkneyinga Saga, and Magnus Saga. With Appendices. Edited by Gudbrand Vigfusson. London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Hakonar Saga, and a Fragment of Magnus Saga. With Appendices. Edited by Gudbrand Vigfusson. London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

> in our rough island story,
> The path of duty was the way to glory,

but they divert us to Northern interests from the too obstinate contemplation of influences working upon our history from the South. It may be well to say at once that these volumes have the character which is known to those who are familiar with the Rolls series. They appeal to students only. The Icelandic text is given, without translation, without commentary, without notes, without glossary; and the only relief to its bald severity is a very technical preface to each volume, giving a bibliographical account of the MSS. and their condition. The first volume unbends sufficiently to give one or two facsimiles, a page of the Flatey Book, with comic illuminations by Magnus Thorhallson, and examples of Jon Thordsson's elegant handwriting. But beyond this nothing, not a map, not an illustration, nothing but undiluted learning clad in the rough dress of hideous official typography. Nevertheless, for what we have received we are thankful. Mr. Vigfusson is a scholar whose work is sometimes presented in a crabbed, and sometimes in an irritating, form; but the greatest Icelandic authority of our time may be held to stand above formal criticism. We are glad of anything he may throw to us, even if it be a bone, and the prefaces and appendices to the present volumes are distinctly osseous.

What is now called Orkneyinga Saga, and what used until the seventeenth century to be known as Jarla Saga, is a bundle of historical fragments of various ages and authorships. Speaking simply, it is the history of those earls of Norse extraction who made themselves masters of the Orkneys in the ninth century, and held the archipelago for three hundred and fifty years. The saga in Mr. Vigfusson's edition, which differs very considerably from the text used by Mr. Hjaltalin in 1873, begins with the "Fundinn Noregr," the origin of Norwegian empire, this being an epitome of a lost history of the State of Norway. We then reach the Jarla Saga proper, the lives of the heroic despots of the Orkneys, Thorfinn and Einar, Brusi and Rögnvald, the last great Vikings of the Scandinavian race. It was about 880 B.C. that the rule of Sigurd, the first Earl of Orkney, was settled in the islands. Harald the Fairhaired had grown weary of the raids made by the lawless Vikings of the British Islands, and at last, one summer, he made a serious expedition to these coasts, and conquered Shetland, Orkney, and the Hebrides, pushing as far south as Man. To his faithful henchman Rögnvald the King, in returning, presented Shetland and Orkney; but the two groups were difficult to govern together, and Rögnvald, therefore, presented Orkney to his brother Sigurd, who became the first Orkney earl. The portion of Orkneyinga Saga in which this story and the subsequent history of the earls is given at length is considered by Mr. Vigfusson to be the oldest piece of the whole complex history, and he appears to attribute the composition of it to the eleventh century. He styles it a "well-written and historically important work, the product of the classic age of Old Icelandic prose literature"; but even legend supplies us with no hint as to the hand that compiled it in its present form. To Jarla Saga proper follows abruptly a totally distinct work, Thattr Magnus Jarls, which is more commonly known as St. Magnus Saga. This is an abridgment of a life of St. Magnus, written by a certain Orkney abbot, Robert or Rodbert, as early as 1136, and in Latin. This original is lost, but several Icelandic epitomes of it, of which this is supposed to be one, have survived. The story of the sainted Earl Magnus is one of the most humanly interesting episodes in the Saga. He had great trouble with a usurping earl, Hakon, with whom he was eventually glad to be set at peace by dividing the Orkneys with him. The pact was kept for several years; but Hakon grew more and more jealous of Magnus. A reconcilement, however, was again patched up, and the earls consented to meet in peace on the island of Egilsey, which was a sort of Iona to the Orkneys. But Hakon laid a trap for his colleague, and had him barbarously murdered in the very precincts of the holy island in the year 1115 or 1116. The body was buried in Birsey, where there almost immediately appeared coruscations of heavenly radiance and wafts of sacred perfume, until the sanctity of Magnus began to force itself upon the conviction even of such sceptics as William the Bishop. At this point there is inserted into the saga a little collection of miracles performed by St. Magnus, entitled Jarteinabok, and then we continue the thread of the narrative with the adventures of Earl Rögnvald and Svein Asleifsson. The whole Orkney Saga closes with a rather confused account of the canonization of Rögnvald and the death of Svein.

In his bibliographical account of the Orkneyinga Saga Mr. Vigfusson gives a pitiful account of the treatment which the priceless records of Icelandic literature underwent just before the period of a revival of interest in them. Some of these misfortunes and indignities are worthy of a chapter in Mr. Blades's Enemies of Books. One thirteenth-century MS. was cut up into pairs of breeches "of the Irish make." In the Arne Magnusson collection are now to be seen patterns for ladies' robes and bonnets cut out of priceless vellum books, of whose existence they are now the only record. In the year 1632 there was still intact a MS. of the Orkneyinga Saga, in perfect condition, except that a fragment was missing at the end. When Arne Magnusson came to search for this MS. some seventy or eighty years later, it had all been cut up to serve as guards for the wooden boards of printed books. He could only recover one fold of it, blackened, mutilated, and almost illegible, the sole surviving fragment of a beautiful vellum. Happily, amid the general destruction, some happy succession of accidents has preserved for us, clean and white, that glorious encyclopædia of Norse History, the Flatey Book. Mr. Vigfusson gives an account of this famous MS., which is more complete and exact than any with which we have previously met. We may quote some portions of this interesting passage:—

> It was written in the fourteenth century at Wide-dals-tunga, not far from Thingore Cloister, which had no doubt a goodly library capable of affording material to its scribes. John Haconsson, for whom it was written, was born in 1350, and he is last mentioned in 1398. . . . John led an active life, and was badly wounded in an assault. Soon after the last notice of John's wound, the entries in all the Annals cease, and darkness closes on Icelandic history, so that we know no more of the family or its fortunes, or the circumstances which transferred the book John had had written for him, from his family-seat to Flatey. . . . It was in the course of copying the book, in 1858, that I found out from internal evidence exactly how it had been composed, and was able to correct several blunders which have been made in the accounts given of it. It was clearly begun by John Thordsson and . . . when he had gone on to the "end of the Olafs," and Magnus had taken up the pen, the work went on straightforwardly to the last quaternion, upon which the Annals were placed. And now new matter turned up which Magnus wished to include in the book. . . . Now we can see why Magnus's hand begins and ends the book. We are also able to contradict the oft-repeated statement that the Flatey Book was begun in 1387 and finished in 1394. The facts are these; on the fifth page of Magnus's new matter, which, as we have seen, was really the last part of the volume written (except a few entries in the Annals), these words occur, "This Olaf was called after the holy king, Olaf Haroldsson, according to his own direction. He was king when this book was written. There were then passed from the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ 1387 years." This date 1387, therefore, marks the end, not the beginning, of the gigantic task John Haconsson had set his scribes, the priests John and Magnus. After this date, the Annals in Magnus's hand still go dribbling on for a few years, but they cease in 1394, though there is still a blank page on the last quaternion of the Annals unfilled.

After Orkneyinga Saga there appropriately come in the same volume the two Magnus Sagas, hin lengri or the Greater, and hin skamma or the Shorter, the former printed from a seventeenth-century copy of a vellum, called the Bæ Book, which has long since disappeared, the other from a fourteenth-century MS. in the Arne-Magnæan collection. These are supplemented by a variety of shorter texts bearing more or less on the history of Orkney and its earls; among them, the story of Helga and Ulfi, the deeds of Heming Aslaksson, which forms quite an important little Orkney saga, and finally Játvardar Saga, which is the history of our English Edward the Confessor. In this manner Mr. Vigfusson has, for the first time, and with the help of the five principal public libraries of Scandinavia, presented the world with a complete text of the great saga of Orkney, with all its attendant fragments and additions. It is a vast record of sustained and intelligent labour in one of the most stubborn fields of scholarship.

We have left ourselves no space in which to deal with the second volume before us. It is mainly occupied with the Hakonar Saga, composed in 1264 and 1265 by the famous Icelandic historian, Sturla Thordsson. It is full of poems, the greater part of which are Sturla's own composition. He tells us that, when he read them to King Magnus, that monarch was polite enough to say:—"It seems to me that thou art a better poet than the Pope." In Sturla's hands, in spite of this royal commendation, the Court poetry of Iceland finally expired, and it is the prose part of Hakonar Saga which possesses the main literary as the main historical interest. It is followed by a fragment of a Magnus Saga; this Magnus having nothing to do with the Earl and Saint of Orkney, but being the famous adventurous King of Norway who was the son of Hakon. This saga, also the work of Sturla, is attributed by Mr. Vigfusson to the year 1277, or in no case to a later date than 1284, when Sturla died. The saga, as we have it, says nothing about the death of King Magnus, which occurred in 1280, and it seems probable that it never included any account of this incident. But the greater portion of Magnus Saga has unfortunately perished, although the present text, owing to a fortunate discovery of Mr. Vigfusson's in the Stockholm Library, is more complete than any hitherto published. In an appendix is printed, for the first time, a Saga of St. Dunstan, written early in the fourteenth century, by the notorious monk Arne Laurentii.

The work enshrined in the present volumes has not the literary charm of some of Mr. Vigfusson's publications. It does not, as his Corpus Poeticum Boreale did in 1883, open up a whole new field of imaginative literature, or, as his Sturlunga Saga did in 1878, give order and a plan to the hitherto untracked chaos of Icelandic historical literature. But what is here given, if more severe, more adust, is not a whit less original or less conscientious. Here, as so often before, those who follow Mr. Vigfusson will find that what was a marish has become a firm paved path. But we must not close without appealing against the cheap and nasty way in which these scholarly volumes have been sent forth by the Stationery Office. They have a shabby Blue-book appearance, a long, unsightly page, and what seems a studied contempt for all the arts of typography. If the Stationery Office could blush—which we feel is an absurd supposition—we should invite it to compare these coarse and ugly volumes with the beautiful books which the Clarendon Press has on previous occasions produced for Mr. Vigfusson.

MR. CRAWFORD is something more than a traveller over the face of the earth, he is a dweller in foreign countries, which is a very different thing, and describes life as it appears to the commonplace inhabitant, and does not merely record the superficial impressions of the ordinary visitor. India, the Rhine, Essex, Rome, have in turn been the scenes of his stories, and the plot of his latest novel, Paul Patoff, is unfolded in Constantinople and its suburbs along the Bosphorus. The keynote of the book is the preference of a mother for one of her two sons—a preference which, beginning with injustice in boyhood, continues into jealousy in manhood, and culminates in an attempt to murder the object of her detestation in order to gain for his brother the wife he coveted. To be sure, by this time Mme. Patoff was mad, driven so by grief at the sudden disappearance of her son Alexander. The young man suddenly vanished from the gallery in the church of St. Sophia, when, in company with his brother Paul and a janissary or kavass, he was inspecting the ceremonies of the Ramazan. His mother persistently cherished the idea that Paul was his brother's murderer. The characters of the two brothers are in sharp contrast. Alexander, the elder and favourite, is drawn in rather conventional colours; he has a beautiful face and fascinating manners, but little brain and less heart. Paul is tall, strong, plain, and purpose-like, a man of the world from the exigencies of his position, as secretary to the Embassy, but unsocial in his instincts and tenacious in his affections. He suffers many annoyances from Alexander's careless behaviour during a short visit to Constantinople, and is forced for two years to lie under the suspicion of being his murderer. It would be unfair to Mr. Crawford to reveal how Paul cleared himself, and how Alexander repaid him, but the adventures are very well told and very exciting. It is a fitting retribution for Alexander's love of intrigue, that the white hand which causes so much mischief and leads him astray turns out to belong to a hideous old woman. The best scenes in the book are those in which Balsamides Bey, the Turk, bargains with Marchetto the Jew. The feints and counter-feints, the recognized phrases of depreciation, the attacks and parries of both parties are given, with a truth that is very instructive to a European mind. Life must be long in Constantinople for such controversies to be possible. Among the subordinate characters, the best is that of Professor Cutter, who takes a scientific interest in the question of Mme. Patoff's madness during the two years occupied by the story, and pays her frequent visits in order to ascertain the state of her health. We cannot help thinking that Mr. Crawford has made a mistake in describing Mme. Patoff as an Englishwoman. Her moodiness, her violence, the cunning with which she feigns madness for two years when it suits her purpose, rather suggest a foreigner, or even an Oriental, instead of a lady whose very unromantic maiden name was Dabstreak. Mr. Crawford, too, is very misty about her age. On page 140 (vol. i.), and several times later, she is stated to be in her fifty-second year, and a beautiful, well-preserved woman; while in other places she is frequently alluded to as "an old lady," and on p. 160 there is the further observation that she "had spent nearly forty years in the midst of the most brilliant society in Europe." Indeed, Mr. Crawford is never to be trusted in the matter of age. On p. 18 (vol. i.) Mme. Patoff's sister, Chrysophrasia, a most wearisome and overdrawn female, is said to be thirty-eight; but in vol. ii. p. 260 Mme. Patoff complains of "the way in which she treated Patoff before they were married," and of making a quarrel which broke up her life at the very beginning. Now, as Alexander Patoff is thirty-four years old at this period, it follows that at the time of his mother's marriage his aunt could have been no more than three. Even in our precocious age this will be thought rather young for interference in matrimonial projects. It is a pity that so much space is given to the Carvel family, Mme. Patoff's English relations. Hans does not come in, and the heroine, Hermione, is rather a shadowy young person. It is always a relief to escape from them and get back to the Turks, with their curious modes of looking at things, and their eternal proverbs, or even to Doctor Cutter, with his theories of madness. The book would be improved by the omission of some lengthy conversations, and also by a little more attention to style, such phrases as "I think Carvel would better stay behind," being neither grammatical nor elegant; but altogether Paul Patoff is one of the freshest and most original books that have been published for some time.

The title of A New Face at the Door has no apparent connexion with the story. There is a good deal of life and cleverness about this last book of Miss Stanley's, as there was about her earlier one; but the want of experience in handling a story which was observable in that is still noticeable. Her chief power lies in character-drawing, and in developing her characters in the way in which the circumstances of their lives would naturally have developed them. The change produced in the heroine, Greta Charlstrom, from a lively, careless, pleasure-loving girl to a stern, self-contained woman has nothing strained about it. It is caused by her remorse at having occasioned, as she thinks, the suicide of her old playfellow and lover, Jack Daman, by refusing to fulfil her promise of marriage. Greta's behaviour, too, under the suspicion of Jack's murder and during the subsequent trial is very well conceived. She was too much grieved by her own involuntary part in the tragedy to give any thought to her own safety; she knew none of her friends would believe her guilty; and as to the rest, she was simply half dazed, half indifferent. It is to be regretted, however, that Miss Stanley has allowed herself to be drawn into the old device of a trial. Nearly all trials in English novels are bad; but there is something peculiarly mild about this one. The retorts of the barristers to each other, their informalities, and the final speeches of the lawyers have a ring curiously unlike what we are accustomed to in courts of law. In Opal Carew, the governess of Greta's sister and the real murderess of Jack, Miss Stanley has undertaken a task that is beyond her. Opal, who has a trace of black blood in her veins, is a girl of an indolent, intriguing, luxurious nature, at once violent and superstitious. She takes advantage of Greta's absence abroad to weave her toils round Jack, Greta's betrothed, the son of her stepfather; but though he learns to confide in her, his love for Greta never wavers. When Greta jilts him for another man, he hangs about near home, getting news of her from Opal, and one day when Opal has been the witness of an accidental meeting between the quondam lovers and of Jack's despair, she hurries out from her hiding-place, upbraids him, and finally stabs him with a little dagger which had once formed part of Greta's dress for a fancy ball. On hearing the cry Greta hurries back, and is found by some labourers by Jack's body with the dagger in her hand. Opal's bearing at the trial is hardly consistent with her extreme nervousness; but Miss Stanley in drawing her career has skilfully avoided the usual pitfalls of the governess of fiction, and has not rewarded her beyond her deserts. Little touches of humour here and there brighten up the gloom of the story—for instance, the remark concerning Opal's cousins, that they had reached an age when their friends began to make their lives a burden to them by wondering that they did not get married, and the comment of the young lady, that "it would be worse when they left off wondering." The men are, as usual in a lady's book, mere lay figures, but the tone of the whole book is natural and healthy, and it is pleasant reading.

Why is it that the heroine of a sporting novel is almost invariably called Nellie? The young lady who occupies that important position in The Fox and the Goose is no exception to this rule, though, unlike the generality of her namesakes, her hunting exploits play no part in the book. Racing forms the chief interest of the story, and people who do not race are unlikely to read many pages. And even the readers must be prepared to put up with a great deal. Mere names of horses and records of stakes are not enthralling, and the love affairs in which the various characters become involved have no air of reality about them. The style as well as the personages are vulgar; and sentences, such as "A compact, two-storied residence, was Laurel Hill House," are by no means uncommon. Nellie's aunt is described on page 14 as her governante (sic), and a race-meeting is alluded to (page 106) as "the female-favoured Carnival of June." A fair sample of the author's style may be found on page 143, where it is observed that "jealousy is no offspring of real affection, but a tumour of our grosser senses, that corrupts or disfigures when alloyed with the purer fondness of the heart." After this we cannot feel surprised when Nellie writes to her brother, "It's dull enough to be doing gooseberry for deluded lovers of my own generation, but that good-natured task when demanded by elders would wear down the staying powers of brother mine—pardon the slang—I mean the patience of Job." Nellie is aptly described on page 84 as "a rake," and a greater flirt novel-readers have seldom met with. However, she reforms after her marriage, and attends in a praiseworthy manner to the large family she brings into the world in a surprisingly short time. Her brother Fred ultimately leads to the altar his old love, who has so little knowledge of the customs of society that on her second wedding she has bridesmaids to attend her. The scene of the book is laid in Ireland, and the people are all Irish, but, sad to say, this does not make them humorous, and the many efforts of the author in this direction are a terrible failure.

It is only recently, in his novel of A Prince of the Blood, that Mr. James Payn gave us an English lady who was preparing deliberately to pass her life upon a lovely island in a mysterious region between the Cape of Good Hope and India. Mr. Knight, in his Web of Destiny, has gone even further than Mr. Payn, and makes a small colony of English settle in an equally beautiful island off the River Plate. The hero, Victor Fairlie, is beset during the early years of his life by a horrible apparition, a family inheritance, which appears at every eventful moment in his career. It makes itself visible before Fairlie overhears a plot for breaking into his neighbour's house, which he naturally tries to prevent, and so meets with his future bride; it is seen before Fairlie learns that the young lady has been whisked off to Jamaica by her indignant parent; before his ship reaches the island where they learn the insurrection of the negroes, and his betrothed's consequent danger; and once more, to bid him "Good-bye," and announce that the time allowed for tormenting the Fairlie family had expired. This, it must be conceded, was pretty hard work for the ghost during its last few months of tenure. It is after its farewell appearance that Fairlie stumbles on the island near the River Plate which contains his lost love, who, on her voyage from Jamaica to England, had been miraculously blown down to these latitudes and shipwrecked there. In general, when people have been shipwrecked for some years, they prefer returning to live in their native land ; but, after a brief visit to England, Fairlie and his wife and some friends settle down in this remote spot, and Fairlie is elected Rajah. The whole tale has something very comic about it, and perhaps Fairlie was as well among his savages as anywhere else; for a man who was so hopelessly devoid of tact as to tell a gentleman for whose daughter's hand he was asking, to "keep command over his temper" was not likely to succeed in the ordinary business of life.

DANTE'S COMMEDIA AND CANZONIERE.*

THE Dean of Wells may be congratulated upon the completion of his labour of love. His second volume contains his translation of the Paradiso, and of the minor poems of Dante. It also includes what are modestly called "Studies" upon the genesis and growth of the Commedia, upon the estimate in which Dante was held in his own and in subsequent times, in Italy and in other countries; and on other points of interest in connexion with the great poet. There is also a very full and complete index. In the English rendering of the Paradiso, as well as in the notes to that portion of the poem, the Dean's profound and intimate acquaintance with the theology of the middle ages has given him a great advantage over other translators and commentators. The translation is more uniformly good than those of the Inferno and Purgatorio, although many lines still occur in which the force and simple beauty of the original is lost; and the notes are generally excellent. Some strange confusion, however, has been allowed to appear in the note to Par. 27, v. 81, in which Dante's sudden and remarkable change of place in the heavens is explained as taking place in latitude instead of in longitude—that is, from south to north, instead of from east to west. None of the commentators, from the earliest to the latest, have found any serious difficulty in the passage in question.

The allusion in Par. 28, v. 93 to the old Eastern apologue of the reward to be measured by the number resulting from the continued doubling of the squares on the chess-board, hardly required the insertion in a note of the algebraical formula for the sum of a geometrical series; and in this, by-the-bye, an absurd misprint has escaped correction.

The versions from the minor poems include the whole of them, even those of questionable authenticity, and thus afford an opportunity to English readers of becoming acquainted with them which has not previously existed. The Dean's translations are often more close to the original than those also made by the late D. G. Rossetti, but certainly they are not to the same extent saturated with the full sense of their beauty. But he has been very successful with Sonnet XVII. and the Canzone XIX., which are acknowledged as the first and best of their kind in the whole range of Italian poetry. It is to be regretted, however, that the Dean seems not to have been able to afford space for translations of the whole of the Vita Nuova and the Convito; for the poems taken from them, although accompanied by some explanation, must always suffer by severance from the context of narrative or disquisition to which they naturally belong. They are all the more beautiful when they are met with sparkling and bursting into song in the midst of the soil of prose from which they spring, and in which they have their origin.

For students of Dante the so-called "Studies" will be found most valuable and interesting. A large quantity of material has been collected and arranged as it only could have been by one thoroughly conversant with his subject, and giving his best abilities and affections to the accomplishment of his work. The pages devoted to the discussion of the estimate in which Dante was held by his contemporaries and in which he has since been held by different nations are those which will probably be read with the greatest curiosity. There can be no question as to the enormous reputation enjoyed by Dante in his own country during his own life, and for the two centuries following his death. The Dean cites G. Villani, the chronicler of Florence, who died in 1348, to show that for him Dante had become one of the great names of the city from which in his lifetime he had been expelled, and to which he never returned. Boccaccio lectured on the Inferno, and wrote an account of its author. Petrarch, much engrossed with Latin literature, was more tardy in recognizing Dante as the chief of those who wrote in the modern language of Italy. Professorial chairs for expounding the Commedia were founded in several cities, and valuable early commentaries, only recently printed, were written. Painters were inspired by Dante; copies of his poems were rapidly multiplied in manuscript, and editions of the Commedia were among the earliest productions of the Italian printers, and continued to be important and numerous, until the influence of the Renaissance for a considerable time interfered with the homage previously rendered to Dante. Up to the year 1600 there had appeared fifty-seven editions of the Commedia. From 1600 to 1700, incredible as it may seem, there were only four editions for the whole century. But the number rose again in the following one to as many as thirty-three editions, and it is needless to trace further the restoration in Italy of Dante to his due place.

In England the knowledge of Dante is first seen in the works of our own earliest great poet, Chaucer; and the Dean has quoted the numerous passages in his works which are obviously derived from his acquaintance with those of his Italian predecessor. Sidney, in his Defence of Poesy, mentions Dante; but there is nothing to show that he had been studied by Spenser. There is no trace of any allusion to him by Shakspeare; but to Milton he must have been familiar. Later on the Dean notes that Boyle, Evelyn, and Addison travelled in Italy without even mentioning the name of Dante afterwards. It may be added that Johnson, in his Life of Milton, and in considering the sources of Paradise Lost, does not bestow a word upon the Commedia. Hume, in his summary of the poetical literature of Milton's age, selects as his standards of comparison with him in their several languages Homer, Lucretius, and Tasso, but is silent as to Dante. Warton, in his History of English Poetry, only introduces a mention of Dante to ridicule his Gothic and barbarous innovations, his childish or ludicrous conceits, and his disgusting fooleries. He concludes by giving an extract from Voltaire's wretched version of a famous passage in the Inferno, and by saying that "Dante, thus translated, would have had many more readers than at present." There are no countries in which for the last few years the study of Dante has been prosecuted with more vigour than in England and the United States of America, as is testified by the great number of translations made since the middle of the present century, and by other still more important indications of interest. It was Hayley who first attempted an English translation of a small part of the Commedia, limited to the first three cantos of the Inferno, and in terza rima. The Dean has not been able to find it in the edition of Hayley's works in 1778; but it may be seen in that of 1788. In the note to the third Epistle on Epic Poetry, which contains it, Hayley remarks that it is very doubtful how far a translation of the whole poem would be found of interest in England. Attention is also called to the commencing influence of Dante upon English art. Sir Joshua Reynolds painted a head of Ugolino, Blake published a few illustrations from the Inferno; and Flaxman's engravings of subjects from the whole Commedia appeared. Beautiful as these are, it is surprising to find that the Dean prefers them to those of Sandro Botticelli, recently photographed at Berlin from the original drawings. The number of translations in English is very large, and probably many persons now learn Italian solely for the purpose of being able to do the much better thing of reading Dante in the original. Coleridge, Macaulay, Carlyle, and Lord Tennyson may be cited as among the foremost Englishmen upon whom a knowledge of Dante has made the strongest impression; and no such list, however brief it may be, would be complete without including in it the name of Dean Church—"il maestro di color che sanno," at least in England—in the matter of Dante.

In Italy and Germany there has been the same revival, and the latter country especially has contributed a vast contingent to the work of translation and comment. Only it must be noted that the greatest of all names in German literature cannot be associated in the way which would be gratifying with that of Dante, of whom Goethe said, when in Rome in 1787, that the "Inferno was abominable, the Purgatorio doubtful, and the Paradiso tiresome." But he was born too soon to share in the enthusiasm which attended the reviving glory of Dante, although of all poets, from his own love of physical science, he ought to have had the largest sympathy with him. To the labours of Karl Witte Dean Plumptre does no more than justice when he says that no more complete instance can be cited of literary devotion to a single field of work than is afforded by his contributions to the study of Dante. Nor must be forgotten the many important publications of Scartazzini, nor the translation and notes by the late King of Saxony, nor the many other versions and commentaries due to the thoroughgoing industry of Germans.

France is the country to which belongs the honour of having produced the earliest translation of the Commedia. Grangier's version (published in 1596) has considerable merit, and is written in that good old language which was afterwards so cruelly clipped and cramped by the narrow pedantry of the French Academy. During the last generation many valuable additions to the study of Dante have been made by French scholars, among whom Lamennais, Labitte, and Fauriel stand foremost; nor should be forgotten the translation of the Inferno into old French, by Littré, in his latter years.

The Dean continues strong in his belief that Dante actually visited England, and brings forward an additional piece of evidence in the curious ancient clock with moving figures, formerly at Glastonbury, but now belonging to Wells Cathedral, by the sight of which he ingeniously conceives that the simile at the end of Canto 10 of the Paradiso was suggested. But this, and similar supposed proofs, only make it the more difficult to suppose that Dante really ever was in England. For the more numerous and the more remarkable are the things which he is believed to have seen in this country, the more difficult it is to account for his not having himself made any distinct and specific mention of them, so as to leave no doubt as to their having been actually seen by himself.

THREE BOOKS CONCERNING PAINTERS.

MR. VERESTCHAGIN'S autobiographical sketches have been translated into English by Mr. F. H. Peters under the title of Verestchagin; Painter, Soldier, Traveller (London: Richard Bentley & Son). As the author is a painter, we may be justified in classing his Memoirs under the above head, although the book contains very little about painting. Mr. Verestchagin begins in the orthodox way, with some recollections of childhood, and then gives an account of his travels in the Caucasus, Central Asia, and India. After this he comes nearer home, and deals with Russian questions, the Russo-Turkish war, reminiscences of Skobeleff and Turgenieff, and notes on travelling in Russia and Siberia. In his Preface the author points out one of the main defects of his book, when he tells the reader that he "must understand that this is but a collection of notes without any pretensions to literary style—studies, not pictures." Dealing with out-of-the-way experience and treating of countries that are little visited, the book cannot but contain a certain amount of interesting matter. The authors—for Mrs. Verestchagin has written the chapters on India—have failed, however, to make it interesting or agreeable reading. Most readers must have learnt by weary experience that it is possible, by the three stars trick, to bind disjointed notes into an appearance of unity without taking the trouble to fuse them into an artistic and connected whole. This device has been abused in the memoirs, and especially in the account of India, till the reader becomes sick of so many false starts and unconnected paragraphs. It must be confessed, too, that Mr. Verestchagin does not succeed in taking one with him, and making one feel what he felt, and see what he saw, as he does in his pictures. One is sure that the most interesting and most characteristic points of these strange scenes and adventures have been left out, and that the authors have often pitched upon the least telling incidents and details. In India we get tired of disjointed information in paragraphs, and a profusion of little ordinary remarks, such as "My husband shot some hares," 'My husband hunted here," "My husband made a sketch," or "boxed" somebody's ears. On the other hand, we hear little enough of the working of curious customs, such as polyandry, which the authors must have had many opportunities of examining. By far the most interesting part of the book and the best written is the account of the Russo-Turkish war. Mr. Verestchagin bore an active part in many exciting scenes, such as the attack in a torpedo-boat on a steamer in the Danube. Having little imagination, he can make small use of a hint, and requires to have actually gone through an experience in order to be able to write about it or paint it. In conclusion, we must say that for reasons of our own we are prepared to admire the patience and perseverance of any one who can read the whole book through from beginning to end without skipping.

Mr. Hume Nisbet's Life and Nature Studies (London: Sampson Low & Co.) is a rhapsody, the precise object of which it would be difficult to discover, and we may add painful, as that would necessitate an attempt to penetrate the writer's meaning. This, we are convinced, no man will ever do; but we can recommend the book to those phlegmatic natures who like being gently warmed by the evidence of excitement in others. Many people in foggy and fervid England, and more in foggier and fervider Scotland, enjoy being preached at and gushed at and mystified all round, if only the preacher is vague and high falutin' enough in his language. Mr. Hume Nisbet's high-flown discussions on art will be as "Mesopotamia" to such persons. The author has told us that he caught his flux of rhetoric from Mr. Ruskin, but we should have guessed it without his assistance. The malady of eloquence Mr. Ruskin's robust constitution as a writer has been able to resist, even to turn to advantage. Some people thrive better after small-pox, but they have been previously vaccinated. Mr. Nisbet, however, has evidently absorbed the virus of Ruskinism without any previous literary preparation, and it has run through his veins in a quite fatal manner. He is in the delirious stage, has lost his head, and no longer knows what he is saying. After a preface, a short introduction "Andante in a minor key," as they say in musical criticism, he thus bursts into his subject:—"Kneeling before a shrine within which I have placed Nature, and at her feet Research, I deem it a sacred privilege to look upon Turner as my officiating Priest, as Turner chose Claude in his compositions." Now this is one of the tamest sentences in the book. Moreover, it has a verb in it, you know what it means, and so far it is quite remarkable amidst its surroundings. But then Mr. Nisbet was only beginning; he was probably timid; you should see what he can do when he gets into what would be called the "free section" in music. We recommend a description of autumn in the chapter "Trees" (p. 233), and the Vision of St. John at Patmos (p. 145), as samples of what he can do when warmed to his work. The whole chapter called "Aerial Perspective" is very funny in the unexpected leaps made from technical and dogmatic commonplace to the wildest flights of revivalist rhetoric. Putting aside any question of sense or taste, Mr. Nisbet's knowledge of mere grammar is quite insufficient to warrant his public use of the art of writing. No one would wish to be hypercritical when a practical man does his best to make himself understood on his own subject. But when he attempts to pose as a poet and preacher he becomes insufferable, and should be told so. "Will I madden you with parallelograms?" though sufficiently funny, may be regarded as a mere weakness to which many Scotchmen are liable. But, though he refuses to madden us with parallelograms or anything half so definite, Mr. Nisbet drives us wild with sentences which never reach any verb that can bring them into existence, or else, being born, cannot decently end, but become lost, after toilsome wanderings, in labyrinthine caverns of thought. "Ever worshipping Nature as the first, ever holding on by Research as the second, ever remembering Individuality as the third motive of my artistic existence," has no right to stand between two full stops; while as a paragraph it is really a little too inadequate. When a man cannot make the following simple statement in an intelligible fashion he should be too humble to pour out pages of high falutin' which won't parse:—

> Of white, we have various kinds of, the oxide of lead, although flake white is what artists mostly use, as it is superior to the other articles of lead or zinc in oil—Chinese or zinc-white is useful in water colour, as it keeps its white better than lead, although dangerous to mix with other metal tints.

Of dashes and other resources of despair we have "various kinds of" in this book, and they generally fail as pitiably as the one above in accomplishing their desperate purpose.. Now this sort of thing comes by no means from mere carelessness, of which there is plenty in the spelling of proper names, &c., but from a sheer incompetency to express the simplest ideas in decent English.

Grosvenor Notes, edited by Henry Blackburn (London: Chatto & Windus), have become so well known as they came out year by year as to require little comment when they appear in book form. The present collection includes catalogues of the summer exhibitions at the Grosvenor Gallery for the years 1883-4-5-6 and 7. The illustrations of pictures are, for the most part, the work of the artists themselves, and pretend rather to recall the originals to those who have seen them than to run the gauntlet of criticism as independent works of art. The volume cannot fail to be useful as a reference books to artists, critics, and all who may be interested in pictures.

NOVELS.*

BORN in the Purple, the magnificent title applied in days of old to the children of the mighty Emperors of the East, "porphyrogeniti" literally and figuratively, is an imposing heading to a book, but, to be in keeping, requires a work as imposing as its title. Unfortunately this is scarcely the case in the present instance, it being neither more nor less than a silly nineteenth-century version of "the lady of the Strachy" who so fired Malvolio's imagination by her union with "the Yeoman of the Wardrobe." We have the old well-worn situations and the well-known puppets—the lowly-born hero and the "porphyrogeniti," concerning whose "purple" Mr. (should it not be Miss?) Maxwell Fox entertains the most liberal ideas; the 'aughty aristocrats, who grind the poor, insult their tradesmen and their "inferiors" generally, and never pay their debts; the beautiful heroine, sold to pay off her family's mortgages, and rescued by the "man of the people," a transcendent artisan, who, with apparently no art education whatever, paints anonymously pictures that are at once hung on the line at the R.A. (a liberality on the part of the "hangers" of that much-abused body that deserves the widest publicity), and who, though only a working carpenter, contrives to raise indefinite thousands at little over a day's notice; a marvellous foreign hypnotist, who frightens and sets every one by the ears, till he is safely shot out of the way by a fellow-Nihilist, or some such creature; all these and half-a-dozen other well-known figures wander through the story, apparently for no other reason than to show how immeasurably superior is the Socialistic man of the people to the old-fashioned Conservative—religiously called Tory—country gentry. The picture the author presents of society is scarcely a pleasant one, and more suggestive of the pages of the London Journal or the Penny Novelist than of the ordinary country-house life known to commonplace mortals. The only criticism to be passed on Born in the Purple is that of Charles Lamb on the dramatists of the Restoration, that they describe a conventional world, where it would be as absurd to blame the wickedness or vulgarity of the characters as to arraign a sleeper for his dreams; and with this judgment we take our leave of a book that is a tissue of theories as foolish as its facts are delusive, and which would be both mischievous and unwholesome if it were not utterly silly.

Caught by the Tide, a most amusing contrast to its "purple" predecessor, is a book which it would be almost impossible to take seriously, were it not for the naïve belief, evident in every line, that the author has in herself and her Work (with a capital W). In itself the story is not a bad one, and in more practised hands might have been made effective; but, in her anxiety to impress moral truths on her reader, Miss Garland overlays it with such platitudes and high falutin' as to render it wearisome and not seldom ridiculous. The hero, who tells his tale in the first person, is a prig of the first water, with a talent for moral sentiments only second to Joseph Surface, though it is evident his author thinks him a very fine fellow indeed. The best of his adventures is his captivity among the brigands, which is told in far better and more natural English than the rest, and has an air of reality and actual experience about it, in striking contrast to the ordinary lines of the story. Mr. Stanley Delafont is an exceedingly good young man, but he is not amusing, at least intentionally, and we rejoice to think that we are not likely to encounter him in the flesh. But what can one expect of a gentleman who purchases, "at a public auction sale, a pair of lustres, a set of cut-glass saltcellars, a very handsome inkstand, and a fire-screen," as a commencement of furnishing for the home he intends sharing with the lady of his dreams? The eloquence of his diction is not quite in keeping with his grammar, which is decidedly faulty, as the following specimens taken haphazard will show:—"I was afraid to be too pleasant, in case of him bringing up the subject"; "amongst we sober Italians"; "his nightly engagements had kept him sober and absented him from the gaming-table," &c.; while one curious sentence at p. 208 anent a particular view which haunts him everywhere, and contrives (at least as far as we can understand it) to lie "amongst the mace (sic) on the table" of the House of Commons fairly sets any known rules of parsing at open defiance. The lingua franca also that some of the characters seem to fancy to be Italian is too funny for anything. Brigands are not expected to speak pure Tuscan, it may readily be conceded, but to what language such a sentence as "Mais il vendetta" can belong it would be difficult to say. To crown all, the legal complications, of which there are many, are on a par with the grammar, and, if faithfully carried out, would undoubtedly land the next generation of Delafonts in an interminable lawsuit. Still, with all this, the book is harmless, and very likely to the class of readers to which it appeals (persons who, to copy Miss Garland's style, like "the glamour of fiction" as a medium for religious sentiment) may very possibly be welcome.

Major Griffiths's name is sufficient guarantee that The Wrong Road is not likely to follow in the lines of either Born in the Purple or Caught by the Tide, and those who associate his name with an interesting story, well and often excitingly told, will not be disappointed in the present instance. It is yet another version of the efforts to discover a mysterious crime—murder in this case—and the secret is well enough kept to puzzle the reader fully as much as it does the friends and enemies of Colonel St. Evelyn, at any rate till well into the second volume, and even when the innocence of the suspected person is made probable, the interest is well kept up, and no one who has once taken it up will willingly lay The Wrong Road down till the last page is reached. Major Griffiths knows thoroughly the subject he writes of, a life whose sports he has shared, and for whose troubles he has, at all events, a keen sympathy, even if, fortunately for himself, he may have no practical experience of the particular kind he describes; and in consequence his characters speak and act naturally and intelligibly. George Gidding, the soldier servant, is a capital specimen of a capital race, which pessimists tell us will ere long be as extinct as the dodo. His master, Colonel St. Evelyn, is scarcely so sympathetic a character, and the spiteful animosity of little General Wyndham Parker is in consequence all the more natural. By-the-bye, Major Griffiths shows that the old-fashioned elopement from a window and by a ladder is still possible in spite of electricity and steam. The Wrong Road is heartily to be recommended to any one in search of a pleasant companion for a couple of hours' rest and entertainment.

The Dragon of the North, a romance, is yet in another style, a capital story for boys, and not for boys only. It belongs to the class of works with which Fouqué delighted his contemporaries fifty years ago, and Thorstein, the Norse Viking, and Rainulf, the Norman count, might well rank with the German writer's Thiodolf of Iceland or Folko de Montfaucon. There is adventure and fun enough in it to suit the youngsters, while it is as thoroughly wholesome in every way as the most particular parent or guardian can desire. From personal experience we can affirm that the boy to whom Christmas brings The Dragon of the North is not to be pitied, even should skating or other outdoor pursuits be impossible, and nothing be between him and boredom but the adventures of the young novice of Caserta and slayer of the Dragon.

SOME FAMOUS BOOKS.*

MR. SAUNDERS has set himself, or has had set to him, an ungrateful task. The whole of the volume before us, with the exception of a few connecting lines, is made up of quotations. The preface even begins with a quotation from Thackeray, and contains at least a dozen other extracts from poetry and prose, and all in five small pages of large type. If the object of this preface is to keep the reader in the dark as to the contents of the rest of the book, it fully succeeds. Mr. Saunders brings forward a passage in which Thackeray wishes that "a secret history of books could be written." He then goes on to promise us something of the kind. But a diligent search through his seven chapters fails to reveal a single circumstance relating to the writing and publishing of famous books which is not perfectly well known to any one moderately learned in English literature. Mr. Saunders's own style, what little we have of it, is easy and pleasant, but it really forms so inconsiderable a proportion of the whole book that it need not detain us long. "These notes," says Mr. Saunders very truly, "have been garnered from a somewhat desultory, though extended, course of reading and research." The result as a piece of literary patchwork is not inharmonious; and most readers will be glad to find passages which they may have read and forgotten long ago. Of anything really new or original the book is absolutely destitute; it gives no fresh facts as to the great authors named, nor does it add anything to our knowledge of their productions. Nevertheless, and with all these drawbacks, The Story of Some Famous Books is interesting, and essentially entitled to be described as "light reading"; for the volume is small and the print large, and we can open anywhere and turn forward or back as we please. The author's method is strictly chronological. He begins with Chaucer and ends with Lord Tennyson. Otherwise he has no fixed method, and the anecdotes he relates are not chosen with regard to the importance of the author of whom he is just then speaking. There are four pages and a half devoted to Coleridge, nearly three to Audubon, the American ornithologist, about three and a half to Byron, and no less than seven, chiefly of small-type quotation, to Carlyle. About Swift we have only a page, including a quotation from Johnson; but there is not a word about the contemporary effect of Gulliver's Travels, nor any account of Swift's relations with his publishers. Two anecdotes ought not to have been omitted. The one is about Swift's dismissal of the servant who had discovered the authorship of the Drapier Letters; and the other is from his Journal to Stella, in which he says a certain bishop has read Gulliver and pronounced it a pack of lies. In the notes on Milton we expect something about his sale of Paradise Lost, and perhaps something about the first edition and its numerous title-pages. Under Johnson, Mr. Saunders goes at considerable length into the history of the Dictionary, and quotes the description of a Lexicographer. He also quotes the attempted definition of Network:—"Anything reticulated or decussated, at equal distances, with interstices between the intersections"; but he omits the other definition, which is said to have pleased Johnson himself, "a lot of square holes tied together with string." Mr. Saunders quotes a curious anecdote from a magazine as to the origin of Longfellow's Evangeline. The story of the Acadians, and in particular of a girl who was separated from her lover, who passed her life waiting for him, and who found him at length dying in a hospital, when both were old, was told at table by a friend of Nathaniel Hawthorne, who wanted the author of the Scarlet Letter to make a novel of it. Longfellow was much touched by the story, and begged Hawthorne, since he was not going to use it himself, to let him try his hand. One cannot help wishing Hawthorne had treated it instead of the poet. Of Sir Philip Sidney and the Arcadia Mr. Saunders gives us some interesting notes, but they are very vague, if not inaccurate. He tells us that "a few years since there was exhibited before the Archæological Society at Salisbury a copy of the Arcadia." This as the beginning of a story is most exasperating to an exact reader. "A few years since"—why not give the date? "The Archæological Society"—which Archæological Society? There are many, not one of which bears that precise title. The local Society is, or was, "a few years since," generally known as the Wiltshire Natural History Society, archæology being put second among the objects for which it was founded. Furthermore, Mr. Saunders's "there was exhibited" is in itself annoying. Surely he must know to whom this precious copy of the Arcadia belonged. But he does not tell us. It contained a lock of Queen Elizabeth's hair and some manuscript verses by Sidney, which the paper stated he gave "to the Queen on his bended knee A.D. 1573." The hair was soft and bright, of a light brown colour, inclining to red.

MEMORIAL CATALOGUE OF THE FRENCH AND DUTCH LOAN COLLECTION.*

ON the occasion of the Exhibition at Edinburgh we described in two articles the room which Mr. Hamilton Bruce furnished with pictures of the French school of 1830 and of its Dutch following. This gallery is not likely to have been forgotten by those who saw it. A judicious and liberal choice of pictures made the show an exposition of what has been called the Romantic movement in painting. Mr. Bruce's collection, as it was certainly the first public illustration in England of the most important school of the century, unquestionably deserves some memorial and explanatory comment. We are glad to see that this has been offered effectually, and in the agreeable form of a very handsome descriptive Catalogue. Mr. W. E. Henley has provided a full preface on Romanticism, as well as separate notices of each artist. Messrs. W. B. Hole and P. Zilcken illustrate the principal pictures by drawings and etchings; and Messrs. Constable are responsible for the "get up" of the book. The outer dress in which such a work presents itself to the world is of consequence, and this volume makes no beggarly appearance. Binding, lettering, paper, printing, are all of the best; but it is in the proportion of printed page to margin, in the design of initial letters, headings, &c., that the most admirable taste has been shown. The title-page is a model of what such things should be.

* Memorial Catalogue of the French and Dutch Loan Collection, Edinburgh International Exhibition, 1886. Edinburgh: David Douglas. 1888.

Mr. Henley has taken the right view of the task before him, the view imposed on him by the nature of the original Exhibition in Edinburgh. He was peculiarly fitted for the work; his tastes and sympathies lie with this school, and he has done much to direct attention to it by his conduct as editor of the Magazine of Art, and by such independent writings as his biographical notice of J. F. Millet. The school which the Exhibition illustrated represents a mood of the century as thoroughly as does the kindred and contemporary school in literature. It has succeeded, in fact, in expressing with artistic completeness of style the attitude of the modern man towards nature. The work of these Frenchmen was no merely tentative pioneering excursion, but the complete conquest of a novel sentiment. In all the arts a culmination was reached at this time and the labours of a century rounded off. This being so, Mr. Henley is justified in making his "Note on Romanticism" something more than an account of technical processes, something wider than a mere discussion on painting. He has restricted himself neither to one country nor to one art. He has given a bird's-eye view of Europe seething in the fermentation of the new idea. He alludes to the political and social excitements of the French Revolution and the Empire, considering them rather as the nurse than as the mother of tendencies which had their birth in earlier times. His "Note," in fact, includes some reference to every important development of the movement in Literature, Music, Painting, Sculpture, and the Theatre. Nothing so summary, so complete, and yet so short has been written upon the subject. Mr. Henley is ready to concede that too much may be made of the actual local outburst which took place in Paris about 1830. It was a spasm of protestation and revolt. He claims, however, an organic vitality for the slow, widespread growth which had its roots in the past century, and of which the fanaticism of 1830 was only one amongst the many fruits. Romanticism worked constructively as well as destructively, and its principles of reform were laid down before the question became acute over the production of Hernani at the Théâtre-Français in 1830. The position taken up in the "Note" regarding the necessity for a new school may be gathered from a few fragmentary quotations. ". . . As far as art is concerned, the France which was handed over to the Bourbons after Waterloo had the look of so much dead land. As exemplified in the practice of the great artists of the past . . . the classic convention is in the highest degree admirable." "The reverse of the medal is less pleasing in design. The classic convention, it is evident, is as easily abused as it is hard to handle with an approach to perfection." "Given a man of genius who is also a great artist, and we get such results as Cinna . . . given a man of talent who is also an accomplished craftsman, and we have to be content with the pictures of Girodet and the alexandrines of the Abbé Delille." "Classicism, in other words, lay on the arts, not like a bloom, but like a blight." The pretensions of the school and the source of its inspiration are thus neatly indicated:—"The poet's claim amounted to nothing less than the prescriptive right of every artist to be as lawless as Shakspeare."

Mr. Henley has a great deal to say about the subject-matter of the Romantiques of 1830. It was neither quite new nor always valuable. That of the literature came partly from Byron and Scott, that of the painting in some measure from Constable and other artists. In "style" and "technique," at any rate, they were admirable and original. They perfected and completed the expression of the matter which they borrowed from every available source; "if all save their technical achievement were forgotten, the masters of 1830 would still be remembered as great artists." In confirmation of the view that the French Romantiques carried on their revolution chiefly in the wide province of style, we may point out that the title Romantic has often proved a stumbling-block to those who would comprehend the great French school of painting. People do not feel that these corners of fields and streams, with the figures of everyday pastoral life, are really romantic. They think of Doré; they think of sea-caves, spectre-haunted mountains, and enchanted forests. Now, though we can find a few attempts at romantic subjects, especially on the part of the figure painters, it was from treatment, not from choice of subject, that the Romantiques obtained their effects. Many of the classic painters chose subjects much more romantic; but they treated them with conventional stiffness, with a clear delineation of objects, and with a balanced composition. The Romantiques massed their effect in broader groups, and sought out larger silhouettes than those of separate objects. They took up the mysteries of air, of shadows peopled with hints, of the vagueness of space, of the obliteration of contours in effects of light. All this may be seen in the corner of a barn or in a hayfield as well as on an Alp. They taught people to look at nature generally with a romantic eye; they did not add much to the list of romantic subjects.

Though the second of the two main divisions of the prefatory "Note" deals exclusively with painting, much interesting information on the subject may be found in the critical and biographical notices of individual artists. Thirty-seven painters are thus separately spoken of. Corot, Delacroix, Rousseau, Monticelli, Israels and James Maris perhaps with most fulness and judgment. Millet, Courbet, Daubigny, Decamps, Diaz, Dupré, Ingres, Jacque, Legros, Troyon, Vollon, and Matthew Maris are among those treated at some length. Mr. J. M. Swan is the only Englishman whose name figures in the catalogue, and the character of his work and the sources of his education and inspiration certainly justify his inclusion amongst the more modern Romantiques. These well-sketched portraits show a real understanding of the painters, their place in art, and the quality of their work.

The value of this able and spirited review of the Romantic tendency in all the arts, in painting especially, and in the work of particular artists, is greatly enhanced by the excellences of the accompanying illustrations. The reader will find reproductions in black and white from examples of nearly all the masters referred to in the text. By no means every one of the pictures which figured in the original Exhibition have been reproduced. For instance, there were twenty Corots, and we have two etchings and six sketches in the book. Mr. W. B. Hole has done the greatest number. Of fifteen etchings he has done eight, Mr. P. Zilcken six, and Mr. B. J. Blommers one. All the etchings deserve praise. Mr. Zilcken has made a great success with "Landscape with Rocks" (Corot) and "Souvenir de Dordrecht" (J. Maris). As for Mr. Hole, in most of his contributions he has shown a really wonderful talent for entering into the skin of the painter he treats and fetching out, not only his sentiment, but the quality of his style and technique. Mr. Hole's work is always straightforward, unaffected, free from tricks, and in judicious subordination to the manner of his model. Nothing could be simpler etching than "Evening in Normandy," and yet it gives, not only the structure of Corot's picture, but much of its fascination of tone and grace of handling. Again, in "Retour du Troupeau," after Jacque, we see not only the drawing and effect of light, but the distribution of the masses and a suggestion of the bold and sketchy handling. In the transcripts of James Maris's rich "Landscape: Moonlight" and Diaz's liquid sketch "Sunset: Autumn" we seem to appreciate the different brushworks of the artists without losing sight of more important qualities. The conversion, too, of such a chaos of beautiful colour as Monticelli's "Ravine" into something sensible in black and white does Mr. Hole infinite credit. It is a wonder in virtue of what kind of fidelity this representation resembles an original that would seem to depend for its character almost entirely upon colour.

THE CAVALIERS AND ROUNDHEADS OF BARBADOS.*

It is well that we should not forget that the troubles and animosities of the great Civil War in England were reflected in the territories over which she then held sway; and the history of Barbados at this epoch forms a curious episode, and is illustrative of the spirit of the times. Underlying the main question whether King or Commonwealth should be acknowledged, there was also another point at issue—namely, whether the colonies should be under the control of Parliament at all. The plantations or colonies were originally treated as the King's foreign dominions, and not as part of his Kingdom of England. As such, the King often granted them to a proprietor, who was invested with Royal powers, and these provinces virtually became counties palatine. In the time of James I. the attempt of Parliament to interfere in colonial matters was more than once checked as an invasion of the Royal prerogative; and, as business multiplied, it was by a Royal Commission that certain members of the King's Council were nominated "Lords Commissioners for the Plantations." After the rupture with Charles I. the Parliament appointed certain members of their own body as well as peers to act as Commissioners, and in 1650 the Council of State resolved that the whole Council, or any five of its members, should become a "Committee for Trade and Plantations." The Caribbee Islands had been originally granted by James I. to the Earl of Carlisle, who, by his will, settled Barbados for the payment of his numerous debts. His son and successor about 1647 negotiated with Lord Willoughby, of Parham, for a lease of all the profits of the colony for twenty-one years; and, this being effected with the King's sanction, Lord Willoughby took the place of the Earl of Carlisle as proprietor of the colony. He did not, however, proceed to the island till after the execution of Charles, when, it being thought important by the young King's Councillors that the West Indies should be held, he set sail from Holland, and arrived at Barbados in April 1650, where Charles II. had been already proclaimed king. Previous to his arrival the island had been divided into factions; but Lord Willoughby, by his politic conduct and administration, united all parties, except a few staunch "independents" who removed to England, and there stirred up Parliament to action.

In October 1650 a strong fleet was ordered to be equipped for "the Barbados business," under the command of Sir George Ayscue; but its first task was the conquest of the Scilly Isles, which was duly accomplished by June 1651. In the October following Sir George arrived off Barbados with 7 ships mounting 238 guns, and having over 2,000 troops on board besides seamen; he was also accompanied by numerous merchant ships, both English and Dutch. Succeeding details have more of a local than a general interest; Lord Willoughby had a strong force, and disposed his troops to advantage, and though the Admiral more than once effected a landing, he could not make good his position, Continuous messages passed between the two leaders, the one demonstrating the hopelessness of resistance, the other breathing determination to uphold the cause of loyalty and duty. It is probable that ere long some decisive and bloody battle must have been fought, had not the news of the battle of Worcester arrived, confirmed to Lord Willoughby by a letter from his wife, which was forwarded to him by the Admiral. These tidings caused the moderate party in the island again to lift up their heads, and to open negotiations with the fleet. Lord Willoughby tried to heal the breach in his own garrison, but failed; and finding that he could not now trust a great number of his own soldiers, he sent a trumpeter with a demand for a treaty. Commissioners were appointed on both sides; and on January 17, 1652, articles were ratified which contained provisions highly honourable to both parties. These articles were approved and confirmed by Parliament in August 1652, and remain the Charter of Barbados to this day. The third article, which decrees that "no taxes, customs, imposts, loans, or excise shall be laid, nor levy made on any the inhabitants of this island without their consent in a General Assembly," is an early instance in the government of the colonies of the principle of no taxation without representation. It has been steadily adhered to by the Barbadians, and no specious arguments or inducements have hitherto availed to cajole them out of it.

Such, in brief, is the story that Mr. Davis has to tell; but we do not think we can congratulate him very much on his method of telling it. He has drawn on the same authorities, for the most part, as Sir Robert Schomburgk, and has not succeeded in constructing so readable a narrative from his materials as the older historian. From a local or antiquarian point of view, his lists of names are valuable; and it is interesting to note how many of the names of the foremost actors in these stirring scenes—such as Drax, Alleyne, Walrond, Colleton, Searle, Thornhill, Fortescue, &c.—are still well known in the island, either by their descendants or from the estates to which they have bequeathed their names. The book is, however, overladen with notes and disfigured with facetious headings to the chapters; while the mottoes affixed to them are not only commonplace, but often little apposite to the subject-matter.

SOME BOOKS ON IRELAND.*

WE read not many days ago in a Separatist newspaper the expression of a hope that the publication of M. Philippe Daryl's book on Ireland in English would put an end to all attempts to cite foreign writers in general, and M. Daryl in particular, on the side of the Union. Now we ourselves, after reading M. Daryl's book in French, had no doubt of its real, if unconscious, Unionist tendency; and we have, if anything, less doubt after turning it over in English since Mr. Gladstone pronounced his audacious (in the case of a less distinguished person it would be necessary to say his impudent) eulogy on the book as a contribution to the Separatist propaganda. And we should have supposed it absolutely impossible for any honest and intelligent man to read it without at once distinguishing what M. Daryl finds and what he brings. What he brings is no doubt in favour of Mr. Gladstone. He has the serene French conviction that anything done by England must have been wicked, and that, as Ireland has been under English domination for a good many hundred years, she must have been ill treated. He knows that English government, education, religion, and all the rest of it are "in a loomp" bad; he can give, with his French faculty for deduction à perte de vue, original sketches of Irish history which must by some curious confusion have been in Mr. Gladstone's mind when he described Lord Salisbury's correct sketch of it at Dover the other day. He can, out of the same abundant store, tell us that we have only to give (what is not ours) "the Irish land to the Irish tenant," and that if we add a lump sum to enable him to cultivate it, all will be well, and better than well; though what the large number of Irishmen who do not profit by this generosity à la Tupman, will say, M. Daryl does not attempt to forecast. In short, wherever matter of the general kind is concerned M. Daryl delights in setting at nought the foolish notion that synthetic judgments à priori are difficult or impossible. He can synthesize you à priori at once the whole past history and the whole future prospects of Ireland without the least difficulty, even though in the first case his à posteriori knowledge is so remarkably small that he dates Mr. Disraeli's "three profits" forty years back, and makes the receivers the Queen, the landlord, and the farmer. That he covers Mr. Gladstone with praise might have been guessed from Mr. Gladstone's praise of him, for ca' me, ca' thee is the golden rule of Hawarden. It is more interesting that he covers M. Thiers (who sent certain persons to Noumea) with abuse.

Yet M. Daryl's is a very valuable book for all this, and we repeat our hope, expressed some time ago, that every honest and intelligent man ("for another," as George Warrington says in parallel case, the "prescription loses its efficacy") will read it. For M. Daryl is of that rather rare class of persons who, however they may choke their opinion with folly and falsehood, cannot report a fact falsely. The consequence is, that every page of his book where he tells what he has seen gives the lie to every other page of it where he tells what he has thought. From this book alone proof irrefragable might be collected of the very things which Mr. Gladstone and his followers deny—that in large parts of Ireland no rent at all can be paid by such a population living in such a way, and that if no rent were paid ruin would result; that the League tyrannizes over those who can pay and would pay if they were allowed; that the best landlords are as obnoxious to it as the worst; that the real object of the agitators is not rents of any fairness, but getting the land for nothing; that enmity to England is, with greed, the soul of the movement. Persons who like to turn to M. Daryl's fancy history, to his flattery of Mr. Gladstone, to his quack prescriptions for the future, may quote him as a supporter of Parnellism; those who read his book honestly with whatever bias (for we go as far as that) will close it with one simple wish—

> And oh! to see the de'il gae hame
> Wi' the National League before him!

The late Dr. Richey, as the preface to this new and revised (but most inappropriately titled) edition of his lectures on Irish history reminds us, had projected a complete history of Ireland. There are few greater losses among the not usually much-to-be-bemoaned list of books that might have been. For there is at present not merely not such a thing as a good book of the kind, but nothing that even approaches a good book; and Dr. Richey had not a few of the qualities required to produce a very good book indeed. Although he was entirely free from the incomprehensible craze which has always made many Irishmen, and now makes some Englishmen who cannot be called fools, assume offhand that in the long debate between England and Ireland the latter, or anything that called itself the latter, must always be in the right, he was equally free from the opposite error. He recognized fully, what no other historian of Ireland with whom we have ever met has ever recognized fully, that you must judge each proceeding by the general attitude of the time towards similar proceedings. And, though we by no means always agree with his conclusions, we have never detected a single instance in him of wresting, blinking, or garbling his premisses. His knowledge was so wide as to be very nearly exhaustive, and his critical faculty (a faculty which some celebrated historians seem to manage to do without) of a high order. From these lectures we should have expected only one fault that could be called at all serious in a formal history of his—to wit, the possible accumulation of too great a mass of undigested, or only partially digested, material and authorities. It is, however, fair to remember that in lectures originally intended for oral delivery, and dealing with parts only of a subject, a certain excess of illustrative and corroborative material is not wholly out of place; and that the author would probably have proceeded on a different scheme had he carried out his larger plan. Only a very small part of the present volume had been revised by him with a view to that plan before his death; and, as put together by Dr. Kane, it is what is commonly called a "conglomeration"; but it is likely to be an exceedingly useful conglomeration. It goes no further than the plantation of Ulster, and it cannot be said that it is exhaustive of the subject even up to that date. But this, again, is a fault absolutely inseparable from the form which the original work took. A lecture is, if it is a good lecture, necessarily more concentrated on the special subject, as well as more neglectful of the general subject, than a chapter; and it has resulted from this that few reprinted lectures on different parts of a large matter have made good histories of it. This remark might seem at first adverse to Dr. Richey's book. But, as it happens, we possess two chapters of his intended historical résumé of the whole subject, and these are pretty well sufficient to show how good the others would have been. Dr. Richey had that complete disdainfulness of merely mythical history which even yet is the test, and the only test, of a thorough historian. It is curious how, even after the twenty times repeated demonstration of the failure of the methods of Niebuhr, some of our most famous history-writers will persist in writing as if any good could come of the method, which may be thus summed up:—"Gentlemen, the whole of this is either demonstrably false or at least reposes upon a basis of equal untrustworthiness. But, if you please, we will pick out some things, and assume that they are true, though we have no other evidence than that they are told by the same person who tells us things certainly false." In the handling of the main part of his subject Dr. Richey has passed over some matters which, if he had lived to recast his work, he would no doubt have discussed at greater length, and has included lengthy handling of others which he would no doubt have curtailed in the same case. The later part of his work has been more fully treated by Mr. Bagwell in his History of Ireland under the Tudors, but we are not prepared to say that the fuller treatment is the better. On the whole, the present book is the best we know on the history of Ireland from the Conquest (which it would make Dr. Richey very angry to call a conquest, and certainly it was a very Irish one) to the beginning, at least, of the singular experiment of governing Ireland through the Kildare Geraldines. And even later than that period it has one, as far as we know, unique merit. Not one single historian, as we have urged in review after review, except Dr. Richey, has ever condescended to treat Irish history except as something wholly exceptional, and not to be judged by anything else that was happening in any other parts of the world. The Conquest has been treated as if there had been no Norman conquests in France, England, Italy, and where not. The Colonial Government, as we may call for shortness the Government from the twelfth century to the sixteenth, has been treated without a thought of comparison with other Colonial Governments. Men have opened the eyes of horror and the mouth of howling over Smerwick and Island Magee, as if there had been no such things as the Spanish Fury, no such a place as Magdeburg, no such a series of events as the French religious wars. Dr. Richey continuously declines to do this. He is as far as possible from being a panegyrist of English rule; we hardly know an author who within the limits of reason has said harder things of it. But from the great curse of Irish history and Irish politics, the curse which has now swallowed up Mr. Gladstone and the Gladstonian party, the curse of the belief or the make-believe that Ireland and the Irish have been in the past for the worse and ought to be in the present for the better treated in some fashion quite different from the fashion in which any sane man has thought, or would think, of treating other people—he is conspicuously free. And, therefore, we repeat an expression of very sincere regret that he did not live to do the work which he could probably have done better than anyone else.

Miss Lawless's book has, of course, no pretensions to supply the place which is thus left unfilled. The author has prefixed a very modest preface, and, which is not an invariable consequence, has followed it up with a text written in no less modest a temper, but at the same time with plenty of spirit, and without any fear of intimating a decided opinion when a decided opinion is required. The very form of the book, however, precludes the possibility of original investigation, of elaborate discussion of doubtful points, or of judicial criticism of previous writers. What is wanted for a "Story of the Nations," if a Story of the Nations is wanted at all, is, we suppose, a clear and bright narrative, based on sufficient acquaintance with the best general authorities, written without partiality, and going sufficiently, but not too much, into detail. Miss Lawless has supplied this want remarkably well; better indeed we think, on the whole, than any contributor to the series. Her chief, if not her sole, fault is a certain haste either in originally writing or in revising for press. It would not be impossible to pick out examples of very dubious grammar; and misprints, sometimes only to be called misprints by a little charity, are numerous. "Alcansar" supplies, indeed, a bad sort of rhyme to "Drawcansir"; and some of the fighters at the Battle of the Three Kings, Stukely especially, were rather Drawcansirish. But still the accepted designation of the battle is Alcasar or Alcazar. We write "Maltese," but not "Galtese," and, though we know what a caladium is and a palladium and a palatium, we do not know what a "Paladium" is; and, if it is a misprint for the "ll," we are still unable to understand what is meant by calling Maynooth Castle "the pal[l]adium of the Geraldines." These are small matters, however, and can be very easily set right. No setting right is wanted in the more important points. The narrative is fluent and interesting, bringing out picturesque points without too much devoting itself to them, supplying most details that it is really important to know, and coming as near as may be to complete impartiality. We think, indeed, that Miss Lawless is not just either to Mountjoy or to Strafford; but this very fact ought to testify in her favour, inasmuch as it shows that she has striven to be just to both sides. But she can surely not know Mountjoy's whole history, or she never would have called him unchivalrous. He was a brave soldier, one of the truest of lovers, one of the most loyal of subjects; and, if these three things do not make chivalry, the devil is in it. But Mountjoy's name is only less of a red rag to sentimental Hibernian patriots than the names of Strafford and of Cromwell himself; and, though Miss Lawless has far too much sense, knowledge, and honesty to be a Hibernian patriot, she is sometimes a little touched with the amiable weakness of making too much allowance for Hibernian patriotism. Her book is, however, all the more valuable, as it cannot be accused of B. B. B. proclivities.

Mr. Hogan's Irish in Australia is the kind of book of which we, at least, are always very loth to say anything but good. It is as warm-hearted, as illogical, as deficient in the sense of proportion and strict accuracy, and as overflowing with generous clannishness, as Irish books not of the worst class often are. But it does, we doubt not, no more than justice to many worthy people who might miss their due meed without some such a book, and its shortcomings can be easily forgiven.

SIR JOHN MANDEVILLE.*

In the British Museum alone, according to Mr. Ashton's little bibliography, twenty-two manuscripts and eighty-three printed editions, of various tongues and dates, form a pretty array of testimony to the world's estimate of Sir John Mandeville. And an excellent world it was that so valued the incomparable book of Sir John's "voiage and travayle," let Colonel Yule complain as he may of the very bad second Marco Polo made in the race for popular favour. To attribute this result to the superiority of the Englishman in the art of lying is unjust to Marco Polo. The question is capable of a more philosophic settlement, without impugning the honesty of either writer. Two reasons induced Mr. Ashton to edit Mandeville; the non-existence of a good illustrated edition, and the lapse of time since the publication of a popular version. He desired an edition, exclusively English, that should preserve a judicious mean between modernization destructive of the spirit of the original, and an archaic text that might repel the uninstructed. For this purpose he required a good English text with the original English woodcuts, and these he has reproduced from a reprint of Pynson's unique quarto in the Grenville library, the language of which is slightly but not injuriously modernized. Pynson's book, the source of Mr. Ashton's text, is without a date, but it belongs probably to the last decade of the fifteenth century. If anything could revive the ancient popularity of Sir John Mandeville it is Mr. Ashton's volume, with its excellent text, its ample, perhaps too abundant, annotation, and the admirable facsimile reproductions by the editor of the original curious woodcuts. The neglect of Sir John Mandeville in these days of much reprinting is not a little astonishing. Mr. Ashton inclines rather to mercy than justice when he describes previous modern versions as "bald in the extreme," and we entirely agree with him in regarding a reprint without the woodcuts as altogether undesirable. Mr. Ashton's book is anything but bald. Most readers will find its annotation excessive, though the editor may urge that this, if an error, is excusable in a book intended to be "read by all." Much, however, depends upon what is a fair estimate of the average intelligence of "all who read" and are likely to be attracted to the book. Among them, we imagine, would be none who does not possess some acquaintance with Elizabethan or pre-Shakspearian literature. There should be no need to explain such common words as "lewde," "fell," "deme," "Alkaron"; or geographical references like "Cesarye Phylyp," "Gabaon and Rama," "Cedron," "Acheldemack, that is to say the field of bloude." "The prophet Machabe" surely requires no note, and no reader of Chaucer wants the key to "the kingdom of Surry." Numerous other instances might be cited where the context clearly relieves the odd spelling of the necessity for annotation. On the other hand, there are occasional demands upon Mr. Ashton's ingenuity and scholarship with which he has not complied.

If the neglect of Sir John Mandeville be surprising, more extraordinary is the general misapprehension of his book. He has become himself something of a reproach among the many who know his name and not his work. He is, indeed, nothing but a name to a multitude—a name proverbially associated with an unenviable distinction, a name which ignorant prejudice and the stupidity of dullards have visited with gross injustice, making it synonymous with lying, and his book a mere collection of fables and impostures. Even Mr. Ashton, who does excellently in his Introduction by attempting to rescue the good knight and his work from the shadowy limbo to which they have long been confined, is content to leave his reputation with the reader, doing nothing to re-establish the bona fides of his chronicles. Intent on the attractive task of proving that Mandeville lived and wrote and died, Mr. Ashton is silent anent the very considerable evidence in the book itself of the author's virtuous moderation and truthfulness. Something in this direction was certainly to be expected in a popular edition to be read by all, though for our part we must confess an indifference to the inquisitorial spirit now active among critics. That Sir John Mandeville was born at St. Albans as he declares, and was buried at Liége, as seems probable, we care neither to affirm nor to deny. Such matters enter not into the metaphysics of true belief. But that he was the author of his own book, and a man of great parts and honesty, and a most fascinating writer, are sufficing elementary tenets of our faith. Nevertheless, to return to our position, it is a pity Mr. Ashton should not have clearly distinguished, in the interests of his readers, between the veracity of the author and the verity of his book. He repeats nothing but a dangerous half-truth when he asserts, "No one who reads the book can altogether trust his absolute verity." Again, he says he was led to edit a good text "dearly loving Sir John Mandeville, in spite of his romancing," which is as if one should love something in spite of that which is its very salt of virtue. There yet remains good reason for discrimination here, even if Mr. Ashton meant by "romancing" only the tissue of old wives' tales common throughout Europe at the time, which forms but a portion of Mandeville's book. No more than this, we hope, is inferred by Colonel Yule when he spoke of the "lying wonders" of our traveller. And what does this amount to? No more than this, that if Sir John Mandeville lied, he lied with Herodotus and Pliny. He merely repeated marvels more or less generally received by everybody in Europe. When there is a sound reason for doubt, who can be more persuasively candid and cautious? We would that all travellers had been as scrupulous and one-half as entertaining. When he describes the ruined Paradise of Eden does he declare with hand on heart it is not of his own brave seeing? His love of wonders is but portion of his romantic and genial nature, not uncommon in an age of faith. Even when he deals with miracles and saintly relics, though it is in the spirit of a devout Catholic, his regard for truth is conspicuous, as when he remarks of the legendary history of John the Baptist, "Some say that Saincte Jhon's hedde is at Amiens, in Pycardy, and some say it is Sainte John's head the byshop. I wot not, but to God it is knowne." His topography and geography are really excellent if we consider the times he lived in. All those portions of his voyage that treat of the Holy Land, "of Jericho and other things," of the "way towards Hierusalem," "a little of Adam and Eve," and how "thorow the wildernesse" one may go to the sea that "casteth out a thing that men call aspatum as great pieces as a horse," together with the greater part of his Scriptural illustrations, are but little removed from the very explicit and interesting experiences of later travellers, such as the ingenious and learned Dr. Shaw. The exactitude required of an eighteenth-century traveller in Barbary and Palestine is of quite another measure from that expected of Sir John Mandeville, and is absolutely independent of the writer's veracity. And so is it with Marco Polo and Mandeville. The world of the former was much larger; knowledge was much less restricted. Yet it would not be hard to decide who is the greater romancer, in the corrupt sense of the word, from a comparison of Marco Polo's account of Manzi and the Englishman's chapter on the "Kingdom called Mancy," or of Mandeville's description of the "dry tree" and Marco Polo's arbre sec. Marco Polo saw these and other wonders, such as the rope-climbing juggler who vanished in the heavens, while Mandeville reports them for the most part from hearsay. Apart from the vaguer Orient which he somewhat riotously depicted, we may generally trust Mandeville, not doubting that he relates personal experiences, when he expressly says so, as in the adventure with the "Soudan" of Babylon and the great prince's daughter whom he might have wed for his apostasy.

As we, like Mr. Ashton, love Sir John Mandeville, it were much more pleasurable to deal with his book in another spirit than that dictated by the limitations of a popular edition. But the duty, though painful, is imperative. Far more easy and delightful would it be to roam through "antres vast and deserts idle," or in the realms of Prester John or the Great Can, tasting the true romance which is the very soul of the book, undisturbed by the profane quibbles of tedious commentators and scientific geographers. These joys are free to the wise readers of Mr. Ashton's edition. With a good and quaint text we have even quainter illustrations. Both demand grateful recognition, as together they form a most admirable book and by far the best edition available to the English reader. The woodcuts in the text and an appendix of illustrations from other sources are marvellously graphic. It would be difficult, indeed, to overrate their illustrative force and conscientious adherence to the text. The man roasting fish "agaynst the sonne"; Abraham and Isaac at the altar, with a ready ram like a child's toy; the figure of that noble beast of chace, the Pampeon; the unutterable drawing of the dragon of Satha; the pleasing and unashamed natives of Lamory—these are but a few examples of warm fancy and spirited execution. Here is a pendant Judas, delivered of his soul by a winged devil whose face is as the face of a mild and spectacled doctor in philosophy. A variant in the appendix shows a white devil with a blackened face and claw-hammer feet. As for the folk with eyes on their shoulders, the man with the great foot, the dog-headed people, the irresistible two-headed goose, and the man whose one eye is in "the middest of his front"—these grotesques defy translation into language, except the language of Mandeville. The journal of Odoricus, the Minorite friar, whom Mr. Ashton rightly regards as the probable "felawe" of Mandeville's voyage, though in the main iterative, is included by the editor.

DEVONSHIRE PARISHES.*

THIS volume contains notes on the antiquities and family history of fourteen of the twenty-eight parishes of the Archdeaconry of Totnes that will be included in the complete work. Mr. Worthy treats his subject, on the whole, in a scholarly fashion, for the most part gives references to his authorities, and presents the results of his investigations in a clear and business-like form. Each parish is dealt with in a single chapter, a short account is given of its general history, the church and any other buildings of interest are described fairly, though with no evidences of special architectural knowledge, and the genealogies and fortunes of the families of the principal landowners are carefully drawn out. The chapter on Bickleigh contains the history of the family of "Colonel Slanning, one of "the four wheels of Charles's wain," who fell at the siege of Bristol in 1643. Under the headings "Walkhampton" and "Buckland Monachorum" we have a careful piece of genealogical work on the descendants of Gilbert, Count of Eu, a kinsman and one of the guardians of the Conqueror in his childhood, from whom came the first line of the Earls of Devon. Buckland has, however, associations of wider interest even than the deeds of the turbulent Earl Baldwin, who held Exeter Castle so long against Stephen, and of whom, by the way, more might have been told than will be found here; for the Abbey of Buckland was granted to Sir Richard Grenville, who turned the church into a dwelling-house, and after his heroic death, it was sold to Sir Francis Drake, and relics of Drake are preserved there. The central tower of the church still stands, and "its arches may be seen in a room in the upper part of the dwelling." Mr. Worthy falls into a common error, first, we believe, exposed by Dr. Drake, in saying that Camden states that Sir Francis was born "of mean parents." He knows that Drake was a gentleman by birth, for he points out that he was undoubtedly entitled to use the "wyvern, cadenced with a mullet," as a descendant from the house of which Barnard Drake of Ash was then the head, and he, therefore, appears to think that Camden must have called his parents "mean" on account of their poverty. He forgets that Camden wrote in Latin, and that mediocris is not to be translated by "mean" in the sense that the word commonly bears now. Excellent as his work generally is on all purely local matters, he does not exercise the same care when dealing with general history as he does on questions of small account. It is strange to find an elaborate confusion between two Counts of Flanders in the pages of a genealogist, and Mr. Worthy should have known better than to accept the silly story about the love of Matilda for Brihtric, and the spretæ injuria formæ that is said to have caused the ruin of the rich Englishman. Moreover, though the wife of Duncan of Scotland was the kinswoman (consanguinea) of Siward, she was not, as far as we know, his "daughter," and Macbeth certainly did not fall in battle with the earl, for he was not slain until about three years after Siward's death. The name of Judhel, lord of Totnes, ought to have shown that he was not a "Norman," and a writer on West-country antiquities should have seen that the settlement of Breton adventurers in a Celtic district of the conquered land—for Judhel was not the only man of his race that held lands in Devonshire—is a point worth noting. The local antiquary is always over-prone to believe that the town or village on which he is writing was the scene of events of national importance, and Mr. Worthy puzzles us by announcing that, "according to William of Malmesbury and others," William Rufus sailed from Dartmouth in 1099 to avenge the loss of Le Mans, and so was "probably following his favourite pastime on Dartmoor" when he heard that Helias had made himself master of the city. This statement possibly comes from a corrupt following of some county historian, who referred to William of Malmesbury as the authority for the Red King's saying on the occasion, and imported Dartmouth into the story out of his own imagination; for William of Malmesbury does not mention Dartmouth. Orderic says that the King was at Clarendon and was going forth to hunt in the New Forest when he heard the news, and we learn from Waco and Gaimar that he sailed from Southampton. Carelessness of this kind is likely to make the reader distrust Mr. Worthy's work on matters about which it is not so easy to test his accuracy, such as the genealogy of county families. We believe that this would be unjust to him, and that he has spared no pains to be accurate about the genealogical questions that immediately concern his subject. He would, however, do well to remember that the local historian cannot afford to neglect the sources of English history. In preparing his second volume he should also be more vigilant in correcting for press.

* Devonshire Parishes. By Charles Worthy, Esq., late H.M. 82nd Regiment. 2 vols. Vol. I. Exeter: William Pollard & Co. London: George Redway.

NEW PRINTS AND PHOTOGRAPHS.

THE first number of the new serial, Men and Women of the Day (Bentley & Son) supplies a full assurance that the caricaturists are not to have the field of popular portraiture to themselves, which they may be said to have long enjoyed, seeing how little removed from intentional travesty are many of the cheap process reproductions from photographs of well-known persons that appear in the illustrated press. The new venture is of a comprehensive kind. It aims at the production of a complete gallery of portraits by Mr. Herbert Barraud of distinguished persons of every profession or calling, accompanied by brief biographical notices. The first instalment comprises portraits of Lord Hartington, Miss Mary Anderson, and Cardinal Newman. Excellent as likenesses, these photographs are of remarkable technical quality. They may be retained with the letterpress for binding, or detached for framing—a purpose to which they are admirably adapted, as they measure some ten inches by seven, a scale that realizes the happy mean between littleness and excess. To judge from the portrait of Miss Mary Anderson, actors and actresses will be represented in Men and Women of the Day not as they appear on the boards or in the effulgence of artificial light, but like good ordinary folk in honest daylight. This sound rule ought to be rigidly followed if the promise of vigour and veracity of presentment notable in these first examples is to be fulfilled to the end.

From Messrs. Gladwell Brothers we have received two effective etchings by Mr. Ralph Piercy, after Mr. Parsons-Norman, whose studies in landscape of the Norfolk Broads are tolerably familiar to visitors to those inland waters. "The Landing Stage, Ormsby Broad," is a skilful rendering of foliage and water, under the brisk influence of breeze and sunshine. The foreground, with its impending trees, and wooden landing flecked with sun and shadow, is noteworthy for the sound reticence of the artist's treatment of detail. The companion plate, "Fritton Broad," if less spirited and less expressive in line, possesses the charm of freshness to be looked for in an impression derived directly from nature, which is not often retained in reproduction.

From the Typographic Etching Company we have a reproduction of a landscape by P. H. Emerson—a hayfield or harvesting—by a process that seems allied to photo-engraving rather than to etching, yet possessing decided individuality, and capable of effects of light and atmosphere which the present example shows may be suggestive and pleasing. Here the figures of the labourers and the laden wain are realized with considerable fidelity to the conditions of light and air that constitute a vague glimmering environment. The charm of tranquillity that belongs to mild diffused light and spacious windless atmosphere can scarcely have suffered by translation in this instance. No process yet invented is perfect, but this should certainly have a career in the future that will command attention.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THOSE who have heard of actions and rumours of actions by M. Guy de Maupassant in reference to the preface of his Pierre et Jean (1) may be surprised and perhaps disappointed to find it nothing but an exercise in purely literary criticism; in fact, a repetition of the old Hugonian plea that the artist is not to have rules prescribed to him, but is only bound to furnish good work on his own specification, if we may use the building term. M. de Maupassant does not show himself quite so deft a critic as he is a good poet and novelist; but that matters little. Indeed, his chief plea is for Realism, not as it is, but as against Analysis, and in that quarrel, as Colonel Talbot says in Waverley, we are quite content to say "Fight dog, fight bear." The novel to which this dissertation is prefixed is quite another matter, and is the most ambitious effort M. de Maupassant has yet made. Except that its donnée turns on the inevitable adultery (which is, however, twenty years old), there is nothing of the usual objection to the author's work in it, and there is not a situation, and hardly an expression, "calculated to raise a blush." The plot is simple. A bourgeois family, living in the modest retirement so dear to the French bourgeois at Havre, suddenly learns that a fortune has been left by an old Parisian friend to the second son, a promising, steadygoing, rather chuckle-headed lawyer. The elder son, who has far greater talents but is something of a rolling stone, is at first only a little envious of his brother's good luck in money, and a little jealous of certain other good luck in love which it seems likely to give him. But these feelings are crystallized suddenly into a much more terrible passion by the suggestion independently made to him in chance phrases by an old Polish chemist and by a girl at a brasserie, that this singular windfall shows a criminal relation between his mother and the testator. The whole central part of the book is devoted to showing how this notion—too true a one, as the reader guesses—works like poison in Pierre's brain, and embitters his life, till at last he breaks out in a frantic burst of denunciation addressed to his brother and heard by the unfortunate woman. This is practically the end of the book; for Pierre's exile as a doctor on board ship, leaving the placid Jean to rather discreditable prosperity, is a mere postscript. The earlier part of the volume requires a certain amount of attention to fix the reader's interest; but, this once fixed, the result is not doubtful. Detached passages of description are in M. de Maupassant's best way, and some of them—the Channel fog and Pierre's night sojourn on the breakwater during it, the prawn hunt, and others—show realism at its best, and might be used as a text to contrast with M. Zola's attempts in the same line. The mere writing is excellent; indeed, none of the younger Frenchmen can touch M. de Maupassant there. Some of the minor characters, especially Mme. Roséinilly, Jean's bride, may be thought to be left rather too much in outline, and the mother wants a few more touches to set her quite "right." But Pierre, the central figure, is completely and admirably made out; and, on the whole, we have no hesitation in pronouncing Pierre et Jean the strongest French novel since Julia de Trécœur, if not since Madame Bovary.

M. Liégeard's Côte d'azur (2) is a slightly belated Christmas book of elaborate composition, describing the Riviera from Marseilles to Genoa. M. Liégeard, we really think, is the most "coruscating" writer with whom we have the honour of being acquainted. Imagine Mr. Sala sewn into the skin of Mr. Symonds, Mr. Frederick Myers Siamesely yoked to Professor Dowden, and you shall hardly be prepared from all the four for such a wealth of adjective and allusion, such a perennial stream of metaphor and periphrasis, as M. Liégeard produces. A steam-engine is a "Hippogriff of fire"; when a new cathedral is opened "La France catholique, oriflammes [where is she going to get them?] au vent, viendra s'agenouiller devant le parvis de ses onze chapelles." But M. Liégeard—a point in which he has the advantage of most of our adjective-spillers—does not seem to take himself too seriously, and is lively, which cannot be said of any one mentioned above, except Mr. Sala. As for the illustrations of the book, they could hardly be better, and form a complete gallery of the district.

Of the two books before us, there is not much to say about M. Calais's exercise book (3), which is adapted to a particular grammar (that of Eve and Baudiss), and consists merely of collections of short sentences, with longer extracts below. These last appear to have been—though we do not positively know that they are—translated from the French, which we do not think a good plan; but this is a matter of opinion. M. Fasnacht's book (4) is very good. Its title led us to fear that most detestable thing, a "key"; but it has none of the objectionable features of that abomination, and might with great advantage be put into pupils' own hands. The remarks on pronunciation, especially on the mute "e" and on liaisons, are about the best we have seen, and the section of "synonyms" (or rather of equivocal terms) is excellent.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE nature of Mr. Edmund Gurney's reprinted essays on disputed questions in ethics and art—Tertium Quid (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.)—is tolerably well indicated by the title. Not that Mr. Gurney, as an intermediary between extreme views, invariably suggests a peaceful solution of the questions discussed by indicating an acceptable via media to hot disputants. Ranging between hostile camps in an ill-explored debatable land, he may be said to harass both parties alike in his essay on Wagner and Wagnerism, and leaves the reader in an uncomfortable incertitude. This indeterminate character was perhaps to be predicated of the essays from the title, though the object of a writer who engages two combatants simultaneously might well have been a little more deadly. A triangular duel is impossible in controversy and unsatisfactory in any circumstances. Mr. Gurney assists at sundry duels, not as a second, but as a third. He enjoys the power of selecting weapons, assigning positions, placing his men; and, though he shows scrupulous fairness in exercising these pleasing prerogatives, there is necessarily a good deal of unreality in the proceedings. That he makes a shrewd thrust now and again must be conceded, especially when he comes between Mr. Matthew Arnold and Mr. Alfred Austin, though we feel that neither of these critics shows his genuine cunning of fence, being incapacitated by the peculiar conditions of the game. Thus there is little bloodshed, and things remain much as they were.

A larger fund of anecdote might reasonably be looked for in Dr. G. B. Hill's Wit and Wisdom of Samuel Johnson (Oxford: Clarendon Press), though this alphabetical selection is skilfully compiled and forms a useful book for reference. The half of such a book might have been arranged under the heading "Anecdote," though it would in this case have lost its distinctive form, which pleasantly recalls the amusing Poetical Dictionary of a hundred years ago. Mindful of the wit and wisdom of Johnson's story of the lady and the grotto, we have searched Dr. Hill's dictionary of Johnsoniana for the heads "Grotto" and "Toad" only to be disappointed. Possibly the anecdote is included, like many others, equally good. It is curious how frequently a first consultation of books of this class proves useless.

To turn to a new edition of The Court of Session Garland (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.) is a not unnatural transition, if only for the contributions of the Boswells of Auchinleck to this storehouse of legal skits and parodies. This is a well-printed volume, with exhaustive annotation.

Samantha at Saratoga (Sampson Low & Co.) professes to be "a brilliant, humorous take-off" of Society at the fashionable American watering-place by "Josiah Allen's Wife," who relates how she and her husband left their rural retreat at Jonesville and became summer boarders at what the school-teacher of their village, "a young man with long small lims, and some pimpley on the face," calls the "most noted spah on this continent." The spelling employed by the author is suggestive of Artemus Ward; the style recalls Mrs. Brown not a little, with a flavour of vulgarity that is quite original. The innocence of these two elderly provincials is almost as amazing as the author's notions of humour. To mistake a statue in a public park, or the figure of Aunt Sally in the well-known game, for living persons may possibly appear fresh and irresistible humour in a young and vigorous country like America. Most people even in that high-toned land will probably think it is not humorous, but rather stupid, and decidedly vulgar in Samantha Allen to say of her error concerning the statue, "she wuzn't a live, meat woman, but a statute." There is humour in Miss Holley's sketches of Saratoga fashions, but it is very thinly laid out in some four hundred pages, and marred by passages even more deplorable than these. It is incredible that a good and thoroughly human specimen of the American woman and an inexperienced rustic should parody a well-known Scriptural text as she does in the chapter on "Dog-Worship" (p. 278). Mr. Opper's drawings are frequently full of smartness and point, the slighter sketches being especially clever.

To judge from the thrilling experiences narrated in Brooke Anstruther's Two Tales Told by a Sensitive (Edinburgh: Grant & Son), it must be exceedingly trying to be a "Sensitive" or to be connected with a person so mysteriously gifted. People who already fear to become the thrall of some subtle-souled mesmerist, or believe in premonitions and "airy tongues" that hint of discoverable secrets, may snatch a fearful joy and establish their faith by reading this little book.

The Theatre Annual, edited by Mr. Clement Scott (Stage Office), comprises a variety of short stories, verses, and reminiscences by actors and actresses, the last of which are especially appropriate at the present season. The contents of the miscellany are the work of many hands, and as full of brightness and diversion as of variety. The editor contributes a lyrical interlude, arranged in scenes; a graceful romance for children, told in stanzas of melodious form and dainty fancy. A story by the late Mr. Palgrave Simpson should attract a multitude of readers. In addition there may be mentioned stories by Mrs. Bernard Beere, Miss Grace Hawthorne, Mr. Wilson Barrett, Mr. Harry Nicholls; the lyrics from the Ballad-Monger; a patter song by Mr. Charles Collette; and several short papers by members of the profession that are certain to interest an inquisitive public.

We have received The Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, an historical study, by E. D. Warfield (Putnam's Sons); Dr. Dorner's System of Christian Ethics, translated by Professor C. M. Mead, D.D., and the Rev. R. T. Cunningham (Edinburgh: Clark); The Vision of a Passion; and Other Poems,* by T. Folliott (Wyman); Cecily's Birds, illustrated by F. "A LETTER was received from Mr. H. S. Parker, acknowledging the receipt of the samples of tea. He had lettered the samples, and sent them to Messrs. Hawes and Hertz, who had kindly tested them. The report of the testing was then opened, and it was found that the sample marked G, at 1s. 6d. per lb., was the 'best value at the price.' The Rev. S. B. Burnaby then asked for the name of the firm tendering sample G.—The Chairman: 'Messrs. Barber & Co., of Regent Circus.' The result was considered to be extremely satisfactory, as the sample supplied by Messrs. Barber was taken from the stock already supplied by them."—The Metropolitan, April 3.

"AND OTHER UNIVERSITY MEN."

IT would be grossly unfair to so loyal, patriotic, and intelligent a corporation as the University of Cambridge to hold it corporately responsible for the vagaries of a few vain or self-seeking members of its household. The best and wisest of mothers may have children who continue to deserve the rod long after they have passed the age at which it can be administered to them; and the [illegible]a Mater who stands in this relation to the unworthy sons by whom she was publicly put to shame last Tuesday night in the Guildhall at Cambridge deserves compassion rather than blame. But though she does not deserve the discredit which they have succeeded in attaching to her, she will have to bear it nevertheless. It is true that the meeting held at the time and place in question was got up by the Liberal Association of the town of Cambridge, and that the University, as such, had of course nothing to do with it. But the attempt so studiously made to represent Mr. DILLON as in some sense the guest of the University cannot, we fear, be pronounced altogether unsuccessful. It was by his academical, and not by his civic, supporters in that town that he was lodged, entertained, and mainly supported on the platform; and, though every one who knows anything of the particular persons who figured as his entertainers and backers may have pretty accurately measured their claim to represent the learned body to which they belong, it would be vain to look for such knowledge or its resulting estimate among the general public. They, it is to be feared, are only too likely to be impressed by reading in their newspapers that Mr. DILLON was supported, not only by Professor STUART, M.P. (who has, indeed, been already classified for them by an eminent man of science, and whom they have perhaps by this time learnt to appraise correctly enough), but also by "Dr. JACKSON, of Trinity; the Rev. "T. J. LAWRENCE, Deputy Professor of International Law; "Mr. OSCAR BROWNING, of King's College; Dr. WALDSTEIN, "and other University men." The ordinary newspaper reader does not and cannot know that this last-named gentleman has, in any other than a merely complimentary sense, about as much right to be called a member of the University as the librarian of the House of Commons has to be described as a member of Parliament. He does not and cannot know that the only name of any weight whatever in the foregoing list is that of an academical notability who was probably as much disconcerted as his best friends at the company in which he found himself. And, though the ordinary newspaper reader may, and perhaps does, remember that Mr. OSCAR BROWNING has given public evidence of his lack of judgment and discretion, it i[illegible]not probable that those positive qualities which woul[illegible]duce him, politics altogether apart, to court notoriety[illegible]patron of Irish agitators are equally well known t[illegible]e world at large.

No doubt it may be said that mere familiarity with the political record of Professor STUART should have been sufficient to prepare the public even for such an exhibition as that of Tuesday night. No doubt they might have been expected to argue that the inordinate vanity and the inflamed partisanship which are Professor STUART's chief impulses to action could hardly be without other examples in the University to which he belongs, and which might, therefore, claim to be dissociated as much from them as from him. Those, however, who have cherished this expectation take too little account of the broad distinction which Englishmen have hitherto been wont to draw between the professional politician and the academic dignitary. They regard the latter, when he deliberately descends to the adoption of the trade of politics, as distinctly déclassé; but, so long as he abstains from actual participation in that demoralizing pursuit, they have not yet learnt to rid themselves of the notion that he approaches the political questions of the day fr[illegible] a higher standpoint than that of the political partisan. They cannot be expected to be aware of the deplorable extent to which som[illegible] the worst vices and vulgarities of modern manners have a[illegible]d even the ancient seats of learning, and how destructi[illegible] they have proved to the old-fashioned traditions of academic dignity and reserve. And this is only another way of saying that when the public see such names as that of "Dr. JACKSON, of Trinity," "The Rev. T. J. "LAWRENCE, Deputy Professor of International Law," or even of "Mr. OSCAR BROWNING, of King's College," there is much danger lest they should draw a widely erroneous inference from the presence of these eminently respectable persons on a platform by the side of Mr. DILLON. Having no means of knowing from personal intercourse with the latter-day University don that he is often just as helplessly enslaved as the pettiest provincial wirepuller or his silliest dupe to those motives which impel men to associate themselves unhesitatingly with unworthy political allies and disreputable political causes—having had no means, we say, of acquainting himself with these tendencies of the latter-day don, the newspaper reader of the less instructed and independent type (which is the commonest example of him) will be apt to suppose that the cause which has obtained such support must, after all, be less unworthy, and association with its professional champions less discreditable, than he had formerly imagined. In other words, he is in danger of saying to himself that, if the Deputy Professor and the gentleman from Trinity, and the other academic respectabilities, do not mind rubbing shoulders publicly with Mr. DILLON, the conclusion ought to be, not that they are less respectable than he had believed them to be, but that Mr. DILLON and Mr. DILLON's cause are more so.

This, of course, is precisely the impression which such demonstrations as that of last Tuesday are designed by the cunning intriguers who get them up, and entrap simpletons, learned or other, into assisting them, to produce. They ardently wish it to be believed that Mr. JACKSON and the rest of them have elevated their Parnellite protégé by their patronage, instead of having merely lowered themselves, and indirectly their University, by posing as his patrons. It is the duty, therefore, not only of every one well affected to the cause of the Union, but of every one who would wish to rescue a venerable institution from further discredit, to point out to his countrymen that it is the latter and not the former of the above consequences which have followed from the recent proceedings at Cambridge; that Mr. DILLON and his cause have not been in the slightest degree elevated by association with these academic persons, but that it is themselves and their University which they have degraded by association with Mr. DILLON and his cause. For the present, however, we will leave the cause out of the question. We must concede to Mr. JACKSON and the Deputy Professor of International Law the right claimed by more eminent men of endeavouring the dismemberment of their Empire and persuading themselves that the process is one of "consolidation." Indeed, the latter gentleman has a professional interest in that policy; for if boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem, it may be the part of a good Professor of International Law to enlarge the domain of his "subject" by making two nations out of one. We will say nothing, then, of Mr. DILLON's cause. But who and what is Mr. DILLON himself? Mr. DILLON is a man whom, on no other ground that we can discover except that he is thin and pale and passionate of speech, while his more prominent colleagues are for the most part plump and rubicund and merely noisy of spout, his Radical admirers are endeavouring to pass off upon their countrymen as a patriot of the poetic type. He is fondly supposed by the weaker-minded among these to represent the ideal leader, whose chivalrous, if misguided, devotion to the Nationalist cause invests an enterprise disfigured by many sordid and ignoble associations with its solitary gleam of romance. No conception of the case could more ludicrously caricature it. As a matter of fact, this interesting-looking person has done more than any one of his colleagues, with perhaps the single exception of Mr. O'BRIEN, to unfit the cause of Irish Nationalism for the espousal of honest men. As deeply involved as any other of the leading Parnellites in moral complicity with Irish-American crime, Mr. DILLON has been far more active than any of them in his appeals to the lower and baser passions of his countrymen at home. Many Englishmen may have forgotten—and perhaps the respectable persons on the Cambridge platform never knew—that Mr. DILLON is the only Parliamentary agitator who has ever uttered verbal incitement to the savage mutilators of dumb beasts. In a speech at Kildare in 1880 he delivered himself of a sinister hint on this subject, which was too strong even for the stomachs of his Radical friends of those days—they are perhaps less squeamish now—and drove them to the absurd suggestion that, in predicting that "cattle would not "prosper" on an evicted man's land, Mr. DILLON was merely glancing at some quaint old Celtic superstition. His challenge to the brutality of Irish tenants has been followed by more open and effective appeals to their cupidity. He is the inventor and principal promoter of a predatory scheme which in its turn has startled the more respectable Gladstonians out of—or rather into—their propriety, and from which they have been compelled, with more or less reluctance, to withhold their countenance. Nor is it as if these things were accidental aberrations on the part of Mr. DILLON, and had been duly repented of. He was perfectly at ease, if we remember rightly, under the terrible reproach of having encouraged the barbarities of cattle-maiming. He boasted, though no doubt untruly, a day or two ago, that the Plan of Campaign has been of late more successful than ever in the work of defrauding and despoiling the Irish landlords. And this is the man by whose side, on a public platform, these highly respectable academic persons are not ashamed to appear. We say nothing of Mr. DILLON's politics, nothing even of the fact that he is a far deadlier enemy of the English name and the English connexion than Mr. PARNELL himself. To such facts as these political partisanship has notoriously blinded wiser men than Mr. DILLON's Cambridge partisans. The shame and scandal is that they should have so far lost sight also of the plainest injunctions of humanity and morals, and so far forgotten their duty as members of a University, which should uphold these things, as to join hands before the world with an abettor of the barbarities of Irish peasants and an apostle of the doctrine of public plunder. A year or two ago we should have said that such a thing was impossible, but the flood of demoralization which Mr. GLADSTONE's shameless alliance with crime and treason let loose upon the country has spread fast and far.

PEACE AND WAR.

THE connexion of the settlement of ISMAIL PASHA's claims on the Egyptian Government with the prospects of European peace may not be very close, but it exists. It was always possible that these claims would be used both as a means of disturbing the English supremacy over Egypt and as a lever in the elaborate system of machinery by which certain Powers occasionally seek to reopen the whole Eastern question. The actual settlement has been found fault with as a matter of course by those to whom everything done by the present Government is wrong, and to whom Mr. MARRIOTT (with the possible exception of two very different persons—Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. ASHMEAD BARTLETT) is the most obnoxious member of the present Government. It is a pity, of course, that any fresh burden should be imposed on so heavily burdened a country as Egypt. But in this case there are very distinct set-offs. In the first place, Egypt actually saves money by the commutation of the allowances. In the second place, she gets rid of one of those vague but damaging claims which are particularly dangerous to persons and States not in a flourishing financial condition. In the third place, she gets rid of a considerable quantity of the least satisfactory assets that any Government can have—landed property which has to be cultivated directly or indirectly by the State itself, and palaces which have to be expensively kept up or ruinously abandoned. Finally, though the ex-Khedive be neither a very great nor a very wise man, it is impossible to avoid feeling a certain sympathy for him. He has had rather too much of the fate of TIMON, and it does not appear that he has indulged in any of TIMON's misanthropy. As long as his good days lasted all the world was only too glad to accept his hospitality, to lend him money at high interest, to thrust the services of expensive agents on him, to praise him as a kind of "high farmer" among potentates, a liberal and far-sighted developer of his dominions. When his good days were done, all the world proceeded to behave after its kind. In strictly poetical justice, no doubt, amends ought not to be made to him at the expense of his ex-subjects, but then there is so little strictly poetical justice in this world.

The latest rumour and gossip as to Prince BISMARCK's sentiments certainly cannot be said to err on the side of over-sanguineness. With a cheerfulness which does him the highest credit, and a prudence deserving of equal encomium, the PRINCE is said to have remarked that, according to present appearances, war was scarcely to be dreaded "for two or three years," "for the present year "at least." To which, with an inimitable frankness, he added that no doubt he had thought exactly the same thing at the beginning of 1870. The force of consolation can no further go than this. It is as though a weather-wise person should address a pedestrian setting out for a good day's tramp across the hills thus:—"As far as the "sky looks, I don't think it will rain before eleven, at "any rate not before ten; but I must own that I "thought that last Tuesday, and you know how it pelted." In other words, the PRINCE, like everybody else who knows the facts, is aware that there may be war at any moment, and that it will be extremely surprising if there is not war in at most a year or two. But of the exact times and the exact seasons he knows little, if anything, more than any one else. And the truth, of course, is that these guarded utterances of statesmen rather add to than diminish the public apprehension, while they also bring out the almost unprecedented oddity of the situation. There have been times, and many times, when some one definitely wanted war, and steadily intrigued for it. There have been others when apparent accidents threw Europe into war. But there certainly have not been many when no one except a few individual hotheads wished for war, and when everybody was vaguely convinced that nevertheless war is coming to-day or to-morrow or the next day, and that it is absolutely impossible to tell what will be the end of it. Nor have there been many when a poor and frugal country like Germany could be induced, in consequence of this apprehension, to take calmly and even cheerfully the spending of fourteen extra millions of money. In parallel cases this sort of nervous expectation hastens the event it fears; it is to be hoped that this will not be so here.

It would probably be a mistake to overlook, in considering the probabilities of the maintenance of peace, the existence and apparent growth of a feeling of decided irritation in Austria. Lord SALISBURY's reference to the troublesome effect of sudden popular waves of sentiment is not likely to have been directly aimed at the Dual Monarchy; but it is not impossible that it may be true in regard to it. Two different symptoms of such irritation have recently manifested themselves. The first is the appearance of a kind of discontent, chiefly in Hungary, but also in the Austrian dominions proper, with Count KALNOKY's policy. That policy, while it certainly cannot be accused with any justice of truckling to Russia, has as certainly been characterized by a rather superfluous amount of circumspection, by a tendency to blow hot and cold alternately, and by an evident desire to avoid provoking a breach of the peace, even after the very equivocal or unequivocal conduct of Austria's Eastern neighbour. The second symptom is the evident beginning of a sort of "tiff" with Germany—a popular, not a Ministerial tiff, on the score both of the philanderings of Prince BISMARCK with the CZAR and of the persistent taunts and jeremiads of the German press as to Austrian unpreparedness, Austrian weakness, and all the rest of it. Perhaps the Germans in making these latter remarks are only showing the curious ungraciousness and want of sense of the becoming which enemies declare to be so ingrained in at least the North German nature. It is true, of course, that Germany herself certainly caught Austria very much napping in 1866. But Germany is the only Power which, for a quarter of a century at least, has so caught her; and, considering the present relations of the two Powers, delicacy should certainly prevent a North German—if a North German could possibly have delicacy—from dwelling over-much on that reminiscence. Moreover, there is absolutely no evidence that Austria is now in that state of Aulic-Council shiftless shiftiness which so long bound her. It is justly urged that the military occupation of Bosnia—no slight task—was executed, not only with a resolution, but with a promptitude and readiness of resource, which Germany herself could not have bettered; and, if something like the same feat has not in more peaceful fashion been performed in the EMPEROR's own province of Galicia, it is perfectly well known that it is as much as anything due to Prince BISMARCK's wish to keep the CZAR's inflammable vanity from catching fire. There are few situations more naturally provocative of national irritation than this, the situation of being inactive to suit German interests, and of being at the same time charged by Germans with inability to act, and with being likely to prove in the event of war a helpless burden on the great, invincible, generous German nation. It is, indeed, in no way probable that this irritation will seriously weaken the alliance of North and South Germany. That alliance is far too solidly founded on the two great piers and foundation-stones of alliance—community of interests and of fears—to be lightly disturbed. But Prince BISMARCK is a very wise man indeed, who never fails in the long run to stand to win on the best horse. He will probably have to make up his mind whether it is worth while irritating, even if there be no actual risk of estranging, a good friend in order to keep up a hollow truce with a certain enemy. Such extraordinary pettiness, so unlike the businesslike German nature, as the actual turning away of a customer to England, in the matter of the new Bulgarian coinage, looks, indeed, as if the PRINCE's odd craze about Orleanism were stronger than might have been supposed. But the friendship of Austria is something more than the coining of a certain number of Bulgarian shekels. At the same time, the Austrian ill-temper—not, it must be owned, altogether unjustifiable—is a symptom of the difficulties which beset the PRINCE's present attempt at keeping the peace; nor is it by any means the only one. And the fact that while these delicate attentions are lavished upon Russia, no attempt is made to restrain her threatening movements, is not likely to soothe any irritation that may be felt in Austrian quarters.

PARLIAMENTARY PROSPECTS.

THE Irish Nationalist members have received peremptory orders to discontinue or suspend the practice of Parliamentary obstruction. The prohibition will perhaps be unwelcome to some of the coarsest and roughest members of former Sessions; but none of them will hesitate to obey the orders of their sagacious chief. Mr. PARNELL's reasons for a complete change of tactics may be easily understood; and the only doubt as to the soundness of his new policy relates to the time which he has selected for the announcement. Perhaps he may think it expedient to weaken by anticipation the case of the Government for a further alteration of Parliamentary Procedure. The opponents of such a measure might embarrass the Ministers by the argument that they are pushing at an open door. In the last Session, as on former occasions, Mr. PARNELL allowed or induced his followers to exhibit their power of impeding public business. In obeying his present commands they will imitate the methods of their own National League, which sometimes discountenances in certain districts and at convenient seasons the outrages which it habitually organizes. Mr. GLADSTONE has, of course, concerted the Parliamentary plan of campaign with Mr. PARNELL, and their project does credit to their ingenuity. A year ago they hoped to prevent or postpone the reform of Procedure, and they were still more anxious to defeat the Crimes Bill. The hopes which were founded on the supposed scruples of the Liberal-Unionists were wholly disappointed, and the alliance between the two sections of Unionists became every day closer because they were engaged in a common struggle. As in the fable, and as all experience teaches, the effect of blustering violence was to make the traveller wrap his cloak tighter around him. Mr. PARNELL will accordingly now imitate the more subtle influence of the sun, in the hope that the protective covering will be voluntarily abandoned. If any legislative measure is proposed which may affect the political interests of the party, Mr. PARNELL and Mr. GLADSTONE can at a moment's notice rally their forces for purposes of obstruction. It is not known at present that the Government will introduce any important Irish Bill; and protests against refusal to include Ireland in the Local Government Bill will be easily overruled.

The Separatists can scarcely be blamed for their plan of testing the loyalty of the Liberal-Unionists. Mr. PARNELL appears to be seized with a disinterested enthusiasm for the progress of English and Scotch legislation, which he has up to this time rendered impracticable. In every measure or resolution which may be proposed by zealous reformers the Opposition will watch for opportunities of creating dissension between the Government and Lord HARTINGTON or Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If Mr. PARNELL's calculations are justified by the result, he will have succeeded, not only in disorganizing the cause of Union, but in silently stultifying its Liberal supporters. Lord SALISBURY, indeed, stated in his speech at Liverpool that the Government would not necessarily either resign or dissolve if they should be defeated on some secondary question. Mr. PARNELL seemed to misunderstand language which was sufficiently plain; and it is not easy to discover the reason for his unusual dulness. He imputed to Lord SALISBURY a disregard of the constitutional rule which would impose upon him the duty of taking decided steps if he was defeated on the question of Home Rule. If Mr. PARNELL was really misled, he must by this time have corrected his error. Even in ordinary times a Prime Minister exercises a discretion in distinguishing between vital and comparatively trivial issues on which he may find himself in a minority. The leader of a party which has not an independent majority of its own is still more fully entitled to take all the circumstances of the case into consideration. The singular loyalty which has been hitherto displayed by the Liberal-Unionists will entitle any policy which they may pursue to candid appreciation. On the other hand, they are bound not to sacrifice the cause of the Union to any party prejudice or to superficial consistency. Three or four votes given against the Government on minor issues would undo all that has been effected. Mr. PARNELL cannot be accused of timid reluctance to spread his nets in sight of the birds which are to be caught. Possibly he may hope to effect the object of dissolving the hostile alliance by judicious manœuvring during the debates on the Local Government Bill. Gladstonian amendments can be moved as often as there appears to be a chance of snapping a Liberal-Unionist vote.

The Government will, of course, take the Liberal-Unionists into its confidence on important questions of policy. If it is in any way found impossible to agree, both the allied parties must weigh the importance of the issues which threaten to divide them against the necessity of maintaining the Union. There would be pitiable inconsistency in sacrificing the fruits of two years of co-operation to petty scruples or to political impatience. Lord SALISBURY's intimation that he may, in certain contingencies, submit to defeat must not be too liberally interpreted. The Government will assuredly either resign or dissolve if the Liberal-Unionists insist on the adoption of a Radical policy. The choice between the two constitutional alternatives must depend on the probable chances of success at the next general election. It is possible that the prospects of Conservative victory may justify an appeal to the constituencies. The Liberal-Unionists, if they separated themselves at the same time from both the great parties, could scarcely expect to retain a dozen of their present seats. The Caucus is, except perhaps at Birmingham, entirely at the disposal of Mr. GLADSTONE. As long as the Unionist alliance lasts the Liberal section may reasonably hope to receive, as at the last election, the support of the Conservative party. Even if the leaders had not formally renounced their friendly understanding, the rank and file of the Conservatives could scarcely be expected to vote for candidates who had recently and habitually embarrassed the Government by defeating its measures by unseasonably advancing their own. It may be hoped that in warning his own followers of the necessity of compromise Lord SALISBURY will not have encouraged his Liberal allies to prove too exacting. The conduct of a political campaign by a commander of two confederated forces requires the same kind of diplomatic ability which MARLBOROUGH exhibited in actual war. Mr. GLADSTONE, while he holds full powers from Mr. PARNELL, has, like LOUIS XIV., no auxiliaries to humour or to consult. Lord SALISBURY referred to the difficulties which he has to encounter in his remarks on the modern practice of forming Parliamentary groups. The inconvenience of a constitutional innovation, which is perhaps unavoidable, has already been experienced in France.

Mr. PARNELL kindly offers to his adversaries every facility for quarrelling among themselves. The withdrawal of obstruction will, as he hopes, leave the majority without excuse if it hesitates to plunge into promiscuous legislation. Some of its members are pledged to measures which are in the highest degree objectionable to the great body of Unionists. For instance, a scheme for destroying the Church Establishment, in whole or in part, would necessarily divide the allied parties, if the question were to be determined by a vote. The tendency of Radical proposals to damage the cause of the Union is only too obvious. Mr. PARNELL's ingenuity would deserve full recognition if he had not overlooked the probability that his policy may be baffled as soon as it is understood. "You taught me the stroke," said the Highlander in the Fair Maid of Perth, suiting the action to the words. "Yes, fool," replied his enemy, as he struck the assailant dead, "the stroke, but not the parry." The House of Commons cannot be compelled at the dictation of a minority to adopt an inconvenient course of proceeding. In some cases the previous question affords the proper means of escape from a challenge which it may not be expedient either to refuse or to accept. A similar result may be attained by other methods when there are sufficient reasons for avoiding the necessity of an affirmative or negative vote. If constituents become impatient for the redemption of supposed pledges, it will not be difficult to explain the postponement of minor issues to the indispensable task of maintaining the Union. Lord HARTINGTON has on more than one occasion impressed on his followers the necessity of keeping the present Government in office. Those who approve of his policy cannot also wish to force on a Ministerial change. The Session will in all probability be fully occupied with the measures which have been already announced. It is true that none of them are likely to excite enthusiasm, but both parties are committed to the principle of elective Local Government, and they will be still more unanimous in favour of interference with the property of railway shareholders.

Mr. GLADSTONE may perhaps have suggested to Mr. PARNELL a change of policy which will tend to relieve the leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants from the odium which they have justly incurred. It is true that a condescending grant of temporary freedom to the House of Commons is only one degree less offensive than last Session's obstruction. On both occasions the Irish Nationalists have assumed the power of regulating, of permitting, or of preventing the transaction of Parliamentary business. Nevertheless, their past misconduct will be gradually forgotten or condoned as long as Mr. PARNELL instructs them to preserve ordinary decorum. There is no reason to expect that he will at the same time impose on his subordinates abstinence from violence and breach of law in Ireland. Some of the agitators might perhaps become mutinous if they were not allowed opportunities of notoriety and sufficient vents for their enmity to England. Mr. PARNELL has never publicly approved of the Plan of Campaign, nor has he taken any ostensible part in the resistance which has been offered to the Crimes Bill. Even his formal abandonment of Parliamentary obstruction is not ostensibly binding on his party; but his present conduct is so prudent and so well calculated to effect his purpose that it is evidently the result of mature deliberation. It remains to be seen whether the Liberal-Unionists will be duped by a pretence of moderation.

CHESTNUTS OF THE WEEK.

CHESTNUTS, in the American sense—that is, old ancient jests—we have always with us. If the American custom of ringing a little bell at each elderly joke were introduced here (which, as the Commination Service says, "is greatly to be desired"), the air would be merry with as many peals as on the celebrated occasion when Thought married Fact. We have had the antiquated anecdote about the Muscovite flinging his children to the wolves—a thing played out even in sermons to children. Mr. DU MAURIER has warmed up a chestnut supposed not to be older than our own generation. "My dear JACK, you stammer ten "times more in London than you did in Newcastle even"; to which JACK answers (stammering) that "London is "ten times as big a place." This is commonly told, by persons so reckless of proper feeling as to tell it any more, as if it had occurred in New York, and the hero is the late Mr. T. T. But nothing is proved as to the age of this hoary chestnut by assigning it to Mr. T. T. The name is usually the newest thing in a myth. We expect Canon ISAAC TAYLOR to declare that the stammering chestnut was grown in Babylon, and that the remark was first made by an Egyptian tourist who stammered fearfully in Thebes. This theory will be based on the hypothesis that the chestnut may yet be discovered on a cylinder, and thus it will take its place in the Science of Comparative Chestnutology.

A writer in the Daily News, who appears to be singularly ill seen in Talmudic lore, has been accusing the Kickapoo Indians of dealing in a chestnut prodigiously venerable. That the Kickapoos should plagiarize from the Talmud seems so unlike their frank and manly nature that we suspect there is some blunder somewhere. The Talmudic chestnut of the Origin of Women is familiar to every schoolgirl. An Angel was despatched to make Woman out of a rib of ADAM'S. The Angel extracted the rib and laid it by him on the grass. A monkey had been watching and ran away with the rib. The Angel posted after the monkey, who, being arboreal, ran up a tree. The Angel clutched at him, and the monkey's tail "came off in his hand," as servants say. Not having any other material, the Angel made Woman out of the monkey's tail; hence the frisky and inconsequent character (says our Talmudic author) of the fair sex.

The Kickapoo legend is probably derived from Traditions of the North-American Indians, by JAMES ATHEARN JONES (London, 1830, vol. iii. p. 175). According to this version of the chestnut, at the beginning of man's career, "of "women, vain, noisy, laughing, chattering women, there "were none." There were plenty of men, and the Kickapoo men had beautiful, long, whisking tails. By the way, this is another Red Indian chestnut. The Digger Indians, of the Coyote branch, also declare that men had tails in the beginning. The Kickapoo men had not been born, but were made of clay by the Gods, and a delightful time they enjoyed. "Wars were very few then, for no "one need be told that half the wars which have arisen "have grown out of quarrels on account of love of women, "and the other half on account of their maintenance." Even the fierce Iroquois did not sharpen the tomahawk, but adorned their tails with wampum. Men were so happy that they forgot the Gods, and did not offer game on the mema hoppa, or altar-stone. So the Great Spirit, to punish men, sent down a Manitou, who chopped their tails off, and made women out of the frisky, vain, decorative tails. "The "Kickapoos petitioned that women should be taken away "from them, and their old appendages returned; but the "Great Spirit answered that women were a necessary evil, "and must remain."

"The world hath been greatly guilty of this" chestnut; but who first planted and gathered it? The Talmudic writer can hardly have had it from the Kickapoos, nor the Kickapoos from the Talmudic writer. JONES admits that he did not hear the chestnut from an Indian, but culled it in HENNEKER'S Memoirs—a volume which has been suspected, JONES thinks wrongfully, of being unecht. Perhaps the most plausible explanation is that HENNEKER found the chestnut in the Talmud, and attributed it to the Kickapoos. But all is conjecture.

SOME SPEECHES.

THE plague of speeches has set in again with its usual severity, and all the trees of the forest, from the cedar great and tall, such as Mr. GOSCHEN, to the hyssop on the wall, such as Mr. ASQUITH, have mingled in the discussion. What is perhaps most curious of all is that Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, speaking at Bradford, does not, as far as we can judge from reports in quarters so opposite as the Times and the Daily News, appear to have made the slightest reference to the little matter of his charges against anybody and everybody, on the strength of a speech of Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S which Mr. McCarthy has himself repudiated in the construction which Mr. Shaw Lefevre placed upon it, and the statements of which all the persons concerned have promptly and categorically denied. Considering that the Times of the day on which Mr. Shaw Lefevre spoke had contained a telegraphic denial in rather round terms from Lord Randolph Churchill, in which Mr. Shaw Lefevre's name was pointedly mentioned, it might have been supposed that that politician would at least have taken some notice of it. Perhaps the notice may be found concealed under Mr. Shaw Lefevre's evident agitation. This was so great as to produce the extraordinary declaration that the speaker "could find no "words in the political gamut fit to describe the course" which Mr. Balfour, "so shudderingly to many," as another ardent sympathizer writes to the Daily News, is pursuing in Ireland. It is surely not surprising that a man should not find words in a gamut, which, as a rule, is the last place in which one looks for words. "We find many strange things "in the large brass instruments" is a mysterious saying attributed to a maker of trombones and ophicleides. But no discovery of that sort could be stranger than the finding of words in a gamut.

This meeting at Bradford, however, appears to have enjoyed many specimens of fine language, for Mr. Illingworth declared that, "if Englishmen had been" made to pay their debts, and had been debarred under penalties from shooting landlords, rebelling and scullabogning for centuries, "there "was no step which had the sanction either of heaven or hell "which they would not have taken in order to sweep away "such intolerable wrong." Mr. Illingworth, if we mistake not, is a light of Nonconformity; it would be interesting to have the opinion of the next synod or conference, or whatever it is called, of his particular sect (we do not know what it is) as to this view of "steps which have the "sanction of hell." Mr. Asquith may be left to reconcile his intense and lawyerlike admiration of the Plan of Campaign with the views of those of his friends who deplore the Plan of Campaign as the chief blot on the otherwise pure scutcheon of Home Rule. With such random and, in the case of the Bradford meeting, ranting utterances the Home Secretary at Birmingham had no difficulty in contrasting favourably. He had, indeed, a somewhat awkward task in one way, inasmuch as he is the only Minister who has brought any kind of disaster on the Government, or who can be regarded as having in any way failed to justify his appointment. But Mr. Matthews's peccadilloes are things of the past; and, very luckily for him, the blind folly of his adversaries provided him, both in the case of Lipski and in the Trafalgar Square business, with that kind of justification which is all the stronger because it is not exactly logical. It is also perfectly true that he occupies, if not the post which requires most mental and moral qualifications, at any rate that in which small difficulties are most incessant, and in which the occupier is most exposed to constant harassings from all sorts and conditions of men. With regard to his speeches themselves, they were good plain examples of the combined apology and counter-attack which seems to be now as incumbent on each particular Minister as if he had no colleagues, and as if his colleagues were not reported in newspapers, but which it is naturally almost impossible to invest with any particular oratorical attraction. In this last respect Mr. Matthews was not quite so fortunate as the other Cabinet Minister who spoke the night before.

It is not surprising that Mr. Goschen's speech at Hastings has increased the affection (every one knows how warm and lively it was already) of the Separatists for the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Goschen's reply to Mr. Gladstone was good, and we cannot help being glad that he took an incidental occasion of rebuking the silly notion, now translating itself, it is to be feared, into a sillier custom, that every Minister, great and small, who cannot have his way on every question of the cut of an officer's uniform, or the weekly milk allowance of an office cat, is bound to resign on pain of being charged with dishonesty, inconsistency, corrupt clinging to office, mean-spiritedness, want of independence, and Heaven only knows what else. The fact of course is, though it would not have been wise of Mr. Goschen to say it, that the Minister who is always resigning lays his own motives very much more open to suspicion than the Minister who fairly gives and takes, and who, while never "transacting" on a great question of principle, does not think it necessary to resign because the office messenger is to have three buttons instead of two, or the office cat two mice instead of three. But, perhaps, the most practical part of the whole and valuable speech, more valuable than the tu quoque to Mr. Gladstone, if less amusing, and not less valuable than the caution about resignations, if not so obviously timely, was the reference to the Lipski case and its illustration of one of the greatest nuisances of the day. Comparatively few men are Ministers, and able to advertise themselves by resigning office. But nearly seven hundred men are members of Parliament, and it is in the power of any one of these, who chooses to delay the business of the country, to thwart and paralyse the course of justice, and to make himself a kind of hero by dragging some legal question before the most unfit of all tribunals for irregular interference or more irregular review. It would, of course, be almost impossible even for a novelist or a playwright to imagine a more dramatic reduction of the proceeding to the absurd than the case of that luckless scoundrel when, as Mr. Goschen says, a hundred ardent and advanced members of Parliament were going to move heaven and earth to prove his innocence, if he had not had the extreme ill-nature to confess his guilt. In the other celebrated instance there was, no doubt, contributory blundering on the part of a Minister; but what delay and waste of time in Parliament and out of it it brought, what needless discredit thrown on the most important of public functionaries, and what an absolute minimum of useful result, of any sort whatever, every one knows. The worst of it is, no doubt, that it is easier to denounce the practice than to put a stop to it. The right of members of Parliament to discuss grievances is undoubtedly large, and if there are to be members of Parliament at all, it is nearly impossible to curtail it. There is no possibility of defining what is a discreet and proper and what is an indiscreet and improper exercise of it. If Parliament itself could, like judges of old time with juries, send the electors of the Camborne division to prison to reflect and come to a better mind as to their misconduct in returning Mr. Conybeare, the thing might possibly be done, though the Wilkes precedent is not encouraging. But then Wilkes was a very different person from Mr. Conybeare and the Conybearian type of member generally. But as it is, unless we had a House of Commons strong-minded enough to "pass to the order of the day" when the Conybeares and the Atherley Joneses tried to advertise themselves, we really do not know what is to be done or hoped, except from the inculcation of better sense on the constituencies themselves. Still it is just as well that attention should be called by persons in authority to the practice, to the nuisance of it, and to its inevitably bad effects on the public business and the administration of justice. Mr. Goschen deserves thanks for so calling attention in an authoritative way.

EUGÈNE LABICHE.

At Paris, on Wednesday, the 18th of January, 1888, died Eugène Labiche. He invented and wrote—to name but these three—Un Chapeau de Paille d'Italie, and Célimare le Bien-Aimé, and Le Plus Heureux des Trois; and in inventing these he inspired a whole crowd of smaller men, and set folks laughing, as the British drum-tap sets them waking and working, all round the world. To say that his death eclipses the gaiety of nations were, no doubt, to say a vast deal too much. For one thing, the gaiety of nations is not to be eclipsed by anything short of universal dissolution; and, for another, Labiche had done, and printed, his work, and the best of him is better in black and white than it is in action. But it may very fairly be remarked of him that, had he died some forty years ago, the world would have laughed a great deal less than it has. He was the greatest artist in farce of our time. Since Regnard died, indeed, a humour so rich and so abundant as Labiche's has not been produced upon the stage. He was French of the French, of course; and it was on his own ground (which was the Palais-Royal), and in his own tongue, and at the hands of his own interpreters—Grassot, Sainval, Ravel, Lhéritier, Hyacinthe, Geoffroy—that he was best seen and best liked. It must be noted, too, that his adapters—in England and America, at least—were, for some reason or other, unable to do him justice; that The Wedding March (for instance) and The Nabob are but mean and colourless reflections of the Chapeau de Paille d'Italie aforesaid and Les Trente Millions de Gladiator; that where Labiche was novel, outrageously possible, irresistibly extravagant, his adapters were either feeble or dull (or both), and were ineffectual or reasonable (or both) into the bargain.

It must also be noted that, like his great ancestor, Molière, the author of Les Trente-sept Sous de Monsieur Montaudoin and 29 Degrés dans l'Ombre was too national, was too essentially and particularly a Frenchman, to look well in an English dress, and speak to any purpose with (say) a Clapham accent. In this fortune he is by no means alone. Men so distinguished in their several ways as Dryden, Fielding, Cibber, and Charles Reade have worked their hardest to make Molière English; and not a single scene of Molière keeps the English stage. On the other hand, Shakspeare has been prepared for production in France by hands no weaker and wits no less apprehensive than those of Voltaire, Dumas, Alfred de Vigny, Hector Berlioz, and Victor and François Hugo; and he is so badly suited still, he bears his naturalization with so poor a grace, that M. Émile Blémont thinks it worth his while to recast and improve the plot of Much Ado about Nothing, and M. Porel, the manager of the Odéon—the theatre of the earnest and studious youth of France—thinks it worth his while to convey M. Émile Blémont's recastings and improvements. Labiche, it must be owned, has had better luck than that. As Box and Cox his Frisette has years of life in it yet, while as Crutch and Toothpick his Les Petites Mains has gone the round, we are assured, of civilization. But the number of his inventions passes the century; and to hint that perchance he may only be remembered as the original of works by the present Mr. Sims and the late Mr. Madison Morton were to give a poorer account of him than he deserves. Fortunately, as we have remarked, his farces read even better than they act; ten volumes of them have been printed, and it is said that when he died he was preparing a complete edition; so that, while the love of laughter is a human quality, his reputation, like that of Molière and Shakspeare, will scarce take hurt with the judicious.

He was born in 1815, and he died, at seventy-three, of heart disease. Though he did not actually belong, in Gautier's phrase, to that "grande génération de Mil-Huit-"Cent-Trente . . . . . qui restera une des époques clima-"tériques de l'esprit humain," he is near enough to it in time, and he was vigorous and active enough in fact, to prove that he had in him no small portion of the temperamental fire, the genius of initiative and achievement, for which his luckier predecessors were distinguished. He was a schoolboy at the Collège Bourbon, and a student at the Ecole de Droit; in 1835 he was writing stories for the smaller journals; and at twenty-three he was concerned, with Marc Michel and Lefranc, in the production of a piece in which the excellent Grassot appeared for the first time on the Parisian stage. Eight years after he was the author of Frisette and Deux Papas Très-Bien; and five years after that he had written and produced Un Chapeau de Paille d'Italie, which is certainly the gayest, the wildest, the maddest, and the biggest piece of fooling done for the modern stage. Some men are exhausted by an effort of this type; it was not so with Labiche. He had still some thirty years of work in him; and before he ceased from writing he had achieved such "undeveloped Molièrisms" as Célimare and Le Plus Heureux des Trois, as 29 Degrés dans l'Ombre, and the epic-in-little of M. Montaudoin and his thirty-seven sous; such combinations of just and delicate observation with invention the most fantastical and absurd as La Cagnotte and La Sensitive, as Deux Merles Blancs and Doit-on le Dire? and Les Trente Millions de Gladiator, such profound and vigorous comedy as Moi and Le Voyage de Monsieur Perrichon, such pleasant and human amusement as the story of the humours of Captain Tic and that dreadful business in the Rue Lourcine, as L'Avare en Gants Jaunes and Le Prix Martin (which was written in association with M. Emile Augier) and Les Petites Mains, which is, they say, one of the few among his hundred and odd works—in one, two, three, four, or five acts—which he cared to see in these dimensions. All these were more or less incorrectly and loosely written; so that when, in 1880, Labiche was elected to the vacant chair of the late M. Saint-René Taillandier, there was a certain outcry among the virtuous, and there were not wanting those who declared that the Institute was going to the dogs. But these were wrong; and the Academicians, who have been not right so often, were this time more than common wise.

The humanity in Labiche's plays is so abundant and so rich, his wit is so active, and his humour so racy and so strong; he unites so acute an apprehension of what is ridiculous in manners with so profound a sense of what is elementary in nature; his gift of observation is so large and his faculty of invention so fecund and indefatigable, that, given a finer sense of his material, a greater delight in words, a finer and a more artistic instinct of style than he possesses, his work would be great literature. As it is, one ought to remember in his behalf that Fénelon found fault, and deservedly, with Molière the writer and the man of letters—and in these days Fénelons are rare; that M. Brunetière has girded, and with reason good enough, at the manner of Alexandre Dumas—and in these days the likes of M. Brunetière are not uncommon; and that, as Labiche's heroes are all bourgeois—are bourgeois to the innermost of their being—it might be pleaded for him on a pinch that, at the worst, his style, being necessarily that of his personages, is, dramatically speaking, so good as to command respect as literature. But the fact is, Labiche stands in no need of any apologies of the kind.

THE NAVY.

The popularity of resignation as a weapon for the coercion of political colleagues would seem to be on the increase. Apparently, too, there is some sort of virtue which is supposed to belong to the use of it, and the gentleman who can boast that he has resigned the sweets of office is held by many to have justified his behaviour in marching out. The loss of a place may be a serious thing; but, then, also it may not; and a politician to whom it may be perfectly indifferent whether he is in office or out of it can retire at no great sacrifice, and figure as a disinterested person very cheaply. For the rest, the cardinal virtues are commonly taken for granted among English gentlemen, and they are not supposed to cling very anxiously to their salaries. When a politician throws up his place, it is at least possible that he has no better motive than pure disappointment at not getting his own way. It rested with Lord Charles Beresford to show that this motive was not the efficient cause of his imitation in January 1888 of Lord Randolph Churchill's theatrical exit in December 1886. No rule of morals or manners that we know of requires that a Minister should continue to serve with a Ministry if he disapproves of its whole policy, or even to assist, directly or indirectly, in doing some one particular mischievous thing. But when a disagreement arises suddenly, and on some point which nobody has heard of, the retirement is at least suspect. There is no merit in being a person with whom nobody can work. To quarrel and throw up the cards over a matter of detail is simply unmannerly. As for the other line of conduct which has been attributed to Lord Charles, and apparently by friends, the effort to reorganize the Admiralty from the inside, that is really something more than unmannerly. The department is not above criticism, and a non-official member is free to do his best to recast it completely; but when a gentleman takes office he also binds himself to obey orders, and do the duties of the place he takes voluntarily. To go in with the intention of making yourself master by being intolerable as a subordinate is really (and Lord Charles must see the force of the comparison) too like the conduct of the famous Mr. John Avery and others who shipped as mate with the intention of getting up a mutiny and running off to the Spanish main. Captains who have to deal with John Averys had better make haste to maroon them. It is in the interest of John himself, who is otherwise only too likely to attain to the yardarm.

There could be very little doubt, after Lord George Hamilton had stated that the building programme of the Admiralty had been generally approved by the Board, as to what meaning ought to be given to the sudden resignation of Lord Charles. His speech on Thursday night makes it perfectly plain that he left the Admiralty because it is the kind of office he must have known it was before joining. The question of the salaries of the officers in the Intelligence Department was a mere pretext—or, to put it more politely, it was the comparatively insignificant annoyance which caused the long accumulating wrath of Lord Charles to overflow. The real grievance was the position and power of the First Lord. Now they may not be what they ought to be in the interest of the navy, but it is obvious that the transaction of business will be impossible if subordinates are to take upon themselves to reorganize a whole department which is not constructed to their satisfaction. Disapproval of Lord Charles's escapade need not make any man the less willing to acknowledge that he has done and helped to do much good. He is no doubt perfectly right in saying that the Admiralty hardly seemed to realize the fact that its duty was to administer a fighting service. The official who told the late Junior Lord that there was no plan of mobilization, but that one could, no doubt, be knocked up in case of war, was a very typical personage. He and his like have had too much to say, both at the Admiralty and at the War Office; and we can easily believe that they waste a great deal of time in writing letters after the manner of Mr. MICAWBER. Unquestionably, too, they know how to take care of Dowb. But, though all that, and more, is true, Lord CHARLES makes it perfectly plain that, even in the Admiralty as it is, he was able to get many necessary things done, and that he resigned, not because he wanted to do a definite piece of good work or prevent a definite mischief, but simply because he found his position more subordinate than was to his liking. He had certainly made his further continuance in office impossible. The noble and gallant member need not be scolded for the trouble he has given the Ministry. It has not been very serious. Lord SALISBURY and his colleagues are passi graviora in such things. They have survived Lord RANDOLPH, and, to complete the tag, dabit deus his quoque finem—thank goodness there are other naval officers ready to take the place. Lord CHARLES will now be able to do the sea time he needs to qualify him to hoist his flag, and may return to a sphere in which he will probably be better prepared to submit to discipline.

It may happen that this resignation will lead to another and extensive discussion on the state of the navy. There is no want of matter of debate. The Intelligence Department itself stands in need of further explanation. From its name it would appear to be a subordinate branch employed in collecting information. This is useful work, no doubt, and it is important to have it done well. But it is quite another thing to say, as one of its spokesmen in the press has said, that "on its activity the efficiency of the navy "directly or indirectly entirely depends." As a matter of course the name of Count MOLTKE is used as justification for this sort of language on the ground that the Intelligence Department of the German army is under his orders. People who talk in this way forget that the great Prussian stategist is also chief of the general staff, and is, as much as any subject can be, the Commander-in-Chief of the army. It might be a good thing that the chief of the Navy Intelligence Department should also be the effective head of the English navy. Before we commit ourselves to approval of any such proposal we should venture to ask the department to prove its capacity. There is an excellent chance at present. The department would go some way towards persuading us of the wisdom of reviving the office of Lord High Admiral in favour of its chief if it would only make a definite statement, supported by argument and illustration, of what it thought would be an adequate naval defence for this country and its commerce. There is not only no distinct understanding on the subject, but no two—certainly no three—authorities are agreed as to the value of the ships we have. Admiral of the Fleet Sir THOMAS SYMONDS continues to give reasons for his faith in the inability of the British navy to face the French alone. He has even lately gone so far as to rather pooh-pooh the armed merchant ship, on the not unreasonable ground that it would be folly to deprive commerce in war-time of the vessels most likely to escape an enemy's cruisers. This is a view entitled to some consideration. Then Lord BRASSEY keeps pegging away at the defence of the coaling-stations. Then, again, a body calling itself the "Naval Volunteer "Home Defence Association" comes forward, actually pooh-poohing the coaling-stations, and insisting that they will never be attacked until our home shipping has been destroyed. It wants to make the coast safe, and draws a dreadful picture of what will be done to our shipping by foreign steamers turned into "local Alabamas." The Association want to oppose the armed merchant-ship—using the word in the strict sense—to the armed merchant-ship, apparently forgetting that a "local Alabama" would have been turned into a fighting craft. In fact, the state of the navy is discussed on all hands by professional partisans and well-intentioned amateurs who will talk about matters they only half understand. If the Naval Intelligence Department would only strike in with a definite rational plan, it would at least clear the air, and would be certainly better employed than in trying to nobble the Admiralty.

V. E. M.

IT is a new doctrine, or it is new to us, and it is not sufficiently advanced for everybody; but it is good enough for Mr. F. W. NEWMAN, and even the editor of the Vegetarian admits that "it is just such as the neo-"phyto naturally adopts on the threshold of our move-"ment." Something in this reminds one of Lord LYTTON's Zanoni. There, too, was a delightful character named "The "Dweller on the Threshold." But he, if we remember rightly, was not V. E. M., unless V. stands for Vampire, which, of course, it does not. No; V. E. M. means the doctrine of living on vegetables, eggs, and milk—not bad either, if they are good of their kind. But the V.-E.-Mist is only a neophyte, and has hardly climbed the stairs which ascend to "the great platform of Food Reform." There is a V. E. M. body, and Mr. NEWMAN is a member of it. He says he never drank wine, because he did not like it, which is an excellent reason. But he did eat flesh; he was carnivorous before he was V. E. M. The Complete Vegetarian probably regards Mr. NEWMAN much as the younger generations in Fiji look on an old converted cannibal chief. He is an interesting and affecting, but an awful, survival. Men say he ate strange food, beef and mutton, before he became V. E. M. Concerning these crimes, by the way, Mr. SLATTER preaches a kind of evolutionary sermon in the Vegetarian. "The plan of "Creation," says Mr. SLATTER optimistically, "is doubtless "founded on the law of 'the greatest happiness to the "'greatest number.'" If that be true, then the plan, like the excellent intentions of Mr. WILKINS MICAWBER the younger, is not carried out in any one direction. Nature, red in tooth and claw with ravine, shrieks against the creed of Mr. SLATTER. Mr. SLATTER says that "the special "function of the Carnivora seems to be to prey on fellow-"creatures, not carnivorous, for food." Why not carnivorous? We eat pike, and pike eat trout, and trout eat flies, worms, minnows, par-tail, and so forth; while salmon have been known to eat young swallows. Bears eat people sometimes, and people sometimes eat bears. In fact, the youthful essayist sums up the matter thus:—"The Brown "Bear has a short tail, and likes honey. He is good to "eat, and hugs his prey." However, Mr. SLATTER objects to all this circulating larder kind of business; "for we "know that the time is rapidly approaching when peace "shall prevail on the earth." Then what will the Irish do? The prophecies and premisses of Mr. SLATTER are obviously erroneous. But he turns to and "slates," as the vulgar say, these poor carnivorous animals, which are not even neophytes, which never will be V. E. M., and whose idea of food reform would be to bolt the keepers of the Zoological Gardens at feeding-time. This is the unkind and inconsistent criticism devoted by Mr. SLATTER to carnivorous animals. "The nature of animal "food necessitates the constant drinking of water." Well, why not? Some vegetarians allege that it necessitates the constant drinking of wine. Wine is a vegetable juice, inconsistently disliked by vegetarians. If dogs and lions drank rum; if, like the heroes in the poem, they were "working at the mum And the gin," we could imagine that moral objections might be raised. Even ALAN QUATERMAIN might shrink from entering a desert where the lions had been constantly quaffing "square-face." But Mr. SLATTER knows they do not act thus, unless perhaps the pards which charioted BACCHUS may have stooped to folly. "Carni-"vorous animals will desert any locality where water is in-"accessible." Most people, not vegetarians, would say this was creditable to carnivorous animals, rather than otherwise. But the critic ends by saying that "the peculiari-"ties of these degraded beings have nothing in common "with man in his normal condition." Does man, in his normal condition, abstain from water, and confine himself to beer, ale, rum, gin, mum, porter, swipes, mead, Malmsey, port, sherry, claret, champagne, Burgundy, Tokay, Marsala, Falernian, absinthe, and green Chartreuse? Mr. SLATTER can hardly mean that, nor will he maintain that man rather prefers to stay in places where water cannot be had, and where soap, therefore, would be as serviceable as the gold of MIDAS. There must be some mistake somewhere. Even Mr. NEWMAN says that he "chiefly "values tea as a substitute for rum in milk," which makes us anxiously ask what a V. E. M. takes as a substitute for dogsnose? Mr. SLATTER's argument that carnivora are "the "shortest-lived of all animals" merely suggests the question, "How about ravens?" True vegetarians appear to bar deliberately get out before the train stopped. Of course, if that were true, she would have only herself to blame for the catastrophe, and could not recover a farthing from the Company. He, however, gave a very lame explanation of his mysterious note, the meaning of which ought not to be suggested in the absence of proof; and the jury may naturally have regarded him as an untrustworthy witness. The porter whom Major MATHIAS saw just after the occurrence again supported the Inspector; while the engine-driver and fireman both said that the automatic brake had been applied in the ordinary way. Perhaps the defendants' witnesses swore rather too well. But the most interesting feature in the case is the letter of Inspector GILES. It is to be hoped that such letters are rare.

Mrs. WHITBY has also been the victim of a so-called accident, but happily of a less serious one than befell Mrs. MATHIAS. Mrs. WHITBY went to the Crystal Palace last September with her husband to see the fireworks, when she was struck and injured by a rocket. The WHITBYS brought an action against Messrs. BROCK & Co., the eminent pyrotechnists, but were nonsuited by Mr. Justice GRANTHAM, who appears to have taken the eccentric view that, if people will go to see fireworks, they must expect to be burnt. The Court of Appeal brushed aside this startling theory with some peremptoriness, and gave judgment for the plaintiff, with costs. Mrs. WHITBY was walking up the main path which leads to the middle of the Palace, and if people may not go there when the Palace and grounds are open to the public, it is hard to say where they may go. The learned members of the Court of Appeal, or at least two of them, seem to have derived much amusement from Mrs. WHITBY's mishap, though it does not strike us, perhaps from our defective sense of humour, as excruciatingly funny. Lord Justice LOPES asked the defendants' counsel whether he contended that visitors to the Aquarium "took the risk of the wolves escaping," which was a fair jest enough, and illustrated the absurdity of the argument. But the MASTER of the ROLLS, who seems to take himself for an ELLENBOROUGH, or a MAULE, addressed Mr. MORTEN as follows:—"You say that the lady's legs got among the fireworks; their "case is that the fireworks got among the lady's legs." A burn is not a pleasant thing, nor is it agreeable when you seek redress for one to be met with wit of this order.

THE PROMOTION OF SIR CLARE FORD.

THE promotion of Sir CLARE FORD is a compliment to Spain, but it is also something more than a mere act of courtesy. Spain will not be turned from a small to a great Power because the representatives of England and Austria are called Ambassadors instead of Envoy Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary. Prince BISMARCK's sensible remark, which has been copiously quoted on this occasion, remains as true as ever. A great Power needs no formal recognition. Still, though Spain is very far from being what it once was relatively to the other nations of Europe, it is also very unlike what it was itself a few years ago. It has not only now enjoyed several years of peace, and of what is, comparatively speaking, intelligent government, but, in the opinion of competent observers, it is likely to remain in a stable condition. The elevation to higher rank of the diplomatic representatives of two countries variously interested in but equally friendly towards Spain is a recognition of this honourable fact. However friendly England might have felt towards Spain at any previous period since 1868, it would hardly have shown its goodwill by putting the English representative at Madrid on an official level with the representative at Berlin or Paris. To some extent, no doubt, the readiness of Austria and this country to be complimentary to Spain is due to the memory of its former greatness; but it is also due to a confidence that, if it is not again about to become what it was in the sixteenth century, it is at least going to take a dignified and respectable place in Europe.

Both in Spain and abroad it is generally felt that this revival, as it may fairly be called, is largely due to the QUEEN-REGENT. No member even of the very remarkable family to which she belongs has given a better proof of capacity to govern than Queen CHRISTINA's success in gaining the confidence, and even the affection, of the Spaniards. They are not a people who are supposed to like foreigners; though it has commonly been found by at least English soldiers and men of business that the Spaniard may be easily managed when he is properly led. Queen CHRISTINA seems to have persuaded the Spaniards that she is leading them well. Her Court is dignified—a consideration which weighs a good deal with Spaniards—and she is known to detest backstairs intrigue of any kind, and particularly of the semi-religious kind which went on in the days of Queen ISABEL. The mere fact that the QUEEN-REGENT never interferes in any irregular way with the business of government is in her favour. Some of her success may be due to the fact that she is a member of the House of Austria, and therefore not wholly a stranger on the Spanish throne. The "illustrious House" is not altogether forgotten in the country over which it ruled; but, whatever help the QUEEN-REGENT may have had from her name, it has availed her mainly by reason of her own tact and good sense. While the Spaniards were, so to speak, resuming their place as a reputable, orderly nation, they have been rather painfully reminded of a period during which they sank to the level of a South American Republic. It was most unfortunate that, almost while Sir CLARE FORD was making his complimentary speech, there should have been talk of sending the KING's Royal grandmother over the frontier. No man of any decent feeling would wish to speak evil of Queen ISABEL. Gentlemen who were not her subjects were not bound to show the touching loyalty of a certain Spanish gentleman, who fought several duels in Paris in defence of her Majesty's reputation; but at least they will acknowledge that she has always been a grossly injured woman.

If the pugnacious Spanish gentleman had run his duelling sword through every one of the politicians, Spanish and French, who deliberately conspired to ruin ISABEL II., even the strongest opponent of the practice of duelling would have felt that there were many excuses to be made for such a vigorous proceeding. Unfortunately for Spain and for ISABEL, Marshal NARVAEZ and M. GUIZOT could not be prevailed upon to stop in this summary fashion. They were allowed to carry out their plans with sufficiently disgraceful consequences. One of them, even the best-natured critic of Queen ISABEL's character must acknowledge, is that she has become a dangerous neighbour to the throne. She cannot occupy it herself, and it is hardly in the nature of things that she can abstain from trying to in some way or other control its occupant. There are still intriguers enough in Spain who would be very glad to use her name for political purposes, and, unhappily for herself, she has always been clay in the hand of such persons. In the course of her last visit she has apparently been worked on by disappointed politicians and soldiers, in whom the old Spanish Adam is still strong. The Government of the QUEEN-REGENT would have been guilty of criminal weakness if they had permitted the poor deposed Queen to help even indirectly in a renewal of the squalid anarchy which disgraced her own reign. It is a pity that Queen ISABEL should have afforded the occasion; but it is none the less satisfactory that the Spanish Government should have shown that it has both the power and the will to keep order.

THE CROFTERS.

ANARCHY, in its literal meaning of lawless defiance of authority, is making progress among the Gladstonian party. Even late members of the Government are not ashamed to announce the opinion that laws of which they happen to disapprove are not to be obeyed. It is true that a doctrine which goes to the root of civilized society is not altogether new. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT in the course of the last Session apologized for his Irish allies by a string of instances in which Governments have been resisted or overthrown. It was evident that his historical studies had stopped short of the discovery that, in England at least, revolutionary methods have always been made to conform as closely as possible to established law. It is, indeed, hardly necessary to criticize a constitutional teacher who held that HAMPDEN's refusal to pay ship-money was confessedly illegal. The deposition of JAMES II. was a better illustration of irregular maintenance of fundamental rights; but the fiction that the misguided King had abdicated took its rise in an almost superstitious reverence for precedent and for law. There is no doubt that some political revolutions have been unavoidable though necessary evils; but Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and his more thoroughgoing disciples both milk and eggs, which makes V. E. M. seem comparatively a liberal and acceptable code of life. However, vegetarians are peaceful folk, and never "demonstrate" in the street, so they should be treated not unkindly. The following carnivorous letter to their journal is enough to make any man of feeling a V. E. M., if not a vegetarian:—

Will you kindly tell me how I can improve my diet? My breakfast consists of bread-and-butter, and pork, cheese, or bacon, and coffee. Dinner at one o'clock—dumplings, roast meat, rice pudding, tarts, potato patty, potatoes, cabbage, Irish stew; pork and mutton on alternate days. At five o'clock, bread-and-butter and tea.

Yet why should Elsie, who is twenty-five, "reasonably "object" to weighing ten stone? We do not call Elsie's a case of "superfluous corporosity," as the editor of the Vegetarian does, unfeelingly.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

M. TIRARD'S decision not to ask the Chamber to authorize M. de Lesseps to raise money by way of lottery has, it seems, surprised a good many people, and made M. de Lesseps himself act as if he were both furious and amazed. His surprise is hardly creditable to his sagacity, and his rage is doubtless no more intense than is consistent with business. The situation is one which makes his anger and fine air of patriotic indignation more than a little ridiculous to onlookers. His Company has already spent so much more than it undertook to spend, has been so long over what it has done, is so far from having completed its task, and so near the end of the period for which its concession was granted, that it can no longer borrow money except on somewhat usurious terms. In this fix M. de Lesseps has appealed for what is really Government help, which inevitably includes a Government guarantee, and has been first put off and then denied the accommodation he asks for. He is now threatening to take by force what he cannot get by favour, and has appealed to his numerous shareholders to instruct their deputies to put pressure on the Ministry, so that the State may lend a hand to bolster up their concern. On a larger scale this is the common resource of embarrassed speculators who already owe much money to a bank, and would like to owe more. They go to the manager and simply tell him that if they are not helped over this stile they must become bankrupt, and then there will be nothing for their creditors. At times this form of sturdy begging proves successful, and then in due course the bank smarts for it. M. de Lesseps tries this well-known commercial manœuvre on an exceptionally large scale. It is not every Director who can threaten a Prime Minister with the loss of tens of thousands of votes, but although he does the thing largely it is the same thing.

From the business point of view, M. Tirard's decision is so obviously right that it needs no defence. M. de Lesseps and a few English newspaper Correspondents who take a tender, and apparently personal, interest in the Canal, profess to be wroth at the want of patriotism in a Minister who can subject a great patriotic enterprise to risk. If the great enterprise were in a sound financial condition it could get its money for itself. It comes to the Government because it is not in a sound financial condition, and M. Tirard very properly thinks that the State ought not to help small economists to venture more money in what may before long be a bankrupt affair by authorizing a great national raffle in its favour. The mere confusion in the published accounts of the Company is enough to condemn it. There seems to be no possibility of agreeing as to what it has spent. M. de Lesseps persists in refusing to include his railway, which, he says, is a going and paying undertaking, in the general outlay of the Canal. As the railway was built to help in making the Canal, it may be presumed that the two concerns, or two branches of the same concern, are taking in one another's washing on a large scale. Whether M. de Lesseps is right or wrong in his method of keeping accounts, it is an undoubted fact that he can no longer get money on reasonable terms in the usual way. This, of itself, is reason enough why the Government should refuse to help him. He would not be under the necessity of making the demand if men of business felt any confidence that he would complete his Canal within the time promised and make it pay when open. But, though M. Tirard has taken the right course, he will probably have to suffer a good deal of unpopularity for his decision. The shareholders of the Company are very numerous, and are all French. They will be quite sincerely angry with a Minister who has done anything to diminish the value of their property. The financiers who are so closely allied with the politicians in France are said to be deeply compromised in M. de Lesseps's speculation. All the parties interested, big capitalists and little, will be ready to band together in the interests of their pockets. A good deal of hazy patriotic sentiment will be on their side, and it is by no means impossible that a majority of the Chamber may be persuaded or frightened into approving of the lottery. The position of the Canal Company, however, threatens something much more serious than a Ministerial crisis, than which, indeed, nothing can well be more insignificant and familiar in Paris. If anything happens to discredit the shares in public opinion, if the Chamber refuses to permit the lottery, if it is not popular when it is permitted (if at all), the bankruptcy of the Company may be precipitated by a panic, and in that case there will be a financial smash in France on a very large scale. What that would imply politically M. de Lesseps knows when he tries to put pressure on the Ministry. M. Tirard is taking the wise and honourable course in refusing to stave off the evil day at the risk of making it worse, but he and others are doubtless well aware that a stronger Government than the third Republic would have good cause to be afraid of the consequences of a ruinous panic in France at the present moment.

TWO "ACCIDENTS."

THE action brought by Mrs. Mathias against the London and South-Western Railway Company is one of the strangest which has been tried for some time, and may not improbably lead to further proceedings. The jury have given her eight hundred pounds by way of damages, which is certainly not too much for the very serious injuries she has received. The real defence of the Company was that Mrs. Mathias was responsible for her own misfortune; and, although they failed to make it out, the conflicting versions of what occurred are most remarkable. The story told by the plaintiff herself is simple enough. On the afternoon of the 10th of May, when it must have been broad daylight, she experienced that dreary incident of our earthly pilgrimage known as changing at Clapham Junction. She got into a third-class compartment next the engine—from which we may infer, if she was a lady of sense, that there was no room anywhere else. Her fellow-passengers got out at Wimbledon, and she was left alone. When the train was approaching her destination, which was Maldon, she "took her ticket out of her purse, and stood up to put her "purse into her dress-pocket behind, her ticket being in her "mouth. She saw the blaze of light of the station, when she "suddenly staggered forward, and remembered nothing more." As a matter of fact, she fell out on the platform, hurt herself very badly, and has since suffered both in sight and hearing. What was the cause of so singular a misadventure? On this point there was flat contradiction, and Mr. Justice Stephen seems to have been as much puzzled as anybody else. The evidence of Major Mathias, the plaintiff's husband, was not the least curious part of the case. He said he went to the station in the evening, when Inspector Giles told him what had happened, and was corroborated by a porter. Mrs. Mathias, said the Inspector, had been insulted by some one in the carriage with her, and had fallen out head foremost, and he thought there must have been foul play. But Mrs. Mathias swears that there was no one in the carriage with her, so this must have been an entire delusion. Giles afterwards, according to the Major, wrote him a note, which he destroyed, but of which he afterwards sent his solicitor a copy written from recollection. This extraordinary document ran thus:—"Sir—I should advise "you to see the General Manager to-morrow, or as soon as "possible, about your wife's accident. The Company "generally prosecute when an accident of this kind happens "for leaving the train in motion. Your obedient servant, "J. Giles. P.S.—Please destroy this letter, as it would "get me into trouble with the Company if it was "known I had written it." It will be observed that this letter is quite inconsistent with the account of the accident which Major Mathias says Giles gave him by word of mouth; and it should be added that two other passengers deposed to the train having been pulled up quickly, with a jerk. In the witness-box Inspector Giles adhered to the statements made in his letter. He swore that he saw Mrs. Mathias open the door, and

THE MORNING POST AND THE EVENING POST.

THE reversal by the Court of Appeal of Mr. Justice KAY's decision in the case of BORTHWICK v. The Evening Post (Limited) was not altogether a surprise either to the legal profession or to the general public. Mr. Justice KAY is a "strong" judge, and very much of his own opinion. He is a man of sense and of the world, a terror to evil-doers, with a consuming zeal for getting at the truth. But his indignation at what he considers sharp practice sometimes leads him away from the beaten track of orthodox precedent; and it was felt that in granting an injunction to restrain the further issue of the Evening Post under that name he had gone a step too far. The proprietor of the Morning Post failed to prove that he had suffered any damage from the appearance of the new-comer. Some twenty applications had been made for it at the office of the Morning Post, but Sir ALGERNON BORTHWICK's counsel could not show that the sale of the older journal had been in consequence diminished by a single copy. This is a point to which Mr. Justice KAY did not give sufficient attention; but, when once apprehended, it disposes of the whole question. Injunctions are granted to redress substantial grievances, not to gratify wounded sentiment, or punish unfair dealing. We may mention a very simple test, which does not seem to have been suggested to either Court. The Evening Post was extensively advertised for several days, if not weeks, before its first number came out. Did it occur to one person in fifty who saw the advertisement that the Morning Post was in future to have an evening edition? Surely not. As the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said in the Court of Appeal, "Everybody is aware of the existence of the "Morning Post—an old-established paper of high charac-"ter—which has existed for a great many years." Such a journal was not likely to be materially injured by a paper of totally different type and character, which, so far as we have any knowledge of its contents, is interesting chiefly to financiers. When the Morning Post did indulge in an evening, or rather an afternoon, edition, it always appeared under the same title, as indeed do the later editions, when there are any, of all the London dailies. The Evening Standard is an apparent exception. But there, although the proprietary is the same, there are special articles as well as fresh news. Nobody, we should imagine, ever supposed that the Evening News had anything to do with the Daily News, or would have thought so, even if their politics had been the same. There have been and are instances to illustrate how little there is in a name, and how a title associated with honourable independence in journalism may be dragged through the mire without the possibility of interference.

But, though the Evening Post was on this occasion the winning post, the Judges accompanied their decision with remarks suggestive of the whipping-post. Costs were refused on the ground that there was, or might have been, an intention to deceive, so that the evening and the morning did not make an altogether satisfactory day for the defendant Company. Between the judgment of Mr. Justice KAY and the postponement of the case in the Court of Appeal the incriminated journal appeared one afternoon, at all events, as the Evening ——. This pathetic and woebegone admission of anonymity, coupled with the subsequent appendix to the title "No Connexion with the Morning Post," must move the compassion of the most stony-hearted, even though the former step was taken in obedience to a legal decree, and the latter followed the very severe remarks of Lord Justice BOWEN. While the decision of the Court of Appeal is no doubt sound in law, the judgment of Lord Justice COTTON opens rather a wide door to fraud. An evening paper, he argues, cannot compete with a morning paper, because nobody would buy one instead of the other. In the first place, this is not quite an accurate statement, because many people who live in the country at some distance from a railway-station take an evening paper instead of a morning one, thereby securing a political accompaniment to their breakfast. In the second place, the reputation of newspapers varies indefinitely, and serious damage might be inflicted upon a morning paper by the indiscretion or the misconduct of an evening namesake. It is much safer, and quite sufficient, to rest the dissolution of the injunction, as Lord COLERIDGE did, upon the absence of pecuniary injury to the plaintiff. Lord Justice BOWEN ingeniously observed that, while an evening edition of the Daily News would naturally be called the Evening Daily News, the Evening Morning Post would be an impossible combination. It would not perhaps be more absurd than University College School, which is the acme of infelicitous nomenclature. Still, we agree with Lord Justice BOWEN that an oxymoron of this sort would provoke the mirth of the scoffer; and also that, as he quaintly adds, it is hard to "imagine the "portrait of a gentleman buying the Morning Post over-"night." But evening papers are, as we have already explained, sent into rural districts by what, to avoid using a word much overworked in this article, we will call Sir ROWLAND HILL's salutary invention; and it was not alleged that the respondent intended to favour the world with two Posts a day. Lord Justice BOWEN expressed his view of the matter by saying that there had been an attempt to deceive the public, but that the attempt had failed. One can scarcely help being reminded of Lord BRAMWELL's famous summing-up in the case of the farmer who saw a boy robbing his apple trees, and shot him. His defence was that he only fired to frighten the boy, and his counsel made a long speech in support of this view. Lord BRAMWELL condensed it into eight words—"The prisoner aimed at "nothing, and missed it."

TROUSERS.

THE Standard reports an agitation among Paris tailors for the redemption of (male) evening dress. If it succeeds, we are to wear knee-breeches and coloured coats in the evening. We are to be rescued from "the discreet "habiliments of the British waiter," who is, apparently, to retain them himself as a badge of humility. As the Standard editorially and sensibly remarks, this agitation, like many others, is doomed to certain failure, which all friends of men, as distinguished from friends of Man, must regret. In the first place, it has made a false start. Not Paris, but London, is the place which the civilized world (male) dresses up to. The Parisian gilt youth is a poor thing compared to our own, and knows it. Fashions in male dress often work upwards—e.g. they sometimes take their first rise in public schools—but they do not come here from France. The tailors of Paris may build green or purple dress-coats, and might even induce their customers to wear them; but the reform will not spread. Black coats and trousers will continue to prevail, and a little reflection will show how solid are the foundations of their success.

In Lord LYTTON's biography of his father, the great novelist is credited with the irresistible determination to blackness of evening dress which has since become universal. Lady FRANCES PELHAM recommended her son to wear a black coat, saying that he looked best in it, "which is a "great compliment, for people must be very distinguished "in appearance to do so." The consequence is alleged to have been that every man who thought himself very distinguished in appearance immediately got a black coat, with the general result which we are still privileged to contemplate. Whatever may be the true history of black evening coats, there can be no question as to the grounds of their persistency. They are in the long run cheap, nasty, and suited to a democratic age. To an undiscriminating eye—a female eye, for instance—they all look very much the same. Hardly any one knows at a party in the evening whether any given coat on any one else's back is fresh from the tailor's or approaching the completion of its second year. It produces an outward approximation to the Radical fallacy that one man is as good as another. For these reasons its supersession is not within the range of practical politics.

The same remarks apply with even greater force to trousers, except that the case is perhaps not quite so hopeless. Is it altogether beyond the bounds of a sober imagination that there should be a Tory reaction (in the evening) around the nether extremities of man? Knee-breeches would wear quite as well as trousers, probably better, in fact, as they would not be equally given to the loathsome vice of bagging at the knees. Silk stockings, though expensive, could not fairly be called ruinous. The practical objection to them is their philosophical recommendation. The shape of the ankle and the arch of the foot bear cogent testimony to breeding. A seemly development of the calf is a personal attraction which few of those who have it can afford to despise. But which of us have good legs and feet? At present nobody knows. It is possible to assert, with regard to some men, that their legs are extremely bad. The contrary assertion can be hazarded of the well-made only upon the strength of à superiori observation. As all cats are grey in the dark, so all legs are middling in the trouser. The base-born baronet conceals his coarsely-formed shanks as effectually as the highly-bred poet in humble circumstances hides, perhaps, the principal advantage with which Nature has endowed him. Could not a few aristocratic youths, with pretensions to be amateur pugilists, boldly array themselves in breeches, stockings, and buckles, and win from the fair that meed of praise which is surely to be had for the asking? In the daytime we make no attempt at ornament, but in the night we do at least put on clean shirts, brush our hair, and tie our white ties with more or less skill, according to whether we had or had not the advantage of being educated at Eton. All these are attempts to beautify ourselves in comparison with our less wealthy or less neat-handed fellows. It would be no more than a legitimate development of the same process for those who, like Sir WILLOUGHBY PATTERNE, the so-called Egoist, "have a leg" to take advantage of it. If any tailor could succeed in bringing about this reform, he would deserve to have a statue of himself, in knee-breeches, set up on the empty pedestal in Trafalgar Square, on alternate days with the other statue, which the Gladstonian Government is expected to erect there this summer, of Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN, M.P. —not in knee-breeches.

IRELAND.

THE Government have acted with sound judgment as well as firmness in proving to the Irish agitator that he cannot escape the penalty of violating the law by the simple expedient of crossing St. George's Channel. Mr. Cox's arrest in England has struck a blow at the trade of agitation which it will not easily survive. Its probable results are to be measured, not merely by its addition to the material difficulties which now beset the path of lawlessness, but by the moral effect of the proof which it affords that the present Government are more thoroughly in earnest in the work of re-establishing the authority of law in Ireland than any of their predecessors in Ireland. The importance of the advance which they have made in this respect can only be appreciated by those who examine the grounds of the surprise which the step has occasioned. Extreme as is the consternation produced by it, its strict legality has never been seriously questioned even by those most interested in doing so. Even the Parnellites themselves have not been heard to contend that, unexpected though it was, the arrest of Mr. Cox on English soil for an offence against the Crimes Act was not perfectly regular; and this it is which gives such significance to their astonishment. Their confident assumption that, though they might technically be apprehended in England for such offences as that committed by Mr. Cox in Ireland, they were virtually safe against arrest, is, in itself, proof of the fact that a sort of tradition of immunity from such a risk has grown up among them. And it is an excellent thing that a tradition so mischievous should be demolished once for all. Meanwhile, it is amusing enough to note the logic of the Gladstonian comments on the incident. The soil of England, complains that accomplished dialectician, Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, no longer affords to political offenders of our nationality that asylum which we keep as sacred for foreign refugees of the same description. The assumption that a violation of the Crimes Act is a political offence—an assumption denied by the Government when they arrest an offender like Mr. Cox in Ireland—is quietly taken as admitted by them when they arrest him in England. As a matter of fact, the mere circumstance that such an offender can be arrested in England, with the complete assent of the English public, is the best of all proofs that they do not regard his offence as political, or consider the "sacred right of asylum" to be in the slightest degree imperilled by his arrest. Now, however, that the Government have definitely revoked this Alsatian privilege of the agitator in one case, they should cancel it in all cases; and Mr. Cox is not the only Irish fugitive from justice to whom we have been extending our unwilling hospitality. Dr. TANNER, who appears to think that he is wanted by the police, is fatiguing Scotland Yard with requests to be arrested; and Mr. PYNE is also said to be sojourning here, under the delusion that an Englishman's house is safer than a castle at Listinny. Both these gentlemen, therefore, are candidates for precisely the same treatment as has been applied to the member for East Clare, and, as a matter of common justice to Mr. Cox, they must not be allowed to enjoy a spurious right of asylum which the Government have in his case most wisely refused to recognize.

After considerable delay, the promoters of the RIPON-MORLEY "boom"—the slang Americanism is the only fitting description of it—have allowed the result of their labours to become public. Roughly speaking, it may be said to prove that fractions, varying from one-tenth to one-fiftieth of the classes which were represented in such overwhelming strength at the reception of the Liberal-Unionist leaders, have been induced to welcome the two eminent Gladstonians who are about to pay them a visit. The general mode in which these discouraging statistics are dealt with by the Gladstonian party was admirably illustrated in the calculation of the Daily News that the ninety-eight Irish barristers who have signed the address of welcome are equal to about one-half of the practising Bar of Ireland. They are, however, less than one-tenth of the whole list of Irish barristers; and, without any evidence being adduced to show what, if any, proportion of them belong to the "practising" section of that Bar, it would be almost as relevant, as it would be quite as true, to point out that they are more than eight times as numerous as the twelve Apostles. Yet we hardly know, after all, whether the calculations of the Gladstonians on this subject are more funny than the classification which gravely enumerates the Irish "merchants" who are in sympathy with the demonstration; the enumerator being either unaware himself, or hoping to find his readers ignorant, of the fact that the word "merchant" in Ireland, as in Scotland, includes traders of every degree of importance, from the heads of the largest wholesale houses down to the village vendors of string and sugar-candy.

We must not, however, omit to notice the contribution which one of the distinguished guests has himself made to the humours of the affair. Lord RIPON on the proposed banquet is good—decidedly good. In reply to a correspondent who had addressed him on this subject, he has begged to state that "he was never invited to attend a banquet in Dublin, that he has no reason to believe that any contemplated banquet was abandoned," and that he does not give credit to the rumour that "a difficulty arose about drinking the QUEEN'S health in connexion with the approaching visit of Mr. JOHN MORLEY and myself to Dublin." That Lord RIPON was never invited to attend a banquet in Dublin is a fact of which we did not require his assurance. In stating it he is simply stating the very circumstance to which what he calls the "rumour" owes its origin. That he has "no reason to believe that any contemplated banquet was abandoned" is an adorable sentence—worthy, in its non-committing indefiniteness, of the writer's great master himself. It will be seen at once that its value depends upon two indeterminates—Lord RIPON'S idea of a "reason" and the notion which he has formed of the process of "contemplating a banquet." If he holds that the only reason for believing a banquet to have been contemplated is that he should himself have heard of it, or if he thinks that no public banquet can be described as contemplated until its promoters have made out a list of the guests, arranged with the contractors, and settled the menu, he may perhaps regard his letter as disposing finally of the rumour to which he has referred. Sceptics, however, may hint that a plan which is discussed and regarded as inadvisable before any positive step has been taken to carry it out may be very well described as having been in contemplation; and they will further suggest that, if that occurred in the present instance, Lord RIPON would have been the very last person likely to hear of it. Imagine a reception Committee writing to him in this strain:—"My Lord—We deeply regret to "inform you that the contemplated banquet to be given in "your honour has had to be abandoned by reason of the "indisposition of certain members of the Committee to "join in drinking the health of Her Majesty the QUEEN, "and the fear of others lest the same sentiment might find "pronounced expression among a still larger number of the "assembled guests. We do not hesitate to make your "lordship acquainted with this, because we feel sure that "everybody will be able to distinguish between the position "of an ex-Minister of the Crown who accepts the hospitality of men disloyal enough to hiss the name of the "QUEEN and that of one who becomes the guest of men not "sufficiently loyal to make it advisable to utter the "QUEEN'S name in their presence." If the receipt of some such communication as this is the only sort of evidence which would give Lord RIPON reason to believe that a contemplated banquet was abandoned, we can understand his incredulity. But we are not bound to share it on such grounds; nor, we believe, will it be shared by the public. After all, there is an easy way of disposing of the "rumour" of which Lord Ripon complains. Why not have a banquet?

At length, we are glad to see, steps are being taken to review the proceedings of that extraordinary tribunal which has perhaps been the means of effecting the second (or is it the third?) political conversion of Mr. Montague Cookson—the Coroner's jury at Mitchelstown. An application has been made to the Queen's Division for a certiorari to bring up and quash the verdict of this jury, on the grounds of irregularity and illegality. The affidavits aver, among other things, "that the jurors conversed and communicated "with other persons," that "the Coroner and his clerk re-"mained shut up with them while they were deliberating," and that the former of these functionaries "did not conduct "himself impartially during the inquisition." The more specific allegations are, of course, denied on oath in counter-affidavits by the Coroner; but on the last-mentioned and most important of all the points raised on the application, the English public, we suspect, have already formed their own very decided opinion.

SLAVE-GIRLS IN EGYPT.

NOTWITHSTANDING the best-meant efforts of philanthropists at home and of the executive on the spot, slavery still flourishes in the East with much the same vigour that it did one hundred years ago. The public slave marts are closed, and a dhow or two now and again falls into the hands of a cruiser, but the villages of the Equator continue to be depopulated, the harems have their full complement of unpaid menials, and the traders grow rich at the same if not at a quicker rate than formerly. And no one with any knowledge of the modes of life of the Moslem can doubt that as long as the creed of Islam exists so long will slavery be perpetuated in spite of Christianity. In theory slavery may be utterly and entirely abominable and to be repudiated, but in practice and under the domestic conditions in which it is now observed there is not so much fault to be found with it. If we were to ask those who are in the forefront of the campaign against the slave trade, the founders of slave homes, and the loudest agitators, their idea of the service they hoped to render the oppressed, we are inclined to think that some very false and exaggerated notions would be expressed. For it is the unpleasant ring of the word "slavery," recalling ghastly reminiscences of "Uncle Tom" and Cuban bloodhounds, that causes righteous hands of horror to be uplifted at its sound. The actual status, in the East, is not half so cruel as the subscribing and sympathetic British public is called on to believe. We must admit fully the barbarities perpetrated in the first procuring of the black contingent; but, when once the slave is sold and bought, her condition calls for no outside interference. The manumission is by no means an unmixed blessing, and the slave homes and refuges, so called, are useless, if not worse. A comparison between the life of a slave before and after her liberation would always, at any rate to her mind, be in favour of her first state; and if occasionally, and it is only occasionally, instances occur of persistent maltreatment, the usual position of a slave is far more comfortable than that of her toiling free sister, not merely in the East but in the West.

The English drudge rises early and goes to bed late, working eight or twelve hours a day, either in her miserable garret or in a huge manufacturing hive. Pinched with hunger and cold, worn out with labour, exposed to temptation and degradation, her joyless life stretches behind her and before her, with no pleasures to look back upon, no hope to look forward to. The wages she earns, those wages which proudly separate her from the slave, are barely sufficient to keep body and soul together, till at last the body gives way or the soul revolts. Then comes the inevitable end, and a verdict of "Death from starvation" or "Found drowned" closes the scene. The Soudâni girl is taken from her parental hut of sticks and mud and sold to a respectable family or perhaps a very rich one. In the first case, she will probably be alone; in the second, she will find others like herself. She represents so much capital invested, and is looked after with equivalent care. She is a servant whose wages have been paid twenty years in advance. It is true they have not been paid to her, but that is all the better for the girl. She is well housed and well fed, and wants for nothing. She is immediately provided with decent clothes and set to house work. She has charge of the family washing and cleaning and of the kitchen, and generally fulfils these duties much better than a native paid servant would do. She is under no special restraint, accompanies her mistress shopping or does the marketing herself, and gossips her fill with the neighbours as she hangs out the linen on the house-top, or sweeps the front door-step. Her work is by no means hard, and after the fashion of Egypt, where every man is a brother and every woman a sister, she is looked upon by the family quite as one of themselves. Speaking from personal observation, we may affirm that the black women are almost invariably treated with the utmost kindness and indulgence, and are often spoilt like children by the too great good nature of their masters or mistresses. They constitute a very merry, happy portion of the population, and it is seldom one can find a black girl without an infectious broad grin on her polished face. If she chooses to marry, as she often does, with her owner's consent, she receives a dower, and goes forth a "free" woman in the letter, though often, as she finds to her cost, a greater bondslave in the spirit than in the days of her servitude. Now let us go a step higher in the social scale, and place the middle-class English girl, compelled to work for her living, side by side with the Circassian, and we shall find again that all material advantages, of which alone we speak, are not on the side of the free. We need not trace the English picture of a well-born daughter of a clergyman or officer reduced to fight the world. It is probably familiar to all. The life of the white slave, though, will call for a sketch to dispel popular delusions. The Circassian is a little fair-haired lass from a far village in Turkestan (pace Dr. Tanner). Her father is a robber or a herdsman, and she will perhaps be a princess. The Prince Charming whom the governess is always looking for, but who never comes, is a very strong potentiality in the future of the white slave-girl. One day a bearded and venerable old Turk arrives from Stamboul, and picks out our little girl. She is not carried away by force, but gold is counted out, and she is perched on a mule, and bids good-bye for ever to barbarism. The purchaser takes every imaginable pains with her education and her appearance. She is taught to read and write, to dance and sing, to embroider in silk, and play the guitar, and further initiated into all the mysteries of the toilet. When she has grown into budding womanhood, the dealer lets his best customers know that he possesses a treasure almost priceless, and all her virtues and beauties are detailed with the usual Oriental exaggeration. Finally, some royal princess or rich pasha's wife expresses a wish to see her, and extra care having been taken with her bath and dress she is presented for inspection. From long preparation and jealous guarding from the sun she has a skin white as milk, and her naturally beautiful type of face is adorned with the usual tints of kohl to the eyebrows and eyelashes, and rouge to the full red lips. Her exquisitely shaped nails glow with henna, and her own luxuriant hair is intertwined with meshes of silk (for the Prophet curses "women who join their own hair to that of another, or that of another to their own") till it reaches her ankles in an uneven number of tails, an even number being forbidden. She gives samples of her accomplishments, musical, gymnastic, and otherwise. Accepted, she is at once clothed with a rich silk dress, and receives a present of a necklace or bracelet as an earnest of favour before she joins her fellow slaves. Beyond assisting her mistress in the toilet, accompanying her in her drives, and handing her coffee and cigarettes, she has little to do. She is an ornamental appendage rather than a servant. A household such as one of these Circassians would enter would contain a crowd of men servants and black women to do the work, and perhaps ten to twenty other girls like herself, and a very gay time they have together. The great ladies are very fond of exchanging visits and giving musical entertainments, at all of which some of the slave-girls attend. When she goes out with her mistress in the natty little brougham, almost the only difference between the lady and the maid lies in the former taking the right-hand seat. The girl is dressed in a way to do credit to the house she belongs to, and often sparkles with jewels, chatting freely with everybody at the places she visits, and enjoying herself as fully as any of the emancipated. When the time comes for her to be married, her owner chooses a suitable husband and gives a rich dower, and many of the marriages of slave-girls eclipse in magnificence those of even the wealthier classes. The erstwhile barefooted, ragged little Circassian from Turcoman's Land is now a princess or pasha's wife, with slaves of her own; but she would laugh if you suggested to her that there was anything degrading in their position or had been in her own. The degradation and the hardship are simply ideas formed in ignorance of the facts and conditions of Oriental domestic life, and have no place in reality. Of course there is another side to the picture, but even that is not a very dark one. The girl may fall under the displeasure of the master or mistress, and will then get punished. She may be locked up for a few hours, or, if her mistress is hot-tempered, have her hair pulled and receive a sounding box on the ear. Perhaps in very rare and extreme cases a severe beating may be administered; but the same might, and would, often happen in the case of a paid servant. A reconciliation, however, shortly takes place, and the peace is cemented with a present of a new dress or trinket.

The foregoing is not by any means a blinking of the truth or a high-coloured picture of the pleasant side of a slave's life. In the face of such facts, we cannot wonder that our efforts to rescue the imaginary victims from houses of bondage which only exist in our own ideas meet with but scant appreciation. There is not a slave in Egypt who would not prefer the servitude of the harem to the freedom of the Slaves' Home. Instances have occurred, and may occur again, where a woman has fled from a brutal master or mistress; but the argument drawn from such an one case will not hold good against the system. No one will deny that the slavery which Englishmen and Englishwomen detest is a hateful institution; but the slavery of Egypt is not that slavery. The cruelty is practised before the slavery begins. It is in providing slaves that the atrocious iniquities of the trade lie. If we could stop the trader on the sources of the Nile we should be rendering real service to our fellow-creatures. But our own agents have long since convinced themselves that it is impossible to crush out the evil at its root; and, this being so, we can but repeat that we only do harm both to ourselves and to the slaves by attempting to interfere with the existing relations, once established, between them and their masters and mistresses. As far as the question of white slaves can be treated—and it is always a delicate ground to venture on—very little can be advanced in favour of any change in their circumstances.

The history of modern Egypt since the days of Mohamed Ali, when it began, is intimately bound up with the Circassian element, and the finer characteristics of courage and energy to be found to-day amongst the reigning and higher families are derived from the stock of slaves. It is but a very short while ago that one of the royal blood married his slave; numerous instances could be cited where former slaves rule the households of the foremost and best-known names in Egypt. In England, a man who marries his housekeeper is considered to have committed the unspeakable sin. In Cairo, it is the commonest of all occurrences. Where there are no paid women-servants the slaves naturally become very intimate with, if not close confidantes of, their mistresses. The head slave, or kehia, has a position which the most trusted English salaried housekeeper might envy. She is consulted, not only on every detail of household management, when these are not left entirely to her own discretion, but her advice is taken on every conceivable difficulty connected with estates, money-raising, marriage, and so on, and any one wishing to approach her mistress does so through the kehia. Something very like the Married Women's Property Act has always been in force amongst Mussulmans, and every lady of position has considerable responsibilities of her own. These are all shared by her slaves, whose opinion is invited or given very freely in every emergency. Of course countless opportunities arise for enriching herself to the favourite slaves. She can introduce the itinerant merchant with French goods to be sold at exorbitant prices, on all of which she takes her commission. She whispers stories of a gorgeous diamond tiara, or pearl necklace, which would just suit her lady's wants and quite outshine So-and-so Khanem's. Or a carriage and pair may be in the market, or a superlatively skilled wise woman to work a charm. For every introduction or transaction she can claim her percentage, and ordinary wages would shrink into nothingness beside the presents and commissions of the slave. Life in a harem as a servant is not without its solid advantages, even though we call it slavery.

THE IRVING-SHAXPER CONSPIRACY.

WE really do not know what the Bacon Society (whose President is Mr. A. A. Watts—not the original "Alaric Attila Watts whose verses were just like the pans and the pots," but another than he—whose Committee bear the world-known names of Samuel Beeley, Alexander Cory, Francis Fearon, and Ernest Jacob, Esquires, which publishes with Mr. Redway, of York Street, a journal, appearing, as it states itself with a wise vagueness, "periodically," and which rejoiceth in the membership of the inimitable Mrs. Henry Pott) would think of Mr. Churton Collins. But all readers of the Daily News already know what Mr. Churton Collins would think of the Bacon Society. It appeared to Mr. Collins that there was "an impression" that he was going to lecture at Toynbee Hall on Bakespearism, and he was justly anxious that this impression should not eclipse the gaiety of nations. Therefore, perhaps having in his brush with Mr. Swinburne some time ago caught a little of Mr. Swinburne's controversial style, Mr. Collins hastened to reassure the public by informing it that "he should no more think of insulting an audience by discussing such trash than he should think of insulting them by discussing the chattering of any ape or the gibbering of any idiot with whom he might happen to have been brought into contact." Now perhaps it may be thought, though we are not very far from agreeing with Mr. Collins about the trash, that his way of dealing with it is a little too much in Ercles' vein. At any rate, the vein adopted by one Henry Irving, of the Lyceum Theatre, London, England, as reported by a Chicago interviewer, seems to incline to milder measures. It will be at once granted that there can be no fitter place than Chicago for a discussion about Bacon; but we own to slight qualms about this interview. Either the reporter has adapted the language considerably, or Mr. Irving has, in compliment to his present audiences, come to speak American with an art consummate even for him. If some brief months ago he had been asked, "Mr. Irving, on your honour and conscience, what is a boodler?" he would probably have replied that it is an affectionate name given by themselves to the members of a certain ancient London club. Here he uses it in some remote American sense, a sense which it is not lawful to mention. "Chicken and champagne" by a delicate suffusion of local colour becomes "turkey lunch and champagne," and we could mention other suspicious circumstances; but these will be enough to show that we approach the question in a properly sceptical and critical spirit, and not merely, as the Journal of the Bacon Society (published periodically) says, with our "psychic retreat full of determination to smash up the whole Baconian structure." Sometimes we are even inclined to think this interview with Mr. Irving a part of the Great American Joke. It is not a bad part, however, and certain ironic comments on the way in which actors and dramatists love one another are not ill put in Mr. Irving's mouth. But the point of the whole is that Mr. Irving is represented, not like Mr. Churton Collins, reading the part of Shakspeare-defender, of apologist of "the malt manufacturer" (as the Bakespearians say), as a part to tear a cat in, but as an opportunity for jocking. Neither is this improbable; for Mr. Irving—God rest his soul!—is far from being an unmerry man.

It will be obvious, however, to every one that, whether the interview be genuine or not, Mr. Irving can never, in the eyes of any true Bakespearian, be a valid witness against Shacon. For, of course, he takes the part of his brother-player, manager, lessee, and what not. They are all in a tale, these robustious, periwig-pated fellows. Let us, therefore, produce from our own psychic retreat a few confirmations of Bakespearism conceived in the same vein as the Chicago deliverances, and, indeed, as the illustrations which issued from that nest of spicery our inner consciousness (see Journal of Bacon Society again) on a former occasion. We cannot pretend to do the thing so naturally as the true Bakespearians, who, for instance, make out of the well-known epitaph (why not out of the alphabet simply?) "Fra. Ba. Wrt. ear. ay.," which, it must be plain to any one, means "Francis Bacon wrote Shakspeare's plays." That is too clever for us; we must fly on less ambitious pinions. Still we may contribute something. For instance, there is a well-known and beautiful poem attributed to an ancestor of the present Prime Minister:—

> Happy, happy, happy Fly!
> Would I were you and you were I!
> But you will always be a Fly,
> And I remain Lord S-l-sb-ry.

Now if any one remembers that the original Lord Salisbury WAS A COUSIN OF BACON'S, he will see that this quatrain, though, no doubt, properly attributed to a holder of that title, is far older than its putative author. It was the original Robert Cecil who wrote it. "Fly" and Francis both begin with F; besides, Lord Salisbury knew that his cousin was "fly" to many things, including the authorship of Shakspeare. The second line clearly refers to the Bakespearian imbroglio. "Would I were you and you were I" implies "You are Shakspeare and Shakspeare you." This first couplet shows a mild and melting mood. But the impossibility of attaining his wish then strikes the noble poet, and he ends bitterly. And that was why he never would give Bacon anything!

We have put this first because it is, we believe, entirely new, and suggests a new line of inquiry. In the older and almost inexhaustible quarry of the works themselves, it is sufficient to indicate a single class only of the myriad indications which will reward the search of open-minded men. Only the pudibundity of the Editor of this Review prevents us from at once vindicating, not of course the profligate malt manufacturer, but the Great F. B., from an imputation often thrown upon him in reference to a scene of Henry V. It will be seen by any one who thinks that the words unjustly taken as equivocal are equivocal, but in another sense, and prove the Baconian authorship just down to the ground. Mr. Irving—the Chicago Mr. Irving—has demonstrated that Prospero is Mr. Donnelly, and he is no doubt quite right. But Prospero must be Shakspeare also (in this game you can be any number of gentlemen at once). For, note the epilogue:—

> But release me from my bands
> By the help of your good hands.

That is, find out my cryptogram and get rid of that rascal Shaxper.

> Let your indulgence set me free.

The last verse, remember, of what some people call the last play (of course it was, because it is printed first), the final words of Shacon. Indeed, as Mr. Donnelly has dealt with The Tempest he has very likely proved this before us—but again that does not matter. This Tempest epilogue, however, which every one must have noticed, put us upon a very interesting track. It is always in the epilogues, or final speeches, that these hints occur, which is just what we should expect. Colonel H. L. Moore, of Lawrance, Kansas, U.S., has beautifully worked this out as to the Winter's Tale, where Bacon, it seems, is Hermione stepping down from the pedestal. But we have gone right through the plays, as true workers should. And here is the result.

In the Two Gentlemen of Verona the word "discovered" is actually (there is no deception) the last word of the third line from the end. The extreme propriety of the present day requires the exact last words of the Merry Wives to be veiled; but it is sufficient to say that the union of Master Brook with Mistress Ford therein described plainly figures the future junction of the disguised author with his own and real works. Twelfth Night ends, after an allusion to "other habits" which is clear enough, with Feste's song, and if that is not conclusive, we should like to know what is. "A great while ago the world began" could only have been written by a natural philosopher of deep learning; and if the second stanza does not mean that Bacon could not get the promotion he wanted in his early manhood, why Mr. Donnelly is one Dutchman and we are another, and there's an end of it. As for Measure for Measure, it is really too clear, just as the Badians were too brave:—

> So bring us to the palace, where we'll show
> What's yet behind that's meet you all should know.

To wit, the Bakespearian identity. Much Ado is a little, but only a very little, more cryptic; the flight of John, and Benedick's "I'll devise thee brave punishments for him," referring to the unmasking of the Stratforder. The whole of the Midsummer Night's Dream is a mere allegory of the Bakespearian-Shaconian imbroglio; but we rather incline to see in the final speech of Puck—"and Robin shall restore amends"—an attempt of the impudent maltster to deprecate the author's wrath. The end of Love's Labour's Lost—"The words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo" (Mrs. Pott ?)—need no comment; they simply must mean "what a bore it is to have to go back to Chancery after writing nice plays!" The jests of Gratiano at the close of The Merchant only mask the real clue, Portia's

> Charge us there upon inter'gatories,
> And we shall answer all things faithfully, as he is now doing to Mr. Donnelly.

Turn to As You Like It. "If I were a woman," says Rosalind. And Bacon was not a woman! "'Tis no more unhandsome than to see the lord the prologue." Evidence that Bacon, foreknowing his peerage, tried to show that there was no harm in the connexion with theatres. All's Well that Ends Well speaks for itself:—the "ending" is now at hand; while "the king's a beggar now the play is done" clearly refers to the dethronement of Shaxper. The Taming of the Shrew is a little more difficult. But it is a fact that the last couplet with the stage direction before and after it contain every letter necessary to make up "Shakspeare," "Shaxper," and "Bacon." The Comedy of Errors is another title-speaking play, and the end is very curious:—

> We came into the world like brother and brother,
> And now let's go hand in hand, not one before the other.

This is very interesting and susceptible of divers interpretations. The English Histories generally speak sun-clear, as we believe some folks say. "We invite to see us crowned at Scone," says Malcolm, and it would be an insult to explain that reference to the future triumph of Bacon. The Bastard's "Come the four corners of the world in arms, And we shall shock them," is again eloquent. For has not all the world been shocked by Bakespearian boldness? "This untimely bier" at the end of Richard II. has been explained by some as a gibe at the malt manufacturer and his well-known drunken habits. But the meadows themselves have drunk enough. The rest of this remarkable chain of evidence, which simply does for Shaxper, shall be for another day.

STAGE SCIENCE.

IV.

GUSTAVO MODENA, who was probably the greatest tragic actor Italy has produced in this century, used to say that all who intend embracing the dramatic profession should first learn the arts of dancing and pantomime. He was himself, in youth, famous as a dancer, could execute the most difficult steps and pas with finished skill and grace, could, moreover, fence to perfection, and was celebrated throughout Italy for his knowledge of every kind of sword exercise. He began by teaching the very few pupils he ever condescended to take—among whom Salvini was the most famous—how to walk the stage, and then all sorts of bodily exercises. He would make a pupil express the various passions by movements of the face and by gestures without utterance. Like Garrick, this magnificent actor could in a moment simulate almost any emotion. It will be remembered that when David Garrick supped with Mlle. Clairon in Paris, and was asked to give a sample of his skill, he did not speak, but pantomimed, in so admirable a manner that he clearly conveyed the scene he was enacting to the mind of every one present. Another instance of the effect of pantomime is related in the life of the elder Vestris. Happening to be at a party, he was asked "to oblige," and without the least preparation went through the agonies of a person stricken with apoplexy. So realistic was the exhibition that when he rolled off his seat in convulsions all, including a celebrated physician, thought that he was indeed ill, and, horrified, rushed to his assistance. He merely rose, laughed, and sat down again. Mme. Marcheroni, the teacher of Mme. Ristori, first made her pupils walk before they attempted elocution; and indeed all the great foreign teachers of the dramatic art have pursued this plan, accompanying it, of course, by serious studies in reading and vocal culture.

The art of stage-dancing must not be confounded with that of the mere learning of the steps of modern drawing-room dances. It is most complicated, may best be described as the art of using the limbs gracefully, and is indeed a branch of gymnastics. It formed in the middle ages, and during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries a prominent feature in the education of persons of rank, and even the gloomy Philip II. of Spain "danced," we are told, with great grace, and practised this art for several hours in each week. It may appear incredible at the present day, but this grave monarch actually, at an assembly during the famous Council of Trent, opened a kind of State ball with the Cardinal of Mantua. The King and his Eminence, to the accompaniment of a stately measure, passed down the centre of a long hall lined with prelates and nobles. "Every one was ravished with the grace of the King's steps, and with the dignified deportment of the Cardinal." Those who have read the Abbé Liszt's Life of Chopin will remember his description of the polonaise, a dance which in former times began every State ceremony in Poland. Not only was it executed by cavaliers and courtly dames, but by prelates in their robes and knights in armour and even on horseback. In the first quarter of this century dancing, with the disappearance of the gavotte and minuet, ceased to be an art, excepting as regards the pirouetting of ballet-dancers.

The public of a theatre expects from the actor perfection. An awkward movement or gesture is at once detected and criticized; and yet how few of our actors make a thorough study of the great helps which are afforded them by the kind of study to which we have referred. Mme. Bernhardt said recently that it took her two years' hard work, at the rate of many hours a day, to acquire that graceful stage walk for which she is so distinguished. She also remarked that she had scarcely seen a dozen men or women in her life who knew how to come down a staircase with grace and dignity—a much more difficult feat than is usually imagined. To walk the stage well requires immense practice. Many think they can learn it by going upon the stage for some months among the "supers." This is a mistake; for, unless they are taught by a competent teacher, they will never master this arduous, but apparently trivial, art. It is an old practice to walk with great swiftness whilst carrying a pitcher on the head brimful of water, without spilling a drop. Traces of this still exist, especially in Italy and the East, where the women can be seen carrying from the well, up and down a steep hill, a pitcher full of water upon their heads, with such a steady and stately step that it is a marvel to behold.

In reading the lives of those English actors who have most distinguished themselves, we perceive that they have paid particular attention to pantomime. In the last century Macklin established a kind of school of elocution in London, and included amongst his pupils some of the best actors of his time. He had a large garden with three long parallel walks in it, up and down which he used to parade his pupils, who "had to walk firmly, slow and well" on the two side-walks, whilst he himself was in the centre one directing them; and although Mr. Garrick had good reason not to love Macklin, he nevertheless was pleased to say on more than one occasion that he could recognize Macklin's pupils by their admirable walk and by the grace of their movements. We have already said how close a student of the art of pantomime was Garrick. He used to boast that he could play a part and produce the greatest interest in the audience without speaking a single line; but in the last century "deportment" was studied much more assiduously than it is now, as it was impossible without a perfect knowledge of it to acquire the formal bows and curtseys which were then obligatory in good society. Colley Cibber tells us of Booth that he spared no pains or expense to get the best prints and engravings of original pictures and statues, and before these "he would pass hours, borrowing attitudes which he so judiciously introduced, so finely executed, and fell into with such easy transition, that these masterpieces of his art seemed a piece of his nature." In Mme. Ristori's recently-published Memoirs, that great actress relates that nearly all her attitudes in Medea were selected from the marvellous Niobe group in the Uffizi Palace, Florence.

From these observations and facts it must become evident to the intending student of the dramatic art that, if he wishes to be proficient, he must learn to walk before he attempts to leap. His earliest duty is to acquire a perfect knowledge of his physical capabilities, and frankly admit to himself what parts they are best suited for. At first vanity may be wounded; but, in the end, the wisdom of choosing only such characters for which face and figure are best adapted will meet its reward. It is of no use attempting to play Hercules when one has the stature of a dwarf. The public expects from the actor an ideal impersonation, and will scarce endure him, however great may be his talent, in a performance for which his physical qualifications are by no means suited.

HONITON LACE.

OWING to a serious depression in Honiton lace-making, a great effort is being made to revive the industry, and in consequence of a letter addressed to the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, he directed that a preliminary investigation of the subject should be made by Mr. Alan Cole, of the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, who has for the last three years been officially employed in connexion with Irish lace. From his Report on Honiton lace there seem to be two perfectly distinct causes for the falling off of the industry, apart from the universal depression in trade, the first of which to our mind is by far the most serious—i.e. the want of young and rising workers. The Education Act, the Factories Act, &c., are chiefly responsible; for, unless some provision is made in the elementary schoolchildren's time, it is impossible for the young generation to learn lacemaking, and it must become extinct with the death of the present workers. Surely where there is some special industry like this lacemaking in a particular district, the Education Act might be made elastic enough to allow some part of the time devoted to needlework to be given to the special industry of the locality, followed up by technical schooling. The elements of this lacemaking must be taught to children when quite young, in order to make their fingers supple; for, after they have left school, they can never hope to attain to anything but the making of coarse and low-priced lace. We should think this might easily be managed after the first start without entailing extra expense or overworking the already hard-worked mistress. The monitresses in village schools are generally only the elder local children, and they, having learnt themselves elementary lace-making in the school, could easily undertake to teach the younger children; moreover the neatness and dexterity required would be a help instead of a hindrance to the needlework. That some arrangement of this kind is essential to keep up the manufacture is proved by the fact that, out of the twelve hundred (in rough numbers) of lacemakers still at work in the district, almost all are middle-aged and old women. In olden days even the men made lace between times of work, particularly in the fishing villages. This is now a case of "old times are changed, old manners gone."

The second cause for the depression is the want of good designs. This might be met by private help in addition to public assistance from the Science and Art Department, which might provide good patterns, also institute prizes and organize opportunities of exhibition, although, curiously enough, the Exhibition of 1851 did more harm than good. A rage for cheapness was started, and a rivalry to the machine-made laces, which could not succeed in the long run, and only produced an inferior and ill-paid quality, which went far to destroy the prestige of Honiton lace. A confirmation of this is found in Mr. Cole's Report, in the fact that now the trade in well-made lace is apparently the most flourishing; but it is only limited to a few workers, as it requires "cultivated intelligence and considerable enterprise to keep it alive." The poorer and less educated peasants have got into a slovenly way of working, using coarse thread, and are very averse to changing their patterns; whereas from the nature of pillow-made laces the old pricked patterns, however good originally, must in the course of time become stretched and contorted out of all shape. Some of the better lacemakers are not only capable of making exquisitely beautiful Honiton point, but are able to imitate the finest Flemish point or anything else required. This is not as generally known as it ought to be; for when a specimen of lace was sent in 1871 to Guildford at the Bath and West of England Show, it was refused a prize, as the judges would not be persuaded that it was made at Honiton, although the workers offered to make a piece before them; they had, however, some months after to acknowledge their error.

Honiton lace has a curious chequered history with many fluctuations. It is said to have been first introduced by the Flemings, who took refuge in England to escape the persecutions of the Duke of Alva. Many Flemish names are still to be found in the neighbourhood of Honiton—namely, Stocker, Murch, Maynard, Trump, &c. In 1660 there was such a demand for it that France thought it necessary to issue a royal ordinance providing that a mark should be affixed to imported English thread lace. Two great fires at Honiton in 1756 and 1767 gave the first great check to its production. Queen Adelaide tried to revive it after twenty years of severe depression by ordering a skirt, made of sprigs, copies of natural flowers, commencing with the initials of her name; for a very debased and hideous set of patterns had come in. This does not seem to have produced a great revival of the trade, and when our present Queen required her wedding lace, it was found difficult to provide the workers; but eventually a dress worth 1,000*l.* was made at the small fishing village of Beer. The English Royal Family have been most constant patrons of Honiton lace, and have done immense good in keeping the trade alive. We will end by quoting a few quaint words from Fuller's Devonshire Worthies, which sum up the plea for the revival:—"Hereby many children who otherwise would be burthensome to the parish prove beneficial to their parents. Yea, many lame in their limbs, and impotent in their arms, if able in their fingers, gain a livelihood thereby; not to say that it saveth many thousands of pounds yearly, formerly sent over seas to fetch lace in Flanders."

A SCRAP OF PAPER.

THE revival of what may be called the Court Theatre version of Mr. Palgrave Simpson's adaptation of Sardou's play, Les Pattes de Mouche, at the St. James's Theatre is more interesting than such performances usually are. This is, no doubt, largely owing to the reappearance of Mr. and Mrs. Kendal in the parts which they sustained with success some twelve years ago at the Court Theatre, and the opportunity it affords of contrasting Mr. Hare's interpretation of the character of Dr. Penguin—the old fool of the piece—with his former admirable rendering of Archie Hamilton, who has even greater claim to be styled the young fool. But it seems worth while to consider the play somewhat closely. It differs very materially in sentiment and character from the farcical comedies which have become popular during the decade that has passed since its last revival. Like most plays adapted from the French, the motif has been allowed to become dangerously weak in fitting it for the English stage. This is very noticeable in what is meant to be the strong situation of the play in the second act. The heroine, Susan Hartley, is here supposed to compromise herself, in order to divert the suspicion of her cousin's jealous husband. In the English version her sacrifice simply consists in saying that she had written the love-letter to Colonel Blake three years before; this does not seem to us to amount to absolute heroism, though it was certainly very kind on her part. The original adaptation—which was first produced, we believe, about twenty-seven years ago—does not depart so far from the French as does the present version. It is not possible to judge from reading the early play-book whether the alterations, which were introduced when the piece was recast for the Court company in 1876, were improvements or otherwise; the reason for some of them, however, is not very apparent. The piece affords a striking instance of the fact that a dramatic author may, even in a play of this class, violate probability and dramatic propriety to some extent, and yet obtain a genuine success. A Scrap of Paper does both of these things, and yet it has held the stage and seems likely to hold it for some time to come. It is really the same story as Edgar Allan Poe's Purloined Letter, with differences of course. We are asked to believe that Susan Hartley—a clever, but not extraordinarily clever, woman of the world—possesses the detective abilities of the Chevalier Dupin, the hero of the Purloined Letter, and that Colonel Blake, a most ordinary person, has talents comparable to those of the astute minister in the same tale. The humour which introduces Colonel Blake, arrayed in flannels, carrying a Japanese parasol and fan in the morning and crouching over a fire in an enormous fur dressing-gown on the afternoon of the same day, is of a very poor quality. The same remark applies to the clumsy device resorted to in the last act of making Dr. Penguin, a harmless old naturalist, get drunk at dinner. This is the less pardonable because it is absolutely unnecessary, and the matter is not mended by the accentuation which Mr. Hare gives to the scene. All these things, however, might be forgiven were it not for the tedious love-making of the boy, Archie Hamilton. The farcical incident of his challenge to Colonel Blake to fight a duel makes too great a demand on our credulity, and is very much out of place in a piece with so much pretension to pure comedy as this one. But all these faults, which are evident enough, have been so skilfully glossed over by the dramatist that the piece plays well.

To turn to the consideration of the interpretation of the various characters of the piece by the present company at the St. James's, it may be said that Mrs. Kendal, in the character of Susan Hartley, and Mr. Hare, in that of Dr. Penguin, in some sense overshadow the rest of the actors and actresses engaged in the play. In the case of the latter, the interest attaching to his reappearance is mainly owing to the position he occupies in his profession; for the part of Dr. Penguin is in no way worthy of Mr. Hare's abilities. It must be borne in mind, however, that he has won his present position to some extent by the skill he has shown in giving marked individuality and importance to small characters. For our part, we cannot remember ever having seen him appear to less advantage than on the present occasion. Mrs. Kendal is an actress who possesses a considerable talent and a considerable experience, and she has enough of the former to make us forget that twelve years have elapsed since she gained the applause of the audience at the Court Theatre by her clever impersonation of Susan Hartley. She has seldom been so happily suited with a part, her many excellent qualities as an actress being brought into prominence, while little opportunity is offered to her for the exercise of those unfortunate mannerisms which mar her art. As for the Colonel Blake of Mr. Kendal, it is in no way distinguished. Mr. Kendal lacks the power of varied facial expression which is indispensable to any actor who would play a part of this kind with complete success. Mr. Herbert Waring's Sir John Ingram is most unsatisfactory; his stiffness is the stiffness of a stage policeman, not that of an English country gentleman. Mrs. Gaston Murray resumes the part of Mrs. Penguin, and acts as well as ever. The Lucy Franklin of Miss Blanche Horlock is spoilt by over self-consciousness; while Mr. Burleigh's rendering of Archie Hamilton is simply impossible. On the other hand, it would be difficult to praise Mrs. Beerbohm Tree's Lady Ingram too highly; from an artistic point of view, she fairly carries off the honours of the performance.

MR. GOSCHEN AND MR. GLADSTONE.

THE advice which Swift gives to practitioners of the art of political lying may be commended to the assailants of Mr. Goschen. Not that they are guilty of direct mendacity. The milder manners and the more sensitive and subtle conscience of the statesmen of our time confine themselves to insinuation and innuendo. But the principle of prudence which should regulate their course is the same. Swift advises his pupils to have some regard to probability in their falsehoods. Statesmen notoriously frugal may be safely charged with niggardly cheeseparing; a man conspicuously religious, with base and grovelling superstition. But to make similar charges against politicians notoriously lavish in expenditure or sceptical in matters of faith would be simply to waste useful falsehood. A mistake akin to this is made by Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt when they accuse Mr. Goschen of laxity of principle, of a readiness to sacrifice conviction to office, and a disposition to surrender his own opinions to the views of others. Against charges of this kind his defence at Hastings on Tuesday was easy. His whole life is his defence, and a much more complete one than any which he could put into words. If his assailants had accused him of a too rigid inflexibility of character, of a doctrinaire disposition to insist upon comparatively insignificant trifles, of an imperfect recognition of the degree in which every public man who is to act with others must waive minor points of disagreement, in order to give effect to a larger concord, they might have made out a more plausible case against him. The charge against Mr. Goschen used to be that he was too much of a critic and objector to be able to play successfully the great part in political life for which he was otherwise qualified. He was suspected of being impracticable and crotchety; he did not recognize with sufficient distinctness the expediency of being on the winning side. In 1878 Mr. Goschen renounced his candidature for the City of London, and the absolute certainty of re-election, on the ground of his disapproval of the proposed extension of the County Franchise. He declined an important place in Mr. Gladstone's second Administration from similar scruples with respect to certain received points of the Ministerial policy. No one has better reason than Mr. Gladstone to know that Mr. Goschen does not possess that manageable conscience which at the present time seems to be one of the most essential conditions, among Liberal statesmen, of a successful career. It was quite possible that when Mr. Goschen declined to associate himself with the Liberal leader and Liberal majority of 1880 he was sacrificing not only a Ministerial but a Parliamentary career. He was certainly at a critical time of life indefinitely adjourning opportunities on the repetition of which no politician can count.

In these circumstances the attacks which Mr. Gladstone has made upon the political and personal honour of Mr. Goschen are singularly unbecoming; but, in spite of the doctrine of Swift, they have a certain prudence and dexterity of their own. Mr. Goschen's strength with the country is quite as much moral as intellectual. A great part of it is due to the belief which Englishmen have in his clear discernment of principle and his practical fidelity to it. To shake this conviction in them would be to discredit him, and to weaken the authority of the Government to which he belongs. To this task Mr. Gladstone therefore applied himself in the speech at Dover, with which he bade a temporary farewell to English politics, and discharged himself of the polemical feelings which might otherwise have disturbed the sacred peace of his retreat at Florence. We are quite ready to admit that Mr. Gladstone is an authority on the subject of want of political principle. "The puppy!" said Wilkes, of some audacious intruder into his own particular province, "does he fancy that I don't know what blasphemy is a great deal better than he does?" One of Mr. Gladstone's most eminent colleagues who has now joined that majority whose numbers are always on the increase was in the habit of saying that Mr. Gladstone was constitutionally incapable of even understanding what was meant by a principle. He did not speak as a moralist, or in any vein of ethical condemnation. He did not mean that Mr. Gladstone was unprincipled in that loose sense of the word in which it is used to express conscious dishonesty, but simply that he was without those fixed and ruling ideas which, however much they may be suspended or qualified in their application, have always swayed the conduct of great statesmen. Mr. Gladstone through his public life has been a man of political accommodation and management, and probably in this sense he may dispute with Walpole and with Peel the claim to be the greatest member of Parliament that ever lived. He is a statesman of ways and means. His aims have been those on which the majority of the present moment or the near future was obviously bent; and he has shown an unrivalled ingenuity in recommending them in debate, and giving effect to them in legislative detail. He is ready to welcome the doctrines of political economy or to banish them to Jupiter or Saturn as the exigency of the time may require; and as he treats political economy so he has treated most of the received principles on which sound legislation is based. Mr. Gladstone's foresight has seldom looked beyond the existing House of Commons and the next general election; and his measures have been framed primarily to pass through Parliament, and only secondarily to accomplish the ends at which they were ostensibly directed. This temporizing habit of mind and character has been greatly facilitated and encouraged by Mr. Gladstone's unrivalled faculty of making believe. He can always half persuade himself, or sometimes wholly persuade himself, that he really entertains the convictions which it is his business to impress upon others. It is one of the commonplaces of psychology and of ordinary observation that, by exhibiting the gestures and using the tones of excited feeling, the feeling which is at first merely assumed may be actually created. The cause and the effect change places; and what in the natural order of things are merely the signs of emotion may themselves create an emotion which did not exist. The process of working oneself into a passion is a familiar one; the process of working oneself into a conviction is scarcely less common; and Mr. Gladstone habitually displays it in the House of Commons and on public platforms. His thrilling tones and vehement gestures are not usually the expression of a deep-seated belief, but the instruments by which he excites and maintains in himself a superficial and momentary belief.

Mr. Gladstone's attacks on Mr. Goschen's easiness of conscience in political matters probably spring in some small degree from a certain uneasiness of conscience on his part; and it is possible that even Sir William Harcourt's ruder onslaughts are due to the imperfect rudiments of a moral faculty which finds itself rebuked by Mr. Goschen's straightforwardness and integrity of mind and character. They desire to show that, after all, the man of scrupulous consistency is not more scrupulous and consistent than themselves. But another motive which Mr. Goschen has correctly discerned probably dictated his old chief's attack upon him. A very close and intimate observer of Mr. Gladstone's character and conduct, both in council and in Parliament, said that there were only two men, or types of men, whom he habitually considered—the man who could be of most use to him, and the man who could be of most hindrance to him. If he cannot win over the second, he sets himself to disparage and, in a political sense, to destroy him. Mr. Goschen acquits Mr. Gladstone of any personal rancour towards himself. The recklessness with which he pursues his adversaries "has never," Mr. Goschen says, "been the recklessness of a man who wished to wound his opponents, but that of a man who, if he could, would shatter the authority which stood in his way"—"the recklessness of a man who is determined to win at all hazards." From the first moment of his adoption of a Separatist policy Mr. Gladstone has seen in Mr. Goschen one of the main obstacles in the way of its accomplishment. Two years ago Mr. Goschen spoke at Hastings, and referred to the manifesto which Mr. Gladstone had just issued in preparation for the impending general election. That manifesto had been put into Mr. Goschen's hands, he says, half an hour before he spoke. He noticed that, while Mr. Gladstone insisted strongly on the maintenance of union between England and Ireland, he said nothing of the necessity of preserving the legislative union between the two countries, and he himself emphatically supplied the omission. "Unity," he said, "is not enough, for there might be simple unity under the Crown. There must be legislative unity between the two countries." In ordinary political language, unity or union between England and Ireland means legislative union; and Mr. Gladstone's declaration was universally understood in accordance with this preconception. But those who are acquainted with Mr. Gladstone's ways of thought and speech would have done well if they had exhibited Mr. Goschen's distrust. The ordinary doctrine of law and of morals is that a promise is binding in the sense in which it must be understood by the person to whom the promise is made. This is not Mr. Gladstone's doctrine and practice. The promise may be understood according to a reserved meaning in his own mind, provided that the words he has employed are grammatically susceptible of that meaning. If people choose to be wise or foolish beyond what is written or spoken, that is their look-out. There can be little doubt that Mr. Gladstone's omission of the word "legislative" was intended to keep open an alternative. If the general election gave him that majority, independent of the Irish vote, for which he earnestly entreated, union meant legislative union. That was the natural meaning of the word, and it would be attributing disingenuousness to him to suppose that he could have used it in any other sense. If, as happened, the result of the general election made the Irish vote necessary to him, why, then, it was obvious that he had carefully avoided committing himself to legislative unity. That was patent on the face of his address, openly proclaimed to all men; and, indeed, Mr. Goschen had, without contradiction on his part, called public attention to the fact. Who, then, could charge him with taking the Liberal party or the country by surprise?

Mr. Gladstone, who has offered the bribe of Disestablishment in Scotland and Wales in return for a Scotch and Welsh majority in favour of Home Rule, is indignant with Lord Hartington for declaring that he thinks the maintenance of Free-trade less important than the preservation of the integrity of the United Kingdom. But these two questions do not come into competition, and the separation of England from Ireland would have no conceivable bearing upon the commercial policy of this country. Because Mr. Goschen has openly avowed that on the subject of compulsory allotments he has submitted, without altering his own adverse opinion, to the decision of his colleagues, Mr. Gladstone pretends to think that he would be equally ready to abandon Free-trade to a Cabinet of Fair-traders which does not exist, and is not likely to come into existence; that because he has yielded on a secondary and insignificant question, he would be ready to yield upon a primary and vital one. Mr. Gladstone knows perfectly well that no Cabinet ever existed every member of which had not to acquiesce repeatedly in decisions adverse to his own judgment on matters far more important than that of compulsory allotments. Mr. Gladstone further knows that no member of any Cabinet has made more numerous capitulations of this kind than he himself has done. Lord Palmerston, as Mr. Goschen reminded his audience at Hastings, declared that his pockets were full of letters of resignation sent in by Mr. Gladstone only to be withdrawn. Mr. Gladstone, from the nature of the case, must have pocketed an opinion for every letter of resignation in the pocket of Lord Palmerston. The difference between Mr. Goschen and others lies only in the fact that Mr. Goschen has the intellectual and moral straightforwardness to say that he has acquiesced in a decision against himself, though his opinion remains unchanged; while other members of Cabinets have, through silence or disingenuous speech, feigned to have altered their minds when they had only changed their votes.

MINOR GALLERIES.

Much interest attaches to the Loan Exhibition of Japanese Art at the Fine Art Society's Gallery in New Bond Street, and much time and trouble will be amply repaid by a careful study of the objects now got together there. We must nevertheless add at the outset that the time and trouble that have to be spent in any painstaking examination of this Exhibition are materially increased by the defective arrangement which prevails throughout. The cases are unduly crowded, and in some instances contain many specimens which, far from serving any useful purpose, merely enhance the difficulty of obtaining a satisfactory view of the truly precious examples which are to be met with in the collection. Mr. Ernest Hart's specimens of old Satsuma seem to us to be among the chief sufferers in this respect, and we cordially wish everything away which interferes with an adequate inspection of them. Neither can we withhold our protest against the lavish display of bronzes of no great interest or value, which obscure and divert attention from the finer productions of this admirable department of Japanese art. In the main the lac cases will be found to contain what is of most general interest to those who wish to extend their acquaintance with what is most beautiful and attractive in Oriental art. Of the extreme beauty of some of the specimens which have been lent it is impossible to speak too highly. In no instance has the family resemblance which obtains between the highest productions of art in different countries and periods been more forcibly brought home to us than in that afforded by the inspection of this admirable display. Of the profound knowledge of the material to be worked in, and the faultless intuition shown in the choice and treatment of the motives selected for representation in it by the great artists of Japan, it were idle to speak; but it is well to note that the more modern examples of their work do not justify those who loudly bewail the decadence of Japanese art. This will be found especially true in respect to the sword-guards, of which some of the modern specimens show faultless workmanship joined to the highest power of imaginative design. None but a Japanese could have imagined some of the things of might and dread which appear out of the clouds, out of seeming innocent boxes, over the tops of screens, or, still more appalling, start with wide-eyed devilry out of space before the vision of devoted mortals in these wonderful gems of metal-work. To the calling attention to individual specimens in this exhibition there would be no end; but we may dwell in passing upon one of these guards, on which a callow devil—a mere hobbledehoy and tiro in iniquity—is seen in the relative innocence of slumber, while an older and unrelaxingly vigilant servant of hell approaches with rapid stealth to devour him. The whole range of art may be searched in vain for any worthy comparison to this embodiment of the quintessence of hate made perfect. Equally remarkable in its way is a bronze guard, modelled in high relief, representing a more violent and grotesque demon pounding men in a mortar. Truly the Japanese are unsurpassed in their subtle apprehensions of bugs and goblins and all the workings of the pit.

It is a relief to return to the lacs, in which we find something more than the germ of the best landscape art of the world. In looking at these, Corot's pictures and the more sophisticated landscape to be found in the works of Puvis de Chavannes, are continually present with us; while we find more than one tree, which in boldness of design, truth to the great facts of nature, and freedom of treatment is irresistibly suggestive of Rousseau; and we may especially call attention to a marvellous design (No. 14, Case S, in the Catalogue), inlaid with mother-of-pearl on a black ground, representing an old man carrying home firewood, which imperatively recalls the best work of Millet, himself an ardent admirer of Japanese art. Sober, strong, restrained, and exquisite in their delicate gradations of colour, these lacs cannot be too often or too carefully studied, but we willingly refrain from the idle iteration of particular names and specimens where so much is admirable. The present exhibition is particularly strong in its collection of the beautiful little medicine-cases, on which such treasures of care and discriminating finish used to be lavished; but here again it would be of small profit to attempt to make a mere list, calling attention to individual specimens, and we prefer making a brief excursion among the other objects exhibited. The porcelain figure of the poetess Osugumo, from the collection of Mr. Ernest Hart, should command universal attention. Ingres would not have disowned the serpentine lines and discreet modelling of the figure, or its matchless living sway and distribution of weight upon the feet; and the deep and fine chiselling of the folds of the drapery is beyond praise. Also from Mr. Ernest Hart's collection is a snake darting upon a toad—a bronze group of great power and beauty; and we select at hazard another bronze of an angel playing a flute, lent by Mr. W. J. Stuart, which is curiously like some specimens of the Italian Renaissance; and a bronze bag in Case T, No 11, lent by H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh—an example of nineteenth-century work of admirably large style and simplicity of treatment. But it is useless, within the limits of a short notice, to attempt to point out in detail the many beautiful specimens which the Gallery contains, or to do more than mention the existence of the silks which form a very important item in the collection. We can only regret that greater severity has not been exercised in the selection, and hope that the present exhibition will be the precursor of others from which the drawbacks to which we have called attention may be absent.

Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, & Co. exhibit a large picture by Mr. E. J. Lakey, called "The Right of Way"—a bull with cows crossing a ford. The animals are life-size, and the canvas is proportionately vast. Mr. Lakey is a pupil of Mr. E. Van Marcke, whose method, as carried out in the present instance, seems scarcely appropriate to such a scale of work. Mr. Lakey's picture shows great ability, but the system of loading on colours which is admissible on a small canvas can be productive of no good effect when it is transferred to and exaggerated on a larger surface. No amount of plastering on of white over white can ever take the place of thoughtful modelling in tone; and owing to the excess of this mannerism Mr. Lakey's bull produces a hard and lifeless effect, in spite of much sterling knowledge of the animal and genuine power of drawing. The sky, again, though it bears unmistakable traces of care and genuine study of nature, is not broadly enough handled for such an undertaking. The level stretch of the landscape proves Mr. Lakey to be a master of value; but the green of the great mass of trees in the right hand of the picture is monotonous and a trifle heavy. Messrs. Boussod & Valadon have added two heads by M. Henner to their collection; neither of them of any very great merit, although the smaller of them is a fairly good example of the artist's remarkable powers of delicate modelling in white flesh. Far more worthy of attention is a small picture by M. Israels of a field and farm buildings at sunset, with figures of a man and woman in the foreground leaning against heavy wooden rails. Poetic in feeling, sober and strong in colour, it is an excellent example of this great artist's work.

We reserve the exhibition of Signor Monticelli's works at Messrs. Dowdeswell's Gallery and of Mr. Bearne's water-colours of Switzerland and Italy for a future notice.

THE REDUCTION OF THE BANK RATE.

THE Directors of the Bank of England have lowered their rate of discount from 4 to 3 per cent. by two successive reductions of one-half per cent. each. The ground upon which the step was taken is, that when the first reduction was made the rate of discount in the open market was under 2 per cent.; that it was unreasonable to expect the Bank to get business when it was charging more than twice as much as its competitors; and to go on practically shutting itself out from the business for which it was formed was not in accordance with commercial principles. The argument, if it is good for anything, would lead the Directors very much farther than they have gone. Each reduction of their minimum rate of discount has been followed by a reduction on the part of the joint-stock and private banks and discount houses of the rates they allow upon deposits, and consequently of their rates of discount, the ultimate result being that the rate of discount in the open market is now about 1½ per cent. Practically, then, the Bank of England is just where it was before it began to put down its rate. It is charging twice as much as its competitors, and is just as little likely to obtain business now as it was then. Therefore, if the Directors believe in their own reasoning and act logically, they ought to lower their rate to about 1½ per cent. As a matter of course they would not venture to do anything of the kind. The Bank of England is not a purely private commercial institution, bound to follow the course of the market. It is above all things, and before all things, the keeper of the ultimate banking reserve of the whole United Kingdom. It is not free, then, to compete with the joint-stock and private banks; it must always keep a close watch upon its reserve, and do nothing that would seriously lessen the amount of that reserve. The action taken by the Directors, then, is illogical, and consequently is doomed to failure, while we venture to think it has made the position of the money market less safe than it was before. It is unfortunate that the Bank of England alone of all our great banks keeps a real reserve, for the joint-stock and private banks, being exempt from the cost and trouble of keeping a reserve, are free to compete recklessly with one another for business, thereby lowering the rates of interest and discount unduly, and risking consequences that may prove very serious some time or other. But the joint-stock and private banks will not voluntarily undertake the cost of keeping real reserves for themselves; and, unfortunately, the Bank of England either will not or cannot compel them to do so. One would think that the Directors of the Bank of England might insist upon the other banks keeping in that institution much larger balances than they do at present; that thereby the position of the joint-stock and private banks would be made sounder, while the Bank of England itself would be able to keep a larger reserve without additional cost. But the Bank of England does not venture to do this, and therefore we are obliged to take the position as we find it, and, by bringing the force of public opinion to bear upon the Directors, to insist that at all times they shall keep a reserve not only sufficient for the immediate moment, but sufficient for the near future as far as can reasonably be foreseen. Now it is quite true that, if we take the immediate moment only, the amount of the reserve is sufficient. We have seen how very low the rate of discount is here in London. The value of money is falling likewise upon the Continent, where at this season of the year the course is usually downwards; and in the United States there is an unexpectedly large accumulation of unemployed money. The surplus reserve of the New York Associated Banks, for example, has doubled within a fortnight. If, therefore, peace is maintained, the probability is that the rates of interest and discount will remain low for some time to come, and consequently that the reserve of the Bank of England is sufficient for all immediate requirements. But the Directors of the Bank of England ought to take a far-seeing view of the situation; and, if we look sufficiently ahead, we venture to think that the reserve is by no means sufficient.

Apart altogether from the danger of a great European war—which, however, ought never to be left out of the consideration of the Directors—there are many contingencies which may seriously lessen the Bank reserve. The most dangerous feature of the situation, however, is the very small amount of gold held by the Bank. As our readers are aware, the reserve consists of the unemployed coin and notes in the banking department; but the notes really depend upon the gold held, for every reduction in the gold necessitates the cancelling of an equivalent amount of notes. Therefore, the reserve really depends upon the amount of gold held, and the amount of gold is unquestionably dangerously small. A great European war, a financial crisis anywhere, difficulties in the United States because of the currency, or a thousand other accidents might produce a disturbance in our money market because of the smallness of the stock of gold. In old times the Bank of England was able to count upon replenishing its stock of gold by raising its rate of discount. London was then the banking centre of the world, far more really than it is at present. Whenever, therefore, a demand for gold arose in London it was sure to be satisfied, and the demand could always be created by the Bank of England by raising its rate of discount sufficiently high. Of late, however, the raising of the rate of discount has proved much less effective than it used to be, and the reason is not far to seek. Whether it be true or not that the supply of gold in the world is deficient, it is certainly indisputable that the accumulation of gold by the leading institutions of the principal countries of the world has made what may be called the floating supply—the supply, that is, that can be readily transferred from market to market—very small. We have often called the attention of our readers for different reasons to the extraordinary accumulation of gold by the United States Treasury, by the Bank of France, and by the Imperial Bank of Germany. Just now it may be worth while to repeat the figures, for they are extremely significant. The whole stock of gold held by the Bank of England is only a little over 21¼ millions; while the United States Treasury holds 61 millions, and the Bank of France nearly 44 millions. The Imperial Bank of Germany holds altogether in coin and bullion 39¾ millions, of which it is estimated that about two-thirds consist of gold. And there are large sums of gold likewise held by the Imperial Bank of Russia, by the Bank of Italy, and by other institutions. Further, it is to be recollected that the increase of wealth and the growth of business in Australia has compelled the Australian banks to hold much more gold than they did formerly. Consequently the export of gold from Australia is not so large as it used to be. But the point we would particularly direct attention to just now is that the United States Treasury and the Banks of France and Germany have accumulated so much gold that they leave but a very small quantity in the different markets, and consequently that it must necessarily be a very slow process to collect gold in London when it is required. The Directors of the Bank of England, acting upon the traditional policy that grew up when gold always floated hither on the rise of their Bank-rate, shut their eyes to the change of circumstances. They go on blindly acting as if by raising their rate they could obtain gold, while as a matter of fact the amount of gold that can be drawn hither is not only small in itself, but is scattered about the world at great distances, and, therefore, can be collected here only very slowly. A sudden emergency, then, would find the Bank of England entirely unprovided, and nothing that can be done would probably ward off very serious consequences. For it is to be recollected that neither the United States Treasury nor the Banks of France and Germany would part with any considerable amount of gold. The United States Treasury certainly would not, the main policy of the United States Government being for the present to keep the great hoard of metal which it has collected together at vast cost and trouble. The Imperial Bank of Germany, whatever may be the motive of the Directors, has been accumulating gold steadily for years; and, though the Bank of France does not keep so close a grasp upon its stock of the metal, it is reasonably certain that the Directors would not part with a considerable amount. If the Directors of the Bank of England would recognize all this, they would see the necessity for adopting a consistent policy, and persistently carrying it out year after year. They would not allow a considerable amount of their gold to be withdrawn from them, and they would seize every favourable occasion to add to the stock of metal which they hold. But it is no use to make spasmodic efforts; what is required is a consistent policy persistently followed up.

It may be that, the circumstances being such as they are, the Directors would have gained nothing by keeping their rate of discount at 4 per cent. Long ago they ought to have stopped the drain of gold; but, not having done so, it is possible that no good object would have been attained by refusing now to lower their rate of discount. We are inclined to think it would have been better to have maintained the rate at 4 per cent.; but the reduction has been made, and cannot now be undone. The material thing is that the Directors should open their eyes to the changed conditions under which they act, and should begin without delay to strengthen themselves for contingencies which may happen at any moment. Just now circumstances favour them in attracting gold to London. Since Mr. Lowe, as he then was, made changes in the collection of the taxes, a larger part of the public revenue is received in January, February, and March than in any other quarter of the year. The Bank of England, as our readers know, is the Government's bank, and the money is paid from the account of the taxpayers at the joint-stock and private banks to the account of the Government at the Bank of England. The result is that an exceptionally large proportion of the cash in the country is held by the Bank of England during the last quarter of the financial year. Owing to the payment of the interest on the National Debt, and to other things, the accumulation does not begin to be really felt until February. All through February and the early part of March the receipts greatly exceed the outgoings; but in the latter part of March the expenditure again becomes very large. For about six or seven weeks, therefore, the Bank of England is unusually rich, and the other banks are unusually poor. Consequently for those six or seven weeks the Bank of England has a practical control of the London money market. In other words, the joint-stock and private banks are not able to accommodate borrowers generally, and these have to apply to the Bank of England. The Bank of England, therefore, is able the fix the rates of interest and discount in the short loan market in London. Now, if the Bank of England were to borrow a considerable amount from the outside market it would increase its own resources, and it would diminish the resources of the other banks; thereby it would accentuate its own control of the market, and in a very short time it would be able to make the rate of discount in London fully 3 per cent. If it were to do this, and there was reasonable prospect of that rate being maintained for six or seven weeks, there would be a strong inducement for transferring money from the Continent, where it is cheaper, to London, where it would have become dearer. In other words, gold would be attracted to London because it could be employed in London at a greater profit than in other countries, and the gold would flow into the Bank of England. If, however, the Bank of England neglects to do this, the opportunity for increasing its stock of gold will have passed away. Throughout the summer, if peace is preserved, the probability is that the value of money will be low, and consequently that the Bank of England will not have control of the market, and there will be no chance therefore of attracting gold before the autumn. It is objected to the policy we recommend that the Bank of England obtains control of the London money market only because it is the Government's banker; in other words, that it enjoys a practical monopoly for this period through the favour of the Government, and that in honour it is bound not to use its privileged position to the disadvantage of the general market. The argument is perfectly good in ordinary times, but it is not good when the monopoly is used, not for the enrichment of the Bank of England, but for strengthening a position which is admitted to be weak. The object of raising the value of money is to attract gold, and the gold held by the Bank of England everybody allows to be insufficient. The object, therefore, to be attained is an object of public utility, and being such, it would fully justify the Bank of England in availing itself of its privileged position for the purpose in view.

FRENCH PLAYS.

LA MASCOTTE when it was first produced in English at once found favour, although deprived of much of its gaiety by an indifferent translation, and by a rather inartistic performance. The music, however, was so pretty that it immediately became popular—too popular, indeed; for soon the street organs ground its liveliest melodies to a wearisome death. Notwithstanding, however, that it has been performed some hundred times in London, it may safely be said that we have never yet seen this opera produced with so much care and finish as it is at present at the "Royalty" by M. Meyer's troupe. It would be almost impossible to conceive anything better than the general ensemble; for, from Mme. Mary Albert, the prima donna, to the most insignificant "super," every one enters heart and soul into his work. Possibly the reason why La Mascotte appears brighter in French than it does in English will be found in the fact that, as a rule, the French actor of this class of comic opera plays it throughout with the utmost seriousness. He does not start, as do the generality of his English colleagues, by announcing only too broadly that he is burlesquing. He goes to work with all the seriousness of a tragedian; hence the sincerity of his intention adds immensely to its drollery. Mme. Mary Albert, who has nothing like so good a voice as her predecessor, Mme. Humberta, and, indeed, occasionally intones imperfectly, is so clever an actress that one forgets her faulty vocalization in the admiration she provokes by her singularly subtle acting. She possesses a great deal of Judic's talent for saying risky things delicately, and quite illustrates the "Diva" Judic's clever retort to a prudish lady who ventured to remark upon the very dangerous things she said and did in Niniche—"Oh! Madame, vous ne savez pas comme je suis naïve, ni quelle imagination perfide vous avez vous-même." Those who go to opera-bouffe should, after all, recollect that this kind of entertainment is not precisely intended for the benefit of such as are about to qualify for a novitiate at the Carmelites. Mme. Mary Albert's singing and acting was, of its kind, inimitably clever. Nothing could be better than her rendering of the air "J'aime mes dindons," which she had to repeat no less than four times. Another admirable piece of acting is that of M. Curini as Laurent XVII.—a droll impersonation, full of quaintness and humour. M. Morlet, who has played the part of Pippo for five hundred nights in Paris, merits his reputation. He is an excellent actor, and has an exceptionally sweet tenor voice. M. Dekernel as the Prince was entirely satisfactory, and Mme. Lentz was an excellent Princess. The piece was very well mounted, and the chorus and band were quite up to the mark.

THE TOYMAN.

A Fable.

IN verse, is Form the first, or Sense?
Hereon men waste their eloquence.

"Sense (cry the one side), Sense, of course.
How can you lend your theme its force?
How can you be direct and clear,
Concise, and (most of all) sincere,
If you must pen your strain sublime
In bonds of measure and of rhyme?
Who ever heard true Grief relate
Its heartfelt woes in 'six' and 'eight'?
Or felt his manly bosom swell
Within a French-made villanelle?
How can your mens divinior sing
Within the sonnet's scanty ring,
Where she must chant her Orphic tale
In just so many lines, or fail? . . ."
"Form is the first (the others bawl);
If not, why write in verse at all?
Why not your throbbing thoughts expose
(If verse be such restraint) in prose?
For surely if you speak your soul
Most freely where there's least control,
It follows you must speak it best
By rhyme (and reason) unreprest.
Blest hour! be not delayed too long,
When Britain frees her slaves of song;
And barred no more by lack of skill,
The Mob may crowd Parnassus Hill! . . ."

Just at this point, for you must know,
All this was but the to-and-fro
Of MATT and DICK who played with Thought,
And lingered longer than they ought (So pleasant 'tis to tap one's box
And trifle round a paradox!),
There came—but I forgot to say,
'Twas in the Mall, the month was May—
There came a fellow where they sat,
His elf-locks peeping through his hat,
Who bore a basket. Straight his load
He set upon the ground, and showed His newest toy—a card with strings.
On this side was a bird with wings,
On that, a cage. You twirled, and lo!
The twain were one.
Said MATT, "E'en so.
Here's the solution in a word:—
Form is the cage and Sense the bird.
The Poet twirls them in his mind,
And wins the trick with both combined."

REVIEWS.

MRS. OLIPHANT'S VENETIAN HISTORY.*

OMNISCIENCE, we all know, is a foible, and, like other foibles, it tends to grow by indulgence. Mrs. Oliphant's admirers, and they are many, must regret the rapidity with which, in her case, the foible of omniscience develops. She seems to be under the impression that because Italy in its palmy days was the land of political adventurers, it has by the advance of civilization been converted into the land of literary adventurers who need no other equipment save audacity and competent skill in craftsmanship. Her Makers of Florence seems to have hit the mark of the numerous travellers in Italy who wish to seem intelligent at the smallest cost to themselves. In dealing with Florence she had a subject which has been well worked—a subject about which it is difficult to go far astray—so that the practised hand of one who knew the public taste found it comparatively easy to dress up in an attractive shape a story that could at least pass muster. But Venice is a very different matter, as Mrs. Oliphant, in spite of her lightheartedness, seems to have discovered. The title of The Makers of Florence has a meaning, for Florence was the home of great men, and the lives of Dante, Giotto, Savonarola, and the rest could be told without much trouble, and appropriate touches of local colouring could be given to the narrative. But it is quite otherwise with Venice, and Mrs. Oliphant herself is bound to confess that the title, The Makers of Venice, is really meaningless. Still, as there was room for a companion volume to The Makers of Florence, the title was good enough, and it was used accordingly.

Mrs. Oliphant says, truly enough, that whereas Florence recalls the lives of the men who lived in it, Venice itself is the sole record of the lives of the Venetians. This admission ought to have taught her that the important thing to decide about Venice was what it really was, and how it came to be. In other words, the history of Venice is constitutional, not pictorial; it is not the record of individual lives, but the growth of a great commercial and political organization. This reflection might have warned her that the subject was entirely unsuited to her mode of treatment, that the intelligent visitor to Venice might read her book conscientiously from beginning to end, and not find in it the answer to any of the questions which his curiosity prompted him to ask. The doges of Venice are shadowy beings at the best, and a collection of all the stories about them that can be found does not make Venice much more intelligible.

The first question that any one would ask about Venice is how a city came to exist at all in such a place and under such conditions. The true "Makers of Venice" were the men who in troubled times took refuge in the lagoons, and there lived the life which they wished. The federation of the twelve villages in the lagoons was the political beginning of the Venetian State; and the resoluteness of a people, strong in their natural position, to become neither Roman nor Byzantine nor Frankish is the key to Venetian history. Venice played off the Eastern Empire against the Western, and few recorded utterances of a people are more significant than the answer of the Venetians to Pippin—"ἡμεῖς δοῦλοι θέλομεν εἶναι τοῦ βασιλέως τῶν Ῥωμαίων καὶ οὐχὶ σοῦ." The result of the repulse of Pippin was the formation by the Venetian confederacy of a new capital in a safer place, was the foundation of the city of the Rialto.

Of this, which is the true making of Venice, Mrs. Oliphant has not a word to say. She begins with the Orseoli doges in 976, because at that period she comes across a chronicler who supplies her with a few stories. She does not point out the primary fact that Venice by its position faced to the East, that its trade was with the Eastern peoples, that it deliberately asserted its independence against East and West alike, but that the basis of its civilization was Byzantine and Oriental rather than European and Italian. The maintenance of this political independence, together with the extension of commerce, was a difficult task, and absorbed all the energies of its people. It is no wonder that Venice found no room for the development of individual character or for the pursuits of literature and art. Its whole position was artificial, and had to be jealously guarded; and with the maintenance of that position the material prosperity of Venice was indissolubly interwoven.

Mrs. Oliphant has, further, entirely failed to comprehend the peculiar features of Venetian life and history which were due to the steady advance of the commercial class in political power and its stealthy encroachments on a State which was originally aristocratic on a popular basis. In early times the people took the old nobles for their leaders, and the doge was the representative of the accord between these two elements in the original State. This State, which resembled the other States of Italy in its general outline, was slowly transformed into an aristocratic plutocracy by the rise of a class of wealthy merchants, who organized themselves into a party, which was strong through its absolute unanimity, and then insidiously laid their hands on the constitution of the State in such a way as to turn it into a machine for depressing the old nobility and the people alike. Mrs. Oliphant gives us no idea of the nature of this stealthy advance of the benumbing power of an organized party which was scarcely apprehended till it was too late to check it. She misses the point of the struggle against the Doge Piero Gradenigo, who embodied the policy of the new aristocracy. She tries to make vivid the character of his opponent, Bajamonte Tiepolo, one of the old nobility, round whom the people gathered in fear of the common foe, by comparing him to "the young Cavalier, our own Prince Charlie," and calling him "no common gallant, yet with the faults and weaknesses, as well as the noble qualities, of the careless foolhardy cavalier." Nothing could well be more misleading; no parallel could be more ludicrous than between the Jacobite rising and the Venetian conspiracy.

It is not worth while to follow Mrs. Oliphant's history any further. We can only regret that her book had not waited a few months, till she might have had the opportunity of gaining some knowledge of the meaning of Venetian affairs by reading Mr. H. F. Brown's Venetian Studies, which have just appeared. The second division of Mrs. Oliphant's work is better than the first. It is called "By Sea and Land," and gives a good account of the travellers Niccolo, Matteo, and Marco Polo, a well-known subject in which popular condensation is possible enough. The other chapters on Carlo Zeno, Carmagnola, and Bartolommeo Colleoni, are not so good, because amid their pictorial writing they show no real knowledge of the condition of Italian politics as a whole.

In dealing with Venetian art we expected to find Mrs. Oliphant using a freer hand and saying something new. But we were disappointed to find the same approximateness and the same purely external treatment. The question why the Venetian school of painting was the latest of the Italian schools is dismissed by Mrs. Oliphant in a portentous sentence:—

> Why it should be that in a moment, by the means of two youths in a Venetian house, not distinguishable in any way from other boys, nor especially from the sons of other poor painters, members of the scuola of S. Luca, which had long existed in Venice, and produced dim pictures not without merit, the art of painting should have sprung at once into the noblest place, and that nothing which all the generations have done since, with all their inventions and appliances, should ever have bettered the Bellini, seems to me one of those miraculous circumstances with which the world abounds, and which illustrate this wayward, splendid, and futile humanity better than any history of development could do.

* The Makers of Venice: Doges, Conquerors, Painters, and Men of Letters. By Mrs. Oliphant. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.

The grammar of this sentence is as defective as its sense. If Mrs. Oliphant had looked a little further, she need not have fallen back upon "this wayward, splendid, and futile humanity" as a formula with which to avoid research. The "dim pictures not without merit" of the Vivarini merit more recognition. It was natural that the school of colour should be later in reaching its perfection than the school of form. It was natural that Florentine intelligence should seek to express in art its curiosity and its cravings before the practical Venetians called in painting to adorn the magnificence of their civic life. It is in the perception of such facts as these that Venice becomes intelligible to a visitor and the splendours of the Ducal Palace have any real meaning to his mind. It is odd, too, that Mrs. Oliphant gives all the credit of the rise of Venetian art to the Bellini; she has nothing to say even of Cima da Conegliano, but she follows Mr. Ruskin in exalting Carpaccio, though she apologizes for so doing. In fact, she has found it judicious to adopt, on the whole, the Ruskinian view of Venetian art, with an occasional jibe which indicates that it is still the fashion to do so, but that there are signs that the fashion may shortly change.

In the last part of her book—"Men of Letters"—Mrs. Oliphant is equally wilful. The first of the three chapters which it contains, "The Guest of Venice," is devoted to Petrarch, because there is no difficulty in writing a chapter about Petrarch, whereas any attempt to deal with the beginnings of genuine Venetian literature would have taken a great deal of trouble. In the second chapter Mrs. Oliphant does much better; she calls attention to Marino Sanudo, and has read Mr. Rawdon Brown's extracts from his Diary, though she does not seem to have dipped into the Diary itself, which is now in the course of publication; nor is she aware that the Diary began in a history of the expedition of Charles VIII. into Italy, which, in a literary point of view, is the best of Sanudo's historical writings. The last chapter, devoted to Aldus, is pleasant enough reading. But with Aldus the book suddenly comes to an end, with an expression of regret that it would be too troublesome to get Fra Paoli Sarpi into a chapter. He is "too great to come in at the end," and therefore "must remain only a name." As the book has no beginning, so it has no end, not even an index. No reader is likely to discover from it how, or why, or when Venice was made; but it is a pretty volume, and has some nice woodcuts of Venetian scenery, and may serve to lie on a table and occasionally have its pages turned in a languid hour. We suspect that Mrs. Oliphant thought that this was all the attention which a book about Venice was likely to receive, and took her measures accordingly.

NOVELS.*

MAJOR LAWRENCE, F.L.S., by the Hon. Emily Lawless, contains no individual sketch so original and striking as the now almost famous Irish portrait in Hurrish, by the same author. It is a novel of study of character rather than of exciting incident; a book much more made up of impressions than of events. The hint in the concluding lines of the pretty dedicatory poem to the writer's mother—

> And grown with little conscious plan,
> Less as they would than as they can—conveys in brief a not inaccurate idea of the book's construction. Three lives seem to have grown under the mental direction and inspection of their literary creator, almost independently of her will, though not of her impulse. The first volume gives us a very pleasant history of the experiences of Major John Lawrence—of his uneventful youth, early exile to India as an officer in a native regiment, and of his first return home on leave after fourteen years' absence. Major Lawrence is a born naturalist. His innate interest in bees and moths, and sea plants and sea beasts, has been cultivated by the consequences of a fall, which made him a cripple for a little time, and necessitated a stay by the seaside for purposes of recovery. The fall was brought about by too indiscreet curiosity in the domestic proceedings of a pair of jackdaws who had a nest in the ivy-covered wall of a ruined church; and the period of convalescence spent by the Devonshire coast was used for investigations in rock-pools and sea-dredgings. These pokings and grubbings resulted in considerable acquisition of out-of-the-way facts in zoology, and hence the distinguishing letters which follow the name of the hero, whose military experiences were not out of the most ordinary kind. Major Lawrence becomes a member of the Linnean Society when he is thirty-two. He is a bachelor, and has never been in love. He has very few friends, but one of them, old Lady Mordaunt, is a host in herself; and he has become acquainted with a strange little girl of eleven, the daughter of a disagreeable couple, Lord and Lady Helversdale. So far the first volume brings us. In the two following the Major has been again out in India, and again returned. Lady Eleanor Mordaunt, the strange little girl, has grown up, very tall and handsome, and married Algernon Cathers, a sort of rich English Tito. He is at least about as much like Tito as Eleanor is like Romola. Major Lawrence remains her friend, and develops into her devoted lover; moved by his old admiration for her sincere and frank nature, and by sympathy for her ill-matched life. The passion for zoology is subordinated by his changeless interest in Elly and her little one, but we can never believe in its extinction, being as it is part and parcel of the man's nature. The Linnean Society must come to the front later, though we hear no more about it. Algernon dies in Italy of consumption, and the faithful John Lawrence is, we are left to suppose, the consoler of Elly, who has been the most noble and devoted of martyr wives. That is the whole story. It is told with quiet concentration, and does not appear too long, though it fills three substantial volumes. The writer's knowledge of her subject, her calm judgment of character and dispassionate views, lend to her story the interest we feel in a real life-history. It is not exciting, but we want to know the end, and what came of it all. Perhaps the only drawback to the undivided charm of the story is the haunting sense of well-known familiar shadows, which comes and goes with an irritating suggestion, not of imitation, but of resemblance. Elly and Algernon are faint adumbrations of Romola and Tito. Major Dobbin is always just vanishing over John Lawrence's shoulder. Mrs. Cathers and her beautiful scornful son just touch at one point our memories of Byron and Mrs. Byron, especially as they are represented in Venetia—touch, to show how utterly unlike they are. This is not so much a fault in Miss Lawless's story as a misfortune. And after all it scarcely amounts even to that.

Whitepatch is, we take it, a first attempt at fiction. The pretty white vellum binding, gilt vignette, and general care of execution, bespeak the attention given to the eldest hope. The internal evidence is not less conclusive. There is an awkwardness of construction combined with an elaborate painstaking which indicates the inexperienced writer. In some respects the story suffers little from this. It is an old-world, rambling romance, dealing with the topics of to-day in the style of fifty years ago. The quaint turns of expression, old-fashioned notions, and antiquated way of presenting things fit in well enough with the background of the piece, which is, in point of fact, of more importance than the personages—or at least the earthly personages—of the drama. Whitepatch is the name of a wonderful old manor-house in East Kent, a delightful old place, with bewildering quantities of staircases and doors, gardens of enchantment, secret hiding-places for priests and political refugees, and storehouses of vast underground extent for the reception of kegs and bales in the old smuggling days. All these, and many more strange things, are described with the elaborate minuteness of truth and accurate knowledge. Presently, however, we came to what the reader has felt from the first must be led up to—the ghosts. The ghostly inhabitants of Whitepatch are most interesting beings. There are three or four of them, extremely varied in their manifestations, and keeping each to his or her own department with an accuracy and punctuality which speaks well for the business habits of the underworld. There is a sweet young lady in a white dress and with a red flower in her hair, who comes out of a picture and smiles on the happy people whom she favours, who are almost immediately after sought in marriage by eligible partners. There is a terrible fellow in the old disused dairy with a bleeding scar and fiery sword who has been slain in a smuggling fray, but never properly buried, and who freezes beholders into a state of rigidity from which they only recover to die. There is a very melancholy old gentleman with a gun in the library, who exercises the most arbitrary sway over the matrimonial ventures of the Doddingstead family. He insists, through a metrical legend engraved on the library window, on brides and grooms presenting themselves before the ceremony of marriage to him, yet is most capricious in allowing himself to be visible when they come. As early death is the penalty of not beholding the old Squire, the matter is serious. These delightful beings mix themselves up with the flesh and blood dwellers in the old manor house in the most obliging fashion; chevy them along secret passages and up concealed stairs and through dismal dark closets, until the reader begins to be as familiar with the "spooks" as with old Colonel Doddingstead and his granddaughter Mary themselves. This Miss Mary Doddingstead is a very charming girl, who lives in a little suite of rooms all to herself, and keeps a monkey, a parrot, a goat, rats, weasels, stoats, and other delightful animals. One memorable day there is a battle of Homeric greatness between the King of Zanzibar, the monkey, and Mr. Grego, the parrot. It is an appalling duel à outrance. It ends differently, however, from the other famous fight, known to fame, between a monkey and a parrot, when the bird was discovered after a tête-à-tête of some hours sitting under a chair, without a feather left on his wretched person, muttering "A hell of a time! a hell of a time!" Whitepatch calls itself "a Romance for Quiet People," but we imagine people of all sorts and ages will find themselves well amused by it.

In the preface to his novel, Gilbert Freethorne's Heritage, Mr. Alvary, the author, mentions that it has not been his purpose or intention "to make ordinary life appear to be anything else than it really is." Perhaps it would have been better for his readers if he had modified this view. The pages of Gilbert Freethorne's Heritage show us, indeed, a version of existence such as is common enough, if we except certain mysterious events connected with anonymous babies, which we hope may remain of an extraordinary nature; but then something more than this is wanted in a novel. The life of a Scotch divinity student, graduating at the "Metropolitan University" (Edinburgh is always the metropolis in Mr. Alvary's novel), and struggling through his probationary period to the right to wag his pow in his own pu'pit, may be made the background for an amusing and interesting story. No one who has read Scotch biography, or listened to the tales of "town and gown" from their elders, or delighted in the wells of Scotch wut and humour to be found in reminiscences and memoirs of Scotch worthies, could doubt that. Gilbert Freethorne's history, however, is too solemn and serious to diverge into jinks by the way. He is flattened at the outset by discovering that he is not the son of the worthy blacksmith he has always called father, but is an anonymous baby found on a doorstep. There are other cases of dubious parentage amongst his friends, but none so complicated as that of Gilbert, who "had said in his sadness that he was 'nobody's child,' and came to have two fathers and three mothers." Then his views of doctrine and of Church government are set forth with immense earnestness, but equal dryness; his sermons, which are given at length, are edifying and prosy; and, when we get fairly into the politics of Briarstown, where Gilbert is minister, and amongst the Disestablishers and the teetotalers, both author and reader forget that amusement is the object in view, and plod wearily over the arid and bare ground. Gilbert has a friend in the person of a youth, "by courtesy designated the Hon. Horatio Silverdale," who is the son of the local magnate, Lord Silverdale. This young gentleman is addressed alternately as "my lord," "Lord Silverdale," and "Lord Silverdale, M.P.," except when Gilbert, seduced by the sanction of a tender friendship, drops into "Horatio—my lord." Mr. Alvary's interest in theological and political questions is great, but fails to communicate itself by sympathy; and his talent for fiction seems as yet undeveloped.

RICHTER'S LEVANA.*

CYNICAL persons might see, and indeed have seen, in the English fortunes of Jean Paul der Einzige an example both instructive and amusing of the penalties that wait upon exaggeration. Richter was undoubtedly a person of genius, and sometimes of very delightful genius; but he happened, not altogether for his good, to hit the taste of another person of still greater genius even too well. Mr. Carlyle's magnificent and stentorian eulogies set many persons a-translating Jean Paul; and, by the way, it is to be observed that until a man has tried to translate one of Richter's more eccentric pieces into good literary English himself, he has not the remotest idea of what translation may sometimes mean. The less esoteric and mannered works, Quintus Fixlein, Siebenkäs, Schmelzle's Journey to Flätz, and others, bear the process well enough, and though they are better in the original, are good always. But the number of persons who have really been "through" Hesperus or Titan, even in a translation (there is certainly an English translation of Hesperus, and we think one of Titan), is not large, and in the complete works we should imagine that there are very few Englishmen living who could stand an examination. The fact is that, with all Richter's kindly and generous feeling, all his rich imagination, all his humour, the sentence passed on him, apparently by agreement between Schiller and Goethe, remains true that he was an "inorganic" person—a person who only by accident, and now and then, contrived to say what he meant to say in a fashion at once striking and straightforward. Writers of this kind always have a peculiar charm for those who are in sympathy with them. This charm leads to a certain exaggeration, and the exaggeration in turn to depreciation, which is infinitely to be regretted.

Levana, however, has been both luckier and, in a way, more popular than any other of its author's books; which, considering that it is on a serious subject, and one on which infinite nonsense has been talked, is rather wonderful. It happens, however, to combine just enough of the author's merits of thought with just enough of his fioriture and arabesques of style to conciliate both classes of readers, and not so much as to disgust either. The necessity of sticking to a plain and practical question, to a subject which he had much at heart, and which he knew practically, restrained him both from his wildest obscurities of style and from those interminable debauches, of sometimes humorous and sometimes not much more than would-be humorous digression, wherein his most Jean-Pauline works do so inordinately abound. The book is, accordingly, one of the most valuable, though one of the least pedantic, books on the science of education; it has been frequently translated; and it has, we learn from Miss Wood, been prescribed as a book for a "teacher's diploma" by an English University—a proceeding the wisdom of which we should doubt, if it were necessary to doubt about the matter. Miss Wood's own handling is not exactly a translation, and her process of "accommodating" for English readers has reduced some four hundred closely-printed pages in the original (last edition) to but a little over a hundred loosely-printed ones in the English version, the exact plan adopted being occasional translation, more or less literal, connected by short abstracts of the untranslated parts in the translator's words.

We say more or less literal; for, to tell the truth, Miss Wood has been rather less exact than she might have been. For instance, she renders the third sentence of the first chapter thus:—"In the world of children the whole after-world lies before us, into which we, like Moses into the Promised Land, may gaze, but not enter; and again it renews for us the childhood of the world which we have left far behind." Now in the original there is no "may" in the first clause, though that does not much matter. In the second clause the inexactitudes are far more serious. "Zugleich" is not "again," but "at the same time"—a difference, if not considerable, yet real. "Die verjüngte Vorwelt" is not "the childhood of the world," but "the early world made young again"; and certainly no one could guess from "which we have left far behind"—a remarkable banality and truism—that Richter wrote "hinter welcher wir erscheinen mussten," "behind or after which we had to appear"—that is to say, "which conditioned in an important way the fact and measure of our own appearance." Not merely to chop and change, but positively to obscure, the sense of so pregnant a writer is a serious matter. Again, says Miss Wood, "How do you know whether the little boy who is plucking flowers at your side may not one day from his island of Corsica come forth as a war-god into a stormy world in order to play with the storms; to destroy, or to purify and renew?" Now Richter does not say "plucking flowers"; he says "der Blumen zerreisset"—"pulls flowers to pieces," evidently leading up to the "umzureissen," rather feebly translated "destroy" of the next clause. There is nothing destructive in plucking a flower. "Renew" for "säen" is also flat and weak. To take a few other examples, Richter never said anything about "honey-glands." The German for gland is Drüse. He said "Honig-Kelche"—"honey-cups," the flower chalices from which the honey is drawn. So, again, where he says "festen Genius"—the whole drift of the context being that genius is neither to be bent nor broken, but may be gently guided and developed—the value of his epithet is wholly lost when it is merely rendered "great genius." In fact, having, as is our wont, compared word for word some small passages in order to judge of the whole, we are afraid we must say that Miss Wood is in points like these emphatically a slovenly translator—one who substitutes for the mot propre, which might take a moment or two to find, generalities and banalities which, while they may give the broad rough sense of the sentence, perpetually disguise or destroy the shades of meaning and the correlation of different terms. Now Richter, with his allusive pregnant way of writing, his style at once bourré par l'idée à en craquer and adorned with almost a frippery of external ornament, endures this degrading process worse than most people, as far as any reproducing of his literary characteristics goes.

Fortunately, however, in Levana the general meaning is the chief thing, especially for the purposes of Miss Wood, herself a teacher (though we hope she does not teach her pupils to translate "fest" "great") and writing for teachers. She has by her alternate process of translation and précis given the gist of the book well enough; though we think it would have been well to have been a little more liberal of actual extract and a little fuller in abstract. Her book, therefore, if not quite a substitute for the original, might very well serve as a kind of introductory argument to it. Richter is by no means independent of such introductory arguments, as those who have studied him know.

A few words may be said of the book itself and its substance. There are those who, with a heresy to which we own that we have considerable leaning, think that theories and methods of education are, on the whole, a deplorable mistake, and that the elder Mr. Weller's laisser-faire Levana, though caricatured, of course, was likely to be a more beneficent goddess than the coddling spectacled dame of modern times, who would fill up every minute of unhappy children's lives with prescribed tasks, or, worse still, prescribed amusements—who would nail up the growing tastes and powers as if they were peach branches, and dress the roots with the newest-fangled artificial manure, like growers for exhibition, and for exactly the same purpose. Some of his schemes, such as the "Bons-mots Album," in which his little prigs were trained to write, or produce for writing, their precocious little conceits, seem to us very bad indeed, and he is occasionally anything but consistent, as where, after objecting to dunces' caps and other visible marks of shame, he confesses that he has himself sometimes employed an ink blot on the forehead for the same purpose. But, as always, it is necessary to apply the historic estimate. The eighteenth century, with Rousseau at its head, had busied itself with all sorts of plans of education—sensible and senseless, possible and impossible. Levana is, on the whole, a notable and remarkable reduction of these theories to a common sense which is never dry or pedantic. Moreover, this common sense is accompanied and informed by a sensibility which, if still retaining a slight tincture of the sensibility of the eighteenth century itself, is seldom, if ever, morbid. All the wisest things in the book are relapses towards the blessed doctrine of letting alone, except so far as is necessary for the two grand purposes of reasonably insisting on intellectual development and reasonably castigating moral faults. "Nothing is more dangerous for art as well as for character than to express immature feeling." "Postpone all introspection until the body is developed." "Every artificial development of the mind is injurious." "The child is thinking more vividly of the punishment than of how to avoid it [aurea sententia!]." He says of letters written to order as themes "A nothing writes to a nothing." He shows that grammar is never well learnt from the child's own tongue, a demonstration most valuable just now, though it needs the corollary "Nor from any living or spoken tongue." And, finally, the advice is given (in respect of girls, but certainly of universal application), "Teach children to convert life into a comic poem which surrounds its deep meaning with merry forms." In short, "Think in jest and feel in earnest"—the only definition of that humour which is the salvation of all things, though whether it is teachable to those who have not got it by nature we know not.

That uncomfortable reflection, indeed, comes back after a short interval, and applies to this no less than to every book about education with which we are acquainted. But at least Levana, as we have already shown by extract, redeems its fatal orthodoxy in this way by abundance of agreeable heterodoxy. The author wrote not merely as an expert teacher, not merely as an expert teacher who had liked teaching, but as an expert teacher who had liked teaching and who yet had produced abundant, luxuriant, original work, showing not the slightest taint of that pedagogic spirit which rests even on Milton. It may be said that this is due to the fact that no humourist, perhaps, ever had quite so deep a sense of moral obligation as Richter, and that no one in whom the moral purpose was so prominent ever was so little serious or goody in the bad senses of those two words. His was essentially mitis sapientia—indeed, a sapientia which was exceedingly fond of going about in the most uncompromising cap and bells; but it was wise enough in all conscience, and it was never wiser than in this book. If Miss Wood finds a public for her translation, we should advise her to revise it carefully and turn it into a full version with comparative notes from other authorities. We cannot, we suppose, unendow the professors of pedagogy who are springing up, so let us at least provide them with good text-books. It is true that competitive examinations and even "modern" teaching (though Richter himself spake unadvisedly with his lips about the classics) tend for the most part directly in the teeth of Levana; but so much the better for Levana, and the worse for the others.

THE BIRDS OF WILTSHIRE.*

IT does not seem possible to impress upon people in general—that is to say, upon non-professional authors—that when they get a chance of writing a book for publication their object should not be to make it as long, but as short, as possible. Here is the Rev. Mr. Smith, Rector of Yatesbury, an excellent specimen of the local naturalist and archæologist, inditing a monograph on a subject which he understands, and has a right to discuss with authority, yet what does he produce? Does he give us a nice little volume on the birds of his county, in about a hundred and fifty pages, carefully omitting all that is general, and emphasizing only what is specific or individual? By no means. What he does give us is a perfectly unwieldy tome of 588 great octavo pages, with an introduction on the science of ornithology, the osseous structure of birds in general, and their beaks, and their feet, and all the matters which a novice in the subject looks to a totally distinct kind of handbook for instruction regarding. When at last Mr. Smith reaches the species of birds, he loiters a great deal too long over the obvious characteristics of each, and so dilutes, wastes, and waters his particular observations of habits and habitat that it is quite a difficult task to pick the scattered plums out of the dough of his pudding. It appears that Mr. Smith has been collecting his material for more than thirty-four years, and printing it in instalments in the Wiltshire Magazine. So long a period has elapsed since he wrote those papers that, by his own naïve confession, although much in them is simply "gathered from various standard books on birds," he cannot any longer distinguish what is borrowed from what is his own, much less refer his unacknowledged quotations to their respective authors. In a modest preface Mr. Smith deprecates criticism, and tells us that his book aspires to be no "other than a plain account of the Birds of Wiltshire, written by a Wiltshire man, and for Wiltshire people." As such, if it were not so long, and so weighted with foreign matter, we should be content to welcome it.

We have had the curiosity to count the number of birds noticed by the late Professor Thomas Bell, as known by him to have been seen in or about the Hampshire parish of Selborne, and the tale is 163. Mr. Smith brings the entire number of Wiltshire birds up to 235. But, as Selborne is in the very heart of the county, and nearer the frontier of Surrey than of Wiltshire, Professor Bell's list is of course weak in water birds. He names but thirty of these, while Mr. Smith gives 102. Curiously enough, of land-birds the two lists are then found to be exactly equal, each boasting 133 species. There are certain birds on Professor Bell's list which it is hard to believe do not cross the border into Wiltshire. Mr. Smith does not include, for instance, the Mealy Redpole (Linota canescens), which was observed at Alton by Dr. Curtis, not the Woodchat (Lanius auriculatus) which Gould found near Selborne. But, on the whole, Bell's list, which was formed about half a century ago, is almost identical with that which a naturalist of to-day, covering a whole county instead of a brace of parishes, has been able to identify. It is not likely that any more real discoveries will be made in English county ornithology. No doubt stray specimens of previously unexampled species will sometimes fly across the frontier of a new county and be shot; but these chance visitants, like the White-tailed Eagle, which spent a summer-night in the eighteenth century on the summit of the Cathedral spire of Salisbury, can hardly be counted, except for statistical purposes, as part of the fauna of the district. By the way, Mr. Smith tells an agreeable story of a second and similar apparition of Haliæetus albicella:—

> In the year 1828 or 1829 . . . on a summer evening, at about five or six o'clock, an Eagle, said to have come from a northerly direction, took its place on the grand porch it had selected on the vane above the spire [of Salisbury Cathedral]. The night chanced to be that of a full moon, and the sky was cloudless. Just before bed-time my informant came into possession, for the first time in his life, of Lord Byron's Tales, which were printed in good, bold type, so that he was able to read them easily by the light of the moon; and now, after an interval of nearly sixty years, he recollects reading for several hours, seated on the window-seat of his bed-room, but frequently raising his eyes to look at the great bird on the weathercock of the spire. A plot, it appears, was made by some to shoot the eagle with a rifle-ball, and a party went up for that purpose to the "eight-doors," the place where the base of the spire rests on the tower; but happily their endeavours were baffled by the large ball which projects below the cross; and early in the morning the eagle floated away southward unharmed.

From a historian of Wiltshire birds we naturally expect to hear the latest news about that majestic tradition of Salisbury Plain, the Otis tarda, and Mr. Smith sums up what is known about the disappearance of this creature in some very interesting pages. The Great Bustard, which was the largest of all English land-birds, and was hunted with greyhounds like a sort of fallow-deer, began to grow rare on the central tableland of Wiltshire in the middle of last century. Bewick, as amateurs of that delightful artist may remember, has a spirited woodcut of a Great Bustard racing before a pair of greyhounds, and followed by a huntsman on horseback. It appears, however, to be very doubtful whether adult birds in full health, such as the specimen Bewick gives, could at any time be successfully coursed; and the way in which the Bustard was commonly secured seems to have been by hiding in the great turnip-fields until the huge creature stepped within shot. Gilbert White was never fortunate enough to see a Great Bustard, but he heard of a flock of eighteen which had haunted the downs above Andover in 1763, and Pennant talks confidently, but perhaps without due consideration, of "flocks of fifty or more." About 1804 the Mayor of Salisbury was obliged to give up the annual custom by which the Bustard formed a prominent dish at his inauguration, for the very excellent reason that neither love nor money could any longer be sure of providing a Bustard. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that at that time the birds were yet extinct. The last time that a flock of native Bustards was certainly seen in Wiltshire was by the Rev. Mr. Quekett in 1812 while riding from Salisbury to Great Bedwyn. Mr. Smith, however, as the result of oral inquiries among farmers and labourers, has formed the conviction that stray specimens of the bird lingered on in desolate places until 1820, when the native race of Bustards was finally extinguished.

The last native Bustards shot in Wiltshire fell to the lot of a couple of boys who were out partridge-shooting, and the narrative is one which shows the happy faculty that chance has of giving her greatest treasures to those who care least about them. In 1820, in the south of Wiltshire, a well-known sportsman, the ambition of whose life had been to see an example of the famous and vanishing bird for which his county had been famous, invited a party for the usual business on the 1st of September. Two young nephews of his were staying in the house, and thinking that these lads would spoil the sport if they accompanied their elders, he ironically bid them take their guns and go off "Bustard-shooting" on Salisbury Plain, the name of "Bustard" apparently being for ever in the mouth of this disappointed naturalist. At the end of the day, when the partridge-shooters returned, the boys had already come back. The uncle, in the odious manner of elder relatives, shouted out "Well! what sport have you had Bustard-shooting?" But it was now the turn of down-trodden youth to triumph, and with a fine affectation of indifference the boys replied, "Oh! pretty fair; we followed a good many, and we killed two." The rude laughter and ill-bred chaff which followed may be conceived; but this mirth was short-lived, for at the back of the house there lay, sure enough, the bodies of two fine Great Bustards, the last of the native race which would ever be shot in Wiltshire.

At the close of his volume Mr. Smith gives an interesting chapter on Migration, with a table which is the result of the labour of thirty-five years, and is as valuable as anything in the volume. This gives the range of arrival in Wiltshire of no less than forty migratory birds, from the Lapwing, which commonly appears in the beginning of March, to the Mountain Finch, which arrives early in December. The extreme regularity of some of these migratory movements is very remarkable. Very few species allow themselves more wide a margin than a month, but, however abnormal the conditions of the weather, come duly at their appointed time. An exception is the group of snipe and woodcock, whose arrival it is difficult to predict with any certainty. The Common Snipe may put in an appearance on the 12th of August, but he has been known to delay until the 30th of October. Wiltshire lies high, and its general temperature is, therefore, doubtless below the common average of the south of England. This may be the cause of the very late dates of arrival which Mr. Smith's list of migrations seems to supply.

Our author has a chapter on the "Nesting of Birds in Wiltshire," in which we find little that is new to us. It is, nevertheless, interesting to be assured that quite recently the Peregrine Falcon has bred, or has attempted to breed, on the spire of Salisbury Cathedral. It must be regretted by every ornithologist that the larger birds have been so successfully disturbed that there is hardly one of them which now breeds in the county. The Kite, of course, is altogether extinct; the Hen Harrier and the Buzzard have not nested in Wiltshire for many years, and the only species which has still the fortitude to brave the inhospitality of the county is Montagu's Harrier, which, as in honour due to the great Wiltshire naturalist whose name it bears, seems sometimes to rear its queer blue offspring in the gorse of rabbit-warrens. Mr. Smith winds up his lengthy narrative with two short chapters, "A Plea for the Rooks" and "A Plea for Small Birds," both of which we heartily endorse. Gilbert White loved the rooks, and recognized their value. One of his most beautiful passages is that in which he describes their voices in the evening silence, "a confused noise of chiding, or rather a pleasant murmur, very engaging to the imagination, and not unlike the cry of a pack of hounds in hollow, echoing woods, or the rushing of the wind in tall trees, or the tumbling of the tide upon a pebbly shore." Mr. Smith dedicates his volume, in very warm and pleasing terms, to Professor Alfred Newton, of Magdalen College, Cambridge, to whom zoology, and in particular ornithology, owes no small debt.

A ROVING CONSUL.*

MR. HITCHMAN had for many years wished to tell the story of Sir Richard Burton's adventurous life. His materials, however, were imperfect until he applied to Lady Burton, who was good enough to afford him "an immense amount of information." "My own part in these volumes," adds the writer, "has thus become a comparatively humble one." In the excess of his hero-worship Mr. Hitchman shows an anxious willingness to efface himself, and even when he appears to speak in his own person his utterances sound as if they had been written down by dictation. The object of the book is to show that Sir Richard Burton's "career has been blighted"; that his contemporaries have not understood or appreciated him; that he is the victim of misrepresentation and prejudice; that "he has lived six lives while other men were living one"; "that he has been scandalously neglected, and treated with cruel injustice, by each successive Government"; "that his only rewards have been a Consulate in one of the least healthy towns of the Adriatic, a Knighthood, and a retiring pension of 300*l*. a year"; and that posterity, it may be hoped, will place him on the pedestal he ought to occupy.

The "Arabianized Scoto-Irish-Englishman," as Mr. Hitchman calls the subject of his biography, was the son of a Colonel Burton, who, though he lived in a time of great wars, had only seen a little service in Sicily, under Sir John Moore. We can fancy him the fitting sire of his vivacious son. "He was a bit of a duellist, and shot one brother officer twice, nursing him tenderly each time afterwards." Mr. Hitchman, in describing the English colony in the French town where Colonel Burton and his family took up their abode for a while, tells us that the persons composing it were free from all taint of snobbishness, and that the "Mrs. Gamps and the Mrs. Grundys were not rampant there." What does the good gentleman mean? Does he consider Mrs. Gamp a type of English middle-class respectability? Or does he insinuate that the gentlewomen composing the community were exempted by age or vows of celibacy from requiring the services of a lady of her profession? Richard Burton was wilder and more mischievous than the wildest and most mischievous of lads we have ever encountered or read of. In fact, we are told that the young Burtons were complete "devilets." They used to beat their bonnes, fight gutter-boys, and smash confectioners' shop-windows to get at the tarts. Richard Burton, like, as Mr. Hitchman says, most boys of strong imagination and lively feeling, was a resolute and unblushing liar, and used to ridicule the idea of his honour being in any way attached to telling the truth. "He could never" (in those days) "understand what moral turpitude there could be in a lie, unless it was told for fear of the consequences of telling the truth." When of an age to serve his country, he entered the 18th Regiment of Bombay Native Infantry as an ensign, and obtained his company in 1862. He served with Beatson's Bashi-Bazouks during the Crimean War. But though by nature and disposition emphatically one of the "bello gaudentes, prælio ridentes," it was rather in the field of exploration than that of battle that he incurred frequent and terrible danger, and proved his serene courage and indomitable will. The romantic story of his journey to Mecca in the disguise of a dervish is familiar to all of us as an exploit requiring an amount of cool hardihood, linguistic knowledge, tact, adaptability, and an acquaintance with Oriental character which it is marvellous to find combined in a single individual person. Unfortunately his dauntless resolution and absolute, we had almost said overweening, self-confidence seem not to have been leavened with any touch of generosity. In the arrogance of his infallibility he will not listen with patience to any views on any matter in the slightest degree divergent from his own. Speke, his second in command in the expedition to Harar in 1856, Sir Richard Burton and his biographer (it is not always easy to know which of them is speaking at any particular moment) always mention in terms, not only of disparagement, but of bitter acrimony, which, whatever may be the right or wrong of the quarrel between them, must be shocking to all persons of fair mind and decent taste when spoken in cold blood of a dead colleague. We are told that Speke "was more a hindrance than a help," that "he knew nothing of Eastern manners and customs," that "he abandoned his trusty Arab friend and left him to be massacred," that he was "an utterly idle man," "nervously impatient," a "remarkably difficult man to manage," that "his book was unutterably loathsome," that "he did not know the use of words," and that he had "an overweening self-esteem which led him habitually to say not only that he had done his best upon all occasions, but that no human being could have done better." Sir Richard Burton shocked with a person possessing a large quantity of self-esteem! "Oh, Geordie! jingling Geordie! It was grand to hear Baby Charles laying down the guilt of dissimulation, and Steenie lecturing on the turpitude of incontinence." Even in describing the death of the great explorer when out shooting with his uncle in Wiltshire, much pains are taken to make the reader believe that the unfortunate man committed suicide, although the coroner's jury, without hesitation, returned a verdict of accidental death. Whether Mr. Hitchman or Sir Richard himself is the author of these remarks, they would seem to have been made with the sole view of giving pain to Speke's surviving family and friends. Sir Richard Burton has a just appreciation of the rough virtues of the negro. He might take a lesson from one of that race who in the wildest savagery of his revenge was too generous to heap insults on his fallen foe. "And art thou dead?" said Zanga. "So is my enmity; I war not with the dust."

Any one who unfortunately differs from Sir Richard Burton in opinion, any one who is thought to have overlooked his merits, is held up to scorn in these volumes. Sir Evelyn Baring and Sir Edward Malet get off with a sneer. Lord Stratford de Redclyffe is a "respectable middle-class peer" (middle class in this work is always a bitter reproach), > whose natural inclination was to be a littérateur, but who was unfit for taking any except the humblest rôle among the third-rates. . . . He had no sense of humour. . . . In a rage he was not pleasant . . . he would rush round the room like a lean maniac. . . . The following legend was told of him. He said one day to Alison, his Secretary of Embassy, "Damn your eyes, Mr. Alison! why was not that despatch sent?" "Damn your Excellency's eyes!" answered Alison, "it went this morning."

Of Mr. Alison himself, who was afterwards our Minister in Persia, Sir Richard Burton says that "he was more of a Greek than an Englishman, with a peculiar finesse, not to put too fine a point upon it, which made him highly qualified to deal with a certain type of Orientals. . . . At Teheran he did little good, having become unhappily addicted to tossing the elbow." Lord Odo Russell, who, we are told, was popularly called Lord Odon't Russell, is described as a "high-bred and average-talented English gentleman." Lord Raglan had a "courage antique and an old-fashioned excess of courtesy"; but he allowed himself to be surprised by the Russians, to be saved by General Bosquet, and to be "ignobly tricked by that shallow intriguer Maréchal de St. Arnaud alias Leroy." Lord Cardigan was "a man of ordinary pluck." In fact, Sir Richard Burton has met but few persons who are born physically fearless:—"I can count those known to me on the fingers of my right hand." He has "a very unpleasant remembrance" of General Mansfield. Of the conqueror of Scinde he says that "his mistakes were manifold, and many of them miserable." And he is not ashamed to speak of Lord Palmerston, the man of whom Sir Robert Peel said "we are all proud of him," as "Cupidon, the man with the straw in his mouth, the persistent chaffer of wiser men that appreciated the importance of the Fenian movement, the opposer of the Suez Canal, the Minister who died one day and was clean forgotten on the next, who knew as well as any man that the Suez Canal project was feasible and yet persuaded Admiral Spratt and poor Robert Stephenson to join in his little dodge." In 1882 the ill-fated expedition under Professor Palmer, Captain Gill, and Lieutenant Charrington was organized. Mr. Hitchman is the mouthpiece for expressing great indignation that no one at the Foreign Office should have "thought of Burton." In him "they had ready to their hand a man who was confessedly one of the greatest Arabic scholars of the day, and who knew, as no other Englishman could know, &c., . . . yet he was thrown aside and neglected, in order that this most delicate and most difficult negotiation should be entrusted to a Cambridge Professor of Arabic." Then follow some words in commendation of Professor Palmer's bravery and honour—and then the inevitable comment, "but it is no disparagement to him to say that the errand on which he was sent was one which had been better performed by a soldier who could at need become an Arab than by a scholar, however learned." Is there anything in the world which would not have been "better performed" by Sir Richard Burton than by any one else? Could any one else have made such a translation of the Lusiad?—which, by-the-bye, Mr. Hitchman soundly rates the public for not buying. Did any one ever render the Arabian Nights into English (without suppressing a single passage) from a nobler motive than that which actuated the Consul at Trieste? "That translation," says the ever-loyal Mr. Hitchman, "was undertaken in order to leave as a legacy to his country (and chiefly to her Governments) as much as possible of his own knowledge of those whom they have to rule, and that they may, knowing their inner life, avoid many of their past blunders in dealing with them." This sentence is perhaps not couched in the most lucid language. Mr. Hitchman's gifts are those of a faithful henchman. Evan Maccombich was not more true to Vich Ian Vohr than he is to the hero who, as he thinks, was born to set the world aright; but of style and construction Mr. Hitchman is not a passed master. Indeed, and without reference to the sentiments expressed and the claims advanced by him, he is about as turgid and confusing a writer as we have often met with. Still the very nature of the work he has undertaken invests it with a certain interest of its own. We have not space for extracts from Sir Richard Burton's amusing account of his travels in Arabia and the other parts of Africa, in India, and in Midian, or from his description of life in the Salt Lake City. We can only mention his visit to Iceland, where he is at pains to explain that he only went to church one dull Sunday "by way of divertissement." His remarks on the service are characteristic. The women were far more numerous than the men, because not only do they preponderate in the population, but because "the ceremony is in their line."

We wish that we could with honesty omit all mention of Burton's mission to Dahomé. He was sent thither in 1863 to urge the king to find some source of revenue to replace the slave trade, and to limit, if not altogether to abolish, the human sacrifices. He was also charged with presents from the British Government. These presents, he says, were so absolutely worthless, that the King did not even condescend to say "thank you" for them. Perhaps this is why all the Envoy's persuasions failed to have any effect, and why he "might as well have spoken to the winds." Of the hideous "customs" Mr. Hitchman says that Burton's account is "strictly moderate and dispassionate." We could find it in our hearts to wish that it had been less so, that human sacrifices had not been palliated "as a matter of religion," and the mock trials of the poor slaughtered wretches described euphuistically as lits de justice. The Commissioner shows that these sacrifices do take place, although not nearly to such an extent as has been stated. Men and women are always murdered in equal numbers. "For every male life taken outside the enceinte of the palace a woman is sacrificed within." Captain Burton, if not actually present at these massacres, saw the mutilated bodies of the victims. He was living in the midst of these atrocities, and he was doing his duty by being there. A diplomatist must go where he is sent. But, as Thackeray observed years ago, only a strong sense of duty would make an English gentleman formally and civilly polite to a bloodthirsty tyrant. Surely no English gentleman was bound by instructions from the Foreign Office to "dance a pas seul, which elicited violent applause," with the brute he was sent to make less brutal. Yet he did so with apparent relish, and so did his friend Dr. Cruickshank, while "Governor Mark acted as fugleman." We cannot bring ourselves to transcribe the rest of the hideous orgies. "That night," says Mr. Hitchman, "was another nox iræ"; and he goes on to tell of the vultures, and gibbets, and corpses Burton encountered on his way back to his own quarters. The writer says that, though his mission was an absolute failure, "Burton parted with the King on friendly terms, drinking gin and liqueurs together."

The chapter describing the visit to Dahomé is written in a tone of revolting levity, and to it is appended a note ridiculing the late Sir Francis Baring for "actually speaking in the House of Commons" of the ghastly buffoonery in which an English officer and gentleman had taken part. "But," says Mr. Hitchman, "Burton went upon a higher principle. He was formally accredited to the King, and on public occasions he was resolved to act as he should if he were sent to a European potentate; and when he frankly described the scene, he simply acted upon his usual principle. He knew that he was right, and he left the world to think and say what it pleased." We leave our readers to form their own opinion of the judgment and wisdom of a writer who assigns a "higher motive" to a diplomatic agent dancing with a drunken savage in a place more ghastly than a charnel-house, and who gravely assures us that the same gentleman translated portions of a book hitherto by decent folks considered untranslatable, in order to give the people and Government of his country a useful and necessary acquaintance with the habits of Oriental thought and life.

We are glad to have done, and we hope soon to forget these unhappy volumes. They have left on us, we think they will leave on most Englishmen, an impression of pain and shame that a man of Sir Richard Burton's energy, courage, and hardihood, a man of his scholarly acquirements, a soldier, moreover, trained to habits of discipline, should, perhaps without his own cognizance, and through the indiscreet zeal of the compiler of this book, be made to appear disrespectful and ungrateful, and what the late Lord Clarendon used to call revoltoso, to his official superiors, discontented with his lot, and perpetually whining after more rewards and honours and better paid posts. By the way, we wonder what Consul or other servant of the Foreign Office ever had such long and frequent leaves of absence, and spent so little time at his post (drawing salary all the time, it may be presumed), as Sir Richard Burton. It is to be hoped that the want of generosity to which we have already alluded in Sir Richard Burton's estimate of almost every one but himself, may have been brought into stronger relief by Mr. Hitchman than the subject of this most unfortunate biography could have wished.

SINGLE VOLUMES.*

THE author of The Gates Between lays her critic—implicitly only, for she makes no appeal to that effect—under the obligation of keeping the secret of her story. Not that there is any mere intrigue that might be robbed of its interest; moreover, the mystery is a mystery for only a few pages. But the author has a right to the fulness and the tensity of the manner in which she withholds and subsequently makes her revelation. She makes it with shock upon shock; and if her style is to be accused of violence, decidedly it is not the vulgar violence of weakness, but the uncommon violence of force. Apart from the impression which the reader gets from what she tells, he is convinced by what she says that she is giving herself to her work. Many writers, and writers of her own sex perhaps chiefly, do so convince us that they give themselves, and yet fail to convince us that the expense is grave; in the case of Miss Phelps we are persuaded that her self-devotion is not only a true but also a costly thing. With Miss Phelps the vital energy is evident, not only in the scenes of spiritual movement, but also in physical incident—a less valuable, perhaps, but also a rarer manifestation of power. She has a street accident, for instance, in which the reader is made to feel the haste and violence of the forces which overpower human strength, and to feel them so well that he does, in fact, remember the incident as an event, rather than as a passage of description. And truly the author of Gates Between needs all the strength she has, inasmuch as she has undertaken to present this world, and also a purgatorial region in the world to come, as a very limited, but also a very virile, man—her hero—is supposed to see it. She writes in his person, and thus gives herself no opportunity for feminine description of him; he has to express himself. "A man's mind," says George Eliot, in the most closely epigrammatic of her books, "has always the advantage of being masculine. His ignorance is of a sounder quality." And it is precisely a form of ignorance that Miss Phelps shows in her study of Dr. Thorne. He is an active and popular physician, whose knowledge is the whole use and good of his life, and the author shows him to us in the guise to which death reduces him—a solitary soul in a world where spirituality is the only knowledge. It is in this part of her book that Miss Phelps commits a literary fault that we find hard to forgive; she has something to say, and she says it well, but she also says it often. Perhaps it might help her to overcome this latter habit if she would consider in how much and how bad company she is offending. While she repeats her something, her sisters of the pen reiterate their nothing—damnably. The love-story in her book is singularly good.

We have just praised an author for the rare faculty of strength in incident, and now chance, which is sometimes kind to reviewers, and points their remarks with contrasts, brings under our hand John of Canada, a romance in which events succeed one another in futile profusion. Huggings to death by bears, torturings by Eagle's Plume and other Indian braves speaking consistently in the third person, flights and pursuits of the most hairbreadth character, should make these pages lively reading. That they do not is partly owing to the translator's incurable debility. "The bear raised himself on his hind legs, and flung himself with irresistible force upon Swift Panther, and hugged him with a violence which elicited a stifled groan from the youth." "Red Head . . . rose up, and, springing in with terrible agility, threw himself into the canoe of the fugitives. No one of the actors in this terrible drama lost his self-possession." To any young person who should undertake to read the book quite through we might recommend the marking of the number of times that the heroine's white hair is said to inspire the Indians with superstitious awe.

Mrs. Field has written a long controversial novel, in which a Puritan soldier of the time of the Cromwellian settlement of Ireland converts and marries a Roman Catholic lady, a daughter of the family owning the castle given to him by the Protector's order. Ethne's diary—Ethne is the convert—supplies the greater part of the narrative, and the author has made no intelligent attempt to show her as anything but a perfectly modern girl, gushing the wholesale modern gush about loving the sunshine and about the wonderful power of sympathy possessed by dogs. She gabbles precisely as the girl of the novel of to-day gabbles on many a trivial page that does not aspire to historical interest. We need hardly pause to remark that Mrs. Field is less than fair to her hero's religious opponents; but, perhaps, it is worth while to say that when she makes Ethne ask of her confessor a question on which the heroine's decision depends, she should in justice to her own conscience make him answer somewhat as a confessor would do; and if she should ingenuously reply that she does not know what he would say, she ought to ask somebody. We must give the writer credit for a certain amount of historical reading, but she has not used it to any valuable purpose. Better results of the same kind of industry are shown by Miss Eleanor Bulley in her Great Britain for Little Britons, in which a mass of knowledge of the more anecdotal kind is imparted to a group of children by questions and answers on the counties of the United Kingdom. The book is well done in all essentials; but this being a new edition one or two little errors should have been corrected. For instance, the Venerable Bede should not be called a British monk (p. 26); and when the child is told that this British monk wrote an ecclesiastical history of the English nation, and translated the Gospel into the Saxon language, the effect is that of a fine confused nationality. Then the author, giving two pages to the career of Warren Hastings, omits all mention of the trial, doubtless in order not to mar her picture of the successful career of a man of will.

Daphne's Decision is one of Mrs. Marshall's sensible stories for average girls. It teaches young people of about fourteen—or does what a book of its kind can do towards teaching—unselfishness and consideration for their young contemporaries. We might add to the lessons of the book by asking Mrs. Marshall's readers to exercise themselves by re-punctuating the passage on her title-page, thus ingeniously mispointed:—

> Think nought a trifle, though it small appear—
> Small sands, the mountain, moments, make the year
> And trifles life.

This elegant last-century construction ought to be respected by attention to the honourable stop. Miss Con is for older girls, and ends with weddings for some and literary successes for others of a cleverly-drawn bevy of maidens. By the way, there is no such way of getting glimpses of unknown worlds in contemporary society as the reading of small books like Miss Con. The little world revealed in this story is one in which literature is classed and defined in ways altogether new to outsiders. "I have another tale in hand," says Gladys Hepburn; "it is to be larger than the others, perhaps as big as a three-and-sixpenny book, or even a five-shilling book." "I believe Maggie thought she had written quite a good-sized volume; and when I calculated for her, and found that it would not be more than a tiny twopenny or threepenny book, she was almost vexed." "It seems strange to have written at last a real five-shilling tale—my childish dream come true. At fourteen I had quite made up my mind to bring out a five-shilling book some day—if I could, I mean." Is this really so? Are these the dreams of our maidens? Is this their cultus of literature, and, instead of reading, are they planning books appraised by shillings? We have no idea how much Miss Con costs, but we recommend it for its more than average ability.

Mr. F. M. Allen has such a thorough good will to be amusing that we are loth to confess he does not succeed quite so often as he intended. Here and there he has caught something of the unconscious fun of the South-Irish old raconteur, whose Boswell he has made himself; and this is particularly the case when Dan brings in the frequent parenthesis, generally of a religious turn, which gives a curious character to much Irish talk that is otherwise flat enough, if convention will allow us to confess so much. For instance:—"'You are an ignorant ruffian to spayke like that to me,' says Rolly, who always had his last end in view." Many of these interruptions, as practised by Irish talkers in all districts alike, are too pious for quotation in a comic book, so that Mr. F. M. Allen avoids them. But he has observed and made good use of the keen interest which uneducated persons in Ireland take in history. It is an interest peculiar to men and women who do not read, and whose fathers and mothers have never known how to read but have always been voluble and verbose transmitters of legend. With them the past has no dates, divisions, or periods. The words "anshant," "ould anshant," and "rale ould anshant" express various degrees of the speaker's reverence, but by no means any degree in his estimation of the passage of time. "Chronology," says Mr. Allen, "had no meaning and no terrors for Dan. To him the early Milesians, St. Patrick, Brian the Brave, Cromwell, and even 'the great Bonypart' were practically speaking contemporaneous." Englishmen would find it hard to believe how much the galled withers of the rustic Irishman are kept wrung by the prevalent impression that Cromwell's offences were of recent occurrence. Through Green Glasses is intelligently edited, and it may be that Dan's long stories will not bore some readers as we have to confess they have bored us. Nor, alas, is Mr. Andrew Lang much more happy with the story he has chosen to "do" into his invariably easy and charming English. Johnny Nut and the Golden Goose is a handsome book for children, with weakish illustrations and clever and beautiful marginal ornaments scattered lavishly through its large pages. But the story is extravagant in the manner that misses felicity and fun—very easy things to miss.

We have received the yearly volumes of the Quiver, Little Wide Awake, Our Little Dots, and The Child's Companion and Juvenile Instructor, all magazines well adapted to their purpose. A fault that seems to be common in fairy stories just now is an incoherence that may seem pleasantly fanciful to the adult writers, but that leaves the child-reader, with a child's precision and definiteness of imagination, in a wearying state of bewilderment.

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

THE title of Messrs. Binet & Féré's book is decidedly an unfortunate one. The expression "Animal Magnetism" has become so associated with charlatanism and imposture as to render it highly undesirable to connect it with a work which possesses some scientific merit. There is a further and still stronger objection to its use—namely, that it appears to imply the existence of a force (in the popular mind a fluid), analogous to magnetism and differing from ordinary physiological forces, passing from the operator to the subject. The fact really being that the phenomena of hypnotism are not due to any peculiar power residing in the person of the so-called magnetiser, but to the hyper-excitability of the subject's nervous system. "Artificial hypnotism" describes the condition under discussion more accurately and conveniently. The experiments of the authors have been numerous and carefully conducted, so as to guard against imposture on the one hand and unjustifiable deductions on the other. Messrs. Binet and Féré tell us that only certain persons are susceptible of being thrown into this admittedly morbid state, and that the great majority of these are to be found among hysterical women. The susceptibility to it can be greatly increased by what they are pleased to call "the hypnotic education." Whether the already unstable nervous systems of the subjects of experiment are likely to derive benefit from this kind of education can scarcely be open to discussion. In describing the production of hypnotism (on p. 99) they say that no apparent effect may be produced at the first séance, but that the attempt has impressed a permanent modification on his or her nervous system which will render subsequent attempts more easy, and that at each succeeding séance sleep will be more quickly induced, until finally the effect will be produced almost instantaneously. After this, as they graphically put it, "the subject is entirely in the magnetiser's power." We doubt whether this be a result to be commended, even if the operator's character be above suspicion. Undoubtedly these experiments tend to throw some light upon the abstruse problems of psychology, and have been carried out by our authors with a view to the advancement of science and consequent benefit to suffering humanity, but in less scrupulous hands such experiments might be turned to very evil purposes. Indeed, Mesmer, the arch-professor of "Animal Magnetism," had no compunction in throwing hundreds of wretched women into hysterical convulsions in order to gratify his avarice. The chapter on the application of hypnotism to therapeutics and education proposes the use of hypnotic suggestion for the removal of the delusions of hypochondriac and hysterical patients. It appears to us that we should be acting on sounder principles if we endeavoured to remove the morbid condition giving rise to the delusion, this latter being merely a symptom of the underlying disease.

To those who have doubts with regard to the value of vaccination as a protection against small-pox, we would recommend a careful perusal of Vaccination Vindicated. With those in whom anti-vaccination has become a fixed idea we fear that reasoning will have but little effect, and that the largest array of undeniable facts, with the deductions logically following them, will have as little power of penetration as water on the proverbial duck's back. As Dr. McVail truly says, among medical men—i.e. those who have opportunities of observing the disease and the preventive—there is no vaccination question. If compulsory vaccination were withdrawn to-morrow it would be difficult to find a doctor, in the three kingdoms who would cease to vaccinate his own children. It is within our own knowledge that, during the time the small-pox hospital at Hampstead was open for the reception of patients, only one case occurred among the employés of the establishment, and that in the person of an under-gardener who accidentally escaped the re-vaccination which was enforced upon all those entering the service of the hospital. This fact alone would probably be sufficient to satisfy those who are open to conviction. The author is specially fitted for the arduous task he has undertaken by his extensive experience of epidemic disease in his work as a medical officer of health and President of the Sanitary Association of Scotland. He has not been content to base his conclusions on the statistics of Great Britain only, but has obtained those bearing on the subject from many other countries. He places these very clearly before his readers, with the aid in some instances of diagrams. Dr. Wallace's pamphlet, which is certainly the ablest and most relied on publication which has emanated from the ranks of the opponents of vaccination, is carefully criticized, and the somewhat numerous fallacies contained in it are pointed out. We trust that Dr. McVail's book will obtain the large circulation which it deserves.

In the issue of this Journal of February 27, 1886, we made some comments on The History of Cholera in India from 1862 to 1881, by Deputy-Surgeon-General Bellew, to which work the present volume is a supplement. The first ninety-six pages of it are devoted to a recapitulation of his views as to the nature of cholera and its causes, with remarks upon its preventive and curative treatment. The remainder of the book consists of rather more than a hundred pages of tables of cholera mortality and registered rainfall in various districts of India during the eleven years 1871-1881. The author has no belief in the contagiousness of cholera, and thinks that, in the few cases in which a cholera-poison is developed, it is of a very "evanescent" nature. He looks upon the disease as an influenza of the intestinal canal produced by "a chill," resulting from exposure to injurious atmospheric conditions, and considers woollen clothing at night as one of the most important preventive measures. After discussing the diet and surroundings suitable for patients suffering from cholera, Mr. Bellew enters upon the consideration of its treatment by drugs. He relies principally upon a mixture of which quassia, krameria, capsicum, morphia, anise oil, and glycerine are the main ingredients, but does not give the exact formula for its preparation. This may be due to the fact that he contemplates obtaining a patent for the mixture under the title of "Almi' laj." We trust that it is not too late for him to reconsider this matter. We think it would be most regrettable if a man holding so deservedly high a position in the medical profession were to give his countenance to the pernicious system of patent medicines.

TIKHOMIROFF'S RUSSIA.*

AN English diplomatist, well acquainted with Russian affairs, expressed a few years ago an opinion in regard to the near future of the Russian Empire, which may be thus formulated:—"Unless a Constitution be granted, revolution; if a Constitution be granted, dissolution." When in 1856 Count von Moltke visited Russia as an aide-de-camp of the Crown Prince of Prussia, he declared that all talk about a Constitution for Russia was "sheer nonsense." There would be less "nonsense," perhaps, in talking about it now than there was thirty years ago, seeing that Russian proprietors in the territorial assemblies—the so-called "assemblies of the nobility"—have more than once formally demanded it. But even if popular representation were confined to Russia proper, it would lead to the expression of such contradictory opinions, such opposite tendencies, that the Representative Assembly would serve no purpose but to give publicity to a number of different and mutually hostile forms of discontent. A high Russian official justified, not long since, his deep objections to a Russian Parliament by declaring that such a body would, in the present condition of Russia, be equivalent to placing the government of the country in the hands of "Poles and Jews." Where the educated Jews would come from is not clear; though in Russia, as in other countries, Jews, when they are legally permitted to do so, advance rapidly to the front. But the Poles would come not from the kingdom of Poland, which would be either left unrepresented or provided with a special representation for itself, but from the Polish provinces incorporated with the Russian Empire, where the proprietors, with all their belongings, are, in spite of many confiscations, almost exclusively Poles; where indeed, it may fairly be said, that the whole of the educated class is Polish.

M. Tikhomiroff, in the highly interesting volumes which he has just put forth, demands for the manifold ills from which he declares his country to be suffering neither a constitutional remedy nor any other recognized form of cure; and all he looks forward to is an explosion of some kind; a bursting, in fact, as he himself puts it (though in less simple words), of the Russian boiler.

In dealing with the Polish question M. Tikhomiroff seems animated by a fair spirit, and he shows himself disposed to yield much more to the Poles than would be conceded to them by the great majority of Russians. He thinks they should be allowed to govern themselves within the limits of the so-called "kingdom of Poland"; and, while denying their right to regard as Polish the provinces detached from Poland and annexed to Russia at the end of the last century, he bases his denial not on the ethnological and linguistic arguments, so much in favour with his fellow-countrymen, but on the alleged unwillingness of the majority of the inhabitants to separate themselves from Russia. As, however, a self-governing Poland would aspire to independence, and as an independent Poland would never rest until it had recovered the Polish provinces incorporated with the Russian Empire, there is no likelihood of the Polish question being settled for a time in accordance with M. Tikhomiroff's views. These views are not, it is needless to say, those of the Russian Government; and the hopes of the Poles just now are based not on possible concessions from Russia, but on a probable conflict between Russia and Germany.

One is accustomed in Western Europe to look upon the Germans as rather a cultivated people. No greater mistake, according to M. Tikhomiroff, could possibly be made. The Germans of Germany, visiting or settling in Russia, are tolerable. But the Germans of the Baltic Provinces, who have been Russian subjects only since the time of Peter the Great, are not to be endured. Descendants of the cross-bearing and sword-bearing knights who colonized, Christianized, and civilized these parts, they remained Germans under the Swedish, as afterwards under the Russian, government; and it is only during the present year that any serious endeavour has been made to destroy their influence as Germans upon the peasantry around them. In former days they furnished Russia with a great number of generals, high officials, and diplomatists. Indeed, until the reign of Alexander II. Russia's representatives abroad were almost exclusively Germans from the Baltic Provinces, the only exception being at Constantinople, where it has always been the custom to place a true Russian of the Russian Orthodox religion. That these German-Russians, while devoted to the Emperor, cared nothing for Russia, except as a State, was doubtless true. They were accused, moreover, of looking down upon the Russians, and they may be suspected of having now and then congratulated themselves on certain advantages that they possessed over the Russians, who a century, and, above all, two centuries, ago were much less civilized than they have since become. According to M. Tikhomiroff, the Germans of these provinces have given no able men to Russia, with the exception of Todleben, whose ability he does not rank very high. But on reflection he would surely admit that, if they have not furnished Russia with men of absolute genius, they have supplied her with a considerable number of highly capable generals, administrators, and diplomatists. The story is known of the Russian whom his Emperor wanted to reward, and who, invited to say what favour he desired, answered, "Make me a German, Sire." So many high places in the military and diplomatic service of Russia were filled by Germans that the Russians first became jealous of them, and now propose to do without them. Accordingly they are beginning to educate the Lettonian and Esthonian peasantry of the Baltic Provinces as Russians, and they would gladly Russianize the sons of the German proprietors, pastors, merchants, and tradesmen, were it possible to do so—could they, for instance, force them to attend the Government gymnasiums, where in the three lower classes German, as the language of education, is at present replaced by Russian. In resolving to Russianize the mass of the population, without regard to the effect the measure must necessarily have on the German minority, the Russian Government may be justified by reasons of State; and it evidently believes that in the interest of Russia the Baltic Provinces ought to be as much as possible de-Germanized. One can understand, moreover, a thoroughgoing Russian like M. Tikhomiroff approving of this policy, dangerous though it seems. But, as a writer professing to give a fair account of Russia to the French, and through the French language to all who may feel interested in the subject, he surely ought not to represent the most civilized class of the most civilized part of the Russian Empire as habitually guilty of barbarous conduct. M. Tikhomiroff asks us to believe, without giving any authority for the cases he cites, that in the Baltic Provinces a German proprietor once shot a peasant whom he found trespassing on his ground; that a German pastor beat a peasant to death; and that some German magistrates sentenced a poor woman to live in the midst of a forest, where, but for timely succour (doubtless from some benevolent Russian), she must have starved. This last anecdote is evidently borrowed, as regards the main incident, from the tale of Geneviève de Brabant.

M. Tikhomiroff's account of the Russian commune is very complete; and he must be praised for his fairness in reproducing the views of those (the late M. Katkoff among others) who differ from him as to the origin, development, and maintenance of the institution to which the Russian Democrats and Socialists attach such extreme importance. For there is no agreement among Russian writers either as to the utility, nor even as to the history, of the national village system. According to some it is a purely Slavonian conception, which as a reality continues to exist from generation to generation through centuries because it is thoroughly in harmony with the genius of the Slavo-Russian people; who in many co-operative and (so to say) co-partitive associations, apart from land, do indeed show themselves to possess certain communistic instincts. In every Russian factory, for example, the workmen form of their own free will, and as a matter of course, a union for feeding purposes. A chief is elected, whose duty it is to cater for the general body. Each workman pays him a subscription fixed by common accord; and he is maintained in his position so long as he gives satisfaction. There are certain occupations, too, which are carried on under a general guarantee. The messengers of St. Petersburg, corresponding, as regards their duties, to our Commissionaires, work on this system; the general body being responsible for losses due to the conduct of any one. M. Tikhomiroff, then, and those who think with him—including all Slavophils and most Democrats—might, in support of their views, bring forward facts from the daily life of the Russian workmen, leaving the customs of the peasantry on one side. These latter, however, according to M. Tikhomiroff's opponents, are not the outcome of inherited instincts, but the result of laws imposed from above. Originally in Russia, as in other countries, land was held and cultivated in common; and in Russia, as in other countries, the communal system would gradually have disappeared, to be replaced by a system of separate holdings, had it not been maintained by the Government solely to facilitate the levying of taxes.

* Russia, Political and Social. By L. Tikhomiroff. Translated from the Russian, by Edward Aveling, D.Sc. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

The communal system is universally condemned by economists; and this condemnation was frankly accepted by the late M. Herzen, who argued all the same that, though it might not tend to the advancement of agriculture as an art, it "prevented the labourer from dying of hunger." M. Tikhomiroff gives an interesting account of the way in which, at intervals of so many years, the partition and repartition of the land is effected; and he shows how, contrary to the general belief on the subject, the cultivator of a duly assigned portion of communal land may sell it, and at the same time relieve himself of all communal responsibilities.

Every reader of M. Tikhomiroff's book will be eager to see what he has to say about Nihilism. He denies that Nihilism is the creed of men who, believing in no institutions, would annihilate all; and says that the designation of Nihilist, given in ridicule, has been accepted only in bravado. Of official Russia he gives so terrible an account as to suggest the idea that the Russians as a people are incurably bad; for it is difficult to believe that, if all men in the Government service are corrupt, many men out of it can be honest. He predicts no future for Russia, nor is it his business to do so. He is convinced, however, that the partially suppressed forces now at work in Russia must lead, before long, to a general explosion.

A PORTFOLIO OF PLAYERS.*

THE growing interest in the history of the American theatre, to a large extent due to the development of intercourse between the two countries, is likely to be enormously aided if the visits of entire dramatic companies become an established custom. The migrations of the New York stage to London have been generally too brief and infrequent to give the untravelled playgoer fair opportunity of estimating the artistic resources and true characteristics of the American theatre. Now and again, of course, an actor or actress of celebrity arrives from New York, with results that may be almost certainly measured in advance. These single visits of "star" performers are not object-lessons of the desirable kind. They reveal nothing to the average London audience of the artistic equipment and ensemble of American actors. They teach nothing; for everybody knows that America possesses, and has long possessed, great actors. From this point of view the visit of Mr. Augustin Daly's company was exceptionally interesting. Here was a comedy company of the highest reputation in America, animated by the artistic camaraderie by which alone finished and symmetrical representation is possible, working together under the self-same laws of art and with the like aims that have made the collective efficiency of more than one historic society of actors. The event proved extremely interesting and memorable to many English playgoers, and might have been even more fruitful in delight and suggestion if circumstances had permitted Mr. Daly to exhibit the true powers and complete range of his company. Such pieces as A Night Off, or the manager's amusing and always skilful adaptations from the German, sufficed admirably to display the quality of the company as a whole; but so partial a programme was only a glimpse into the repertory of the Daly troupe. Mr. Daly's too brief sojourn forbade any representations in pure comedy, though in this line of art are the company's finest achievements. We are reminded of this by the very handsome volume of criticism and portraiture issued by Mr. Daly, which in beauty of illustrations, type, paper, and all details that make for distinction, is comparable with certain famous albums of a similar nature that commemorate the French stage. A Portfolio of Players is something more than an album of portraits and character studies of the Daly company, and a beautiful book whose attractiveness is of an unusual kind. It comprises a capital preliminary essay on the American stage by Mr. William Winter, and a most interesting historical retrospect of the nineteen years of Mr. Augustin Daly's management, which takes the form of a series of critical notes on the leading actors and actresses, written by Mr. H. C. Bunner, Mr. Dithmar, Mr. Lawrence Hutton, Mr. Brander Matthews, and Mr. William Winter. The illustrations that suggest the various themes of this commentary are admirably executed by the Photogravure Company of New York, and may be divided into two classes—simple portraiture, and stage portraiture or tableaux. In the former Mr. Daly leads the way, followed by Miss Ada Rehan, Mr. James Lewis, Mrs. G. H. Gilbert, Mr. John Drew, and Mr. Charles Fisher. "The Reading of the Play" depicts an interesting group and a ceremony of the green room of ancient custom and high importance. Here we see a "long, narrow room, lighted by windows that open to Broadway," and Mr. Daly reading a manuscript play by the light of a lamp to the attentive company about him. Mr. Dithmar's description of the room, its curious contents, and many memories, forms a suggestive text for the plate, the grouping of which is very effective.

Mr. William Winter, in his essay on the past and present of the American stage, betrays something of the humour of his position as a critic and lover of the theatre of thirty years' experience in treating of a common failing of the mature playgoer. He is too sensible of the distinguished merits of the Daly company as now constituted to be laudator temporis acti; and at the same time, while rightly enthusiastic in dealing with Mr. Daly's management and the status of his company, he glows with the reminiscent fervour of a veteran when writing of the good old times. This fine catholicity of spirit is an agreeable feature of Mr. Winter's pretensions. No doubt the assiduous playgoer has a long memory, and the actor's day is only too brief. Too soon is the actor compelled to feel "our sons inherit us," and too soon, perhaps, do another sort of playgoers find his art is cold. But Mr. H. C. Bunner gives new point to this two-headed moral in his rhymal epilogue addressed "to a Reader of the Twenty-first Century," nor can we doubt that if any monuments survive so long, the poet is correct in counting upon the longevity of A Portfolio of Portraits. Mr. Bunner casts a kind of horoscope, after Mr. Dobson, setting forth the sentiments of the far-off reader of this Album, who finds himself in some dim library face to face with the charming Miss Rehan in The Country Girl, or as Kate Verity in The Squire, and other of these eloquent pictures of the stage:—

> "A treasure!" cries your bibliopole,
> With fervour in his musty soul:
> "A Daly private print—a chaste
> Example of our fathers' taste.
> They made books then—who can, in our > Degenerate days of magnet-power?
> See—Ada Rehan, Fisher, Drew,
> Dame Gilbert, Lewis, through and through,
> The sharp-cut plates are clear as new!"
> Then comes the old, the tardy praise—
> Those were the drama's palmy days.

It was ever thus, and will be. The tardy praise—two centuries show deliberation, certainly—is then the ready praise. Nevertheless, there will be plenty of ready praise for the Daly company should Mr. Daly return to London with the Taming of the Shrew, which ran a hundred nights straight off at Daly's Theatre last year, when it was given, says Mr. Lawrence Hutton, with Induction and all, as Shakspeare wrote it. And as much may be said of Mr. Fisher's Falstaff, Mrs. Gilbert's Dame Quickly, Miss Rehan's Peggy and Hypolita, and Miss Dreher and Miss Rehan in the Recruiting Officer. Mr. Brander Matthews, in a note on Farquhar's delightful play, refers to the "noble bead-roll of Miss Rehan's predecessors in the part of the tantalizing and fascinating Sylvia," and adds, "Since Mistress Margaret Woffington ceased to act Sir Harry Wildair, I do not believe that the stage has seen a better impersonator of 'breeches parts' than Miss Ada Rehan." Among the many admirable character plates in this volume, one of the most exquisite in dramatic expression shows the encounter, with its mock elaborate courtesies, between Sylvia and Melinda, represented by Miss Rehan and Miss Dreher. One certain result of the publication of this volume is to inspire its English possessor with ever fresh, though quite unneeded, desire to welcome Mr. Daly's next London season.

THE POLITICS OF ARISTOTLE.*

MR. NEWMAN'S long-expected Politics, for which many generations of classmen have sighed in vain, has appeared at last—or rather part of it has appeared. The first volume of some 570 pages contains essays on Aristotle, his politics, Plato, the Ideal State, earlier Greek political speculation, and other topics. The second volume presents us with the text of Books I. and II., with critical notes and an appendix. Valuable as is the work, we cannot but wish that it were shorter, and we think it might have been more happily arranged. It ill becomes the indolence and irresponsibility of a reviewer to tell an author how he should have written a work to which some twenty years have been devoted. And yet, when it begins to seem as if the book when complete will be about the size of the Waverley Novels, a sense of the shortness of life insists on making itself felt. As to the arrangement, Mr. Newman's learned and copious work would have been distinctly more attractive if he had begun with a short historical sketch of the actual conditions of Greek States and of the previous theories of political speculators. We should then have found Aristotle in the midst of his "environment," with his problems all around him, and with the earlier speculative and practical efforts to solve them before him.

Mr. Newman has adopted a scheme perhaps less agreeable, though for this, too, much may be said. He begins by ascertaining the place of the Politics in Aristotle's general scientific system. He shows us how it is linked to the Ethics; he notes Aristotle's distinction between Theoretic, Practical, and Productive science, and then he tackles what we may call the à priori conceptions and matter of Aristotelian thought—Necessity, Nature, Spontaneity, Fortune, Man. Now, it is true that the Politics is only a part of, or a moment in, the encyclopædic science of Aristotle. His political theories are animated and controlled as much as his moral or physical theories by his metaphysics and general system of being and knowing. But these pages of Metapolitics, if we may say so, with which Mr. Newman's book begins, are about as hard and gritty literature as any one can find. He certainly seems to dwell too long on an essential, but most unseductive, part of his task. Indeed, Mr. Newman confesses this:—"I fear that I shall frequently be found to try the patience of my readers, and not least in some of the opening pages of the first volume, which treat of matters of a somewhat technical nature." There is plenty of entertainment and general diversion in parts of Mr. Newman's book. He is often ready with a modern instance, and shows very wide reading. His comparison of Pythagoras in Croton with Calvin at Geneva is particularly neat and good (i. 377). But we wish that Mr. Newman could have taken the advice of Lucretius, and smeared the cup of learning with a little of the honey of entertainment. On the other hand, he has chosen to give us the most harsh and crabbed matter first. It is useful "for the schools," but it "do not over stimulate," as Joe Gargery says.

The more interesting of the early pages treat of Nature, in the Aristotelian sense. Like the opponents of Rousseau, he found it desirable to show that the State was a natural institution. Other philosophers, including his own pupil Dicæarchus, held that the condition of men, when they lived only on such things as the earth unsolicited brought forth, was "natural." The Australian blacks, then, would be the type of a natural society. But in such a society the State is unknown. Therefore, if Dicæarchus were right, the State would not have the sanction of naturalness. To Aristotle, however, Nature does not mean the starting-point. "The real being of Nature is rather to be found in the end than in the process, and rather in the process than its starting-point." Thus, in Aristotle's theory, the most natural State of all, the State in which Nature has her own way, is his Ideal State. It is very far, indeed, from being the ideal State of modern aspirations. The "people" have no say in its politics. A natural subordination governs it, and its lower parts exist (it is all they are fit for) as means to the end—namely, the strenuous happiness of such highly-endowed citizens as deserve to be so happy. The slaves and working-men are not free, of course; nor are they the masters of the community. But each element of the commonwealth is in its ideally best condition, because "that which is best for each thing" is identical with "the best which it can do" (i. 60). As the American said about eternal punishment, "our people would never stand it." Probably no people would stand the Ideal State; not that they would be worse off than in actual States, but because they would be frankly told that they were inferior beings, and that they could never hope to rise in the hierarchy. Aristotle himself, as Mr. Newman shows, was by no means inclined to think that perfection could be found even in a community à son devis:—"We even seem to gather from his language in the Politics that the main service which Political Science can practically render to the world is that of limited amelioration. It cannot make things right, but it can make them bearable." As Mr. Newman says:—"Aristotle's error lay, not in seeking to discover the end of the State, for he was right in accounting this to be the first step in political science, but in imposing on it one unvarying end, in giving too narrow an interpretation to that end, and in holding that it could only be fully attained through one type of society." Perhaps it cannot be attained in any type of society. But Aristotle has lost some of his value in our own modern circumstances. He was apt enough to neglect the possibilities of society among barbarians (though he studied their customs), and he does not even look forward to what society would be in consequence of the conquests of Alexander. Still less did he foresee the grinding industrial competition of to-day, and a new kind of barbarism which probably cannot long be endured by the world. He could always arrange a rubble foundation for his Ideal State, by using foreigners for slaves, merchants, artists, men of business. "There will thus be a considerable non-Hellenic element in the best State of Aristotle; its 'economic substructure,' if so we may term it, will be formed to a large extent of non-Hellenic materials" (i. 125). The wretchedness caused in Asia and Africa by perpetual slave-driving raids, to supply Aristotle with his non-Hellenic substructure, does not give that philosopher a moment's uneasiness. "Aristotle was probably not aware how much evil and misery could be caused in the slave-producing regions of Asia and Africa by the wars which he sanctions for the purpose of capturing natural slaves." No, "he said it was bully," like Mark Twain's bad boy. The splendid natural arrogance of the Greeks enabled philosophers to regard the universe as practically existing for the sake of gentlemen, and all non-Hellenic races as developed to serve the Hellenes. With à priori notions like these, it was comparatively easy to construct Ideal States, and even to be tolerably comfortable in States which were not ideal.

Mr. Newman's remarks on slavery, and the apt historical illustrations which he adduces, make one of the most valuable and generally attractive parts of his work. His early pages on the metaphysical relations of the science are, to be sure, indispensable to close students, especially those qui honores ambiunt. But, just as M. Cardinal, when in rural retirement, read Latin books in cribs, so we would fain hope that some politicians will study Mr. Newman's exposition of the Politics. Ladies will find his learned remarks on the Greek household quite full of modern interest. "Many women seem to have hugged their chains." (It may be remarked that, as the men were never at home, they had nothing else to hug.) "Plato speaks of the sex, in the Laws (781 A.C.), as loving darkness and seclusion, and anticipates some difficulty in prevailing on women to come forth into the light of day." Xenophon mentions the pallor of girls who were kept indoors till they married—about fourteen. Mr. Newman quotes amusing passages from Menander (which we translate) about the expensive religiousness of women:—

> The Gods press hard on us,
> Hardest on men who marry; day by day
> Needs must we ever keep fresh festivals,
> And fifty times a day we sacrifice.
> Seven serving-maids play cymbals in a circle
> And wail in chorus,

like the women of Nestor at the sacrifice of the heifer in the Odyssey. Women could not be expected to like Aristotle's theory that men of thirty-seven should marry girls of eighteen. These would have led to "complications" in the Ideal State. Did space permit, it would be pleasant to quote Mr. Newman's picture of Aristotle's ideal young man, and his criticism of Aristotle's views about Communism. He does not think that Aristotle would have permitted unlimited accumulation of property. The Greeks partly evaded the difficulty about property by a political open-handedness—"were far more open-handed in their use of property than the Romans of the Republic." Indeed, Polybius says, "No one of his free will gives any one anything whatever belonging to him." Thus the immortal M. Cardinal was perhaps more Roman than he imagined. "Il ne donne jamais rien. C'est un système chez lui." The Romans of the Empire, of course, paid a great deal of Ransom in gifts and in the sportula.

Mr. Newman's second volume opens with a dissertation on the history of the text of the Politics. Probably the Politics were delivered in lectures; but then Aristotle appears to have written his lectures. Early traces of acquaintance with the book are examined with minute research. On the whole, Mr. Newman finds that "there is a certain amount of unity about the Politics, though it is not a well-planned whole. . . . How is it that the Politics, though indisputably a whole, is yet a whole in which we trace these discrepancies of plan?" He thinks that the State of the Politics "becomes in general intelligible if we suppose that Aristotle, notwithstanding his turn for systematization, allowed himself some freedom in working successively at different parts of the treatise, permitted each part to forget to some extent its membership of a whole, and failed to force on his investigations that complete harmony of form as well as of substance which rigorous criticism would require." Nothing could be more natural in a book written for lectures. Mr. Newman does not think, nor do we, that the Politics are a pupil's notes on the lectures. The discussion of the manuscripts and the old Latin translations is too technical to be analysed here. Mr. Newman has not revised Susemihl's collations (1872). He has collated the two books he publishes with a C. C. C. and a Balliol MS. Mr. Newman's debt to Susemihl is so frankly acknowledged that the amiable hunter of scholarly plagiarism may desist from the chase. But he is often at variance with the learned German. To criticize the notes, and compare them, for example, with those of the Master of Balliol, would be "matter for a separate dissertation." Mr. Newman and the Oxford Press are to be congratulated on this large instalment of a most conscientious and, to the right readers, most interesting and important work.

NEW ETCHINGS.

WE have received from Messrs. Gladwell Brothers, the publishers, an artist's proof in advance of an elaborate and very effective etching by Mr. W. W. Burgess, "The Gate of Honour, Caius College, Cambridge"—a subject replete with difficulties obvious enough to the uninitiated who are acquainted with the architectural environment. The thought and skill bestowed by the artist on his original study are productive of the happiest results in the plate. Everybody who knows Cambridge knows the three gates of Caius, built at the cost of Dr. Caius and designed by John of Padua, the architect to whom Inigo Jones subsequently was not a little beholden. Mr. Burgess, by his artistic work, has certainly honoured the old architect. The garden foreground, with figures skilfully introduced, and the Gate itself are presented almost entirely in the soft warm shade cast by adjacent buildings; the varying tone is admirably gradated throughout, in the modelling and differentiation of material, such as old brick, abraded stone, flutings, and so forth. The conjunction of clinging vegetation, like ivy, and architecture when in shadow is not one of the least of the difficulties surmounted by Mr. Burgess. Beyond the Gate other buildings arise in the sunny air, and suggest a striking contrast, though perhaps a trifle phantasmal.

From Messrs. Buck & Reid, of New Bond Street, we have received an etching by M. Brunet-Debaines after Gainsborough's "The Way to the Mill"—a typical landscape of the master, and one of the twelve paintings on the glass panels of the well-known Camera, now in the publishers' possession, and an interesting feature of the recent Gainsborough exhibition. The etching is in M. Brunet-Debaines's most artistic spirit, and admirable for fidelity of form and atmospheric quality.

The publishers of the Art Journal forward a proof of an etching, to appear in that magazine in February, by Mr. Macbeth Raeburn, after Mr. Pettie's painting, "Ho! Ho! old Noll!" a picture shown at the Manchester Exhibition and a characteristic example. The plate is in all respects an extremely spirited rendering of a brilliant work.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. DONATIEN LEVESQUE'S book on the chase in France and England (1) has two great merits; it is a very pretty book in mechanical execution, and a singularly well-conditioned book in point of temper. We do not know whether all readers will recognize at once what we mean by a well-conditioned book, but they will find it here. M. Levesque, an M.F.H., or at least M.H. in his own country, though, as he modestly observes, the dignity is not so great as with us, knows both French and English hunting well, and he is perhaps freer than any writer with whom we have ever met from the almost invariable tendency to depreciate one country in order to exalt the other. He seems to enjoy impartially his own chasing of the roe in Britanny, and the drag at Pau, and running after carted deer in the Home counties, and the less conventional sport on Exmoor, and the rigeur of foxhunting in the Vale of Belvoir; while his account (not from actual experience, it is true, in this case) of pigsticking, which sounds much more chivalrous and noble as "Chasse au sanglier à la lance," is enthusiastic and almost reverential. And all these sports, except the last, he describes at first-hand with vigour, precision, and zest. If he hints his opinion that the French fox, being a wilder and less cockered, is also a speedier and gamer, beast than the English, he more than makes the balance true by speedily dashing any jokes of Parisian cockneys about "boxed-up deer," and kindly informing the said cockneys that they will find a boxed-up deer give them an uncommonly good chance of showing whether they can or cannot sit a horse. We do not think he lays too much stress on an undoubted truth not always recognized, and the failure to recognize which is the cause of many English jests about the French chasse—to wit, that this latter is in a certain sense a more genuine and less sophisticated chasse than our own. For the French sportsman is, in this sense, a true hunter, that his first object, like that of his immemorial ancestors who hunted for food, is to catch a certain beast, while the Englishman wants in the first place plenty of hard riding and jumping, the catching and killing of the beast being rather a means to an end than an end to which means are adapted. M. Levesque, it should be observed, limiting his subject to "chasse à courre" (except a little joke about a chasse au tarin), says little or nothing about the two French sports, boar-hunting and wolf-hunting, which are most tempting to English imagination, but from what he does say it would appear, as one knows independently, that they have rather degenerated. There is, however, a good plate of a sportsman knifing a boar in the water, and generally it may be said that M. Arcos's plates are spirited and decorative, as well as cleverly drawn. The book is ushered in by an amusing, though tragic, story, how the author when a boy clubbed with a friend to the extent of their whole worldly means for the purchase of an English foxhound, bought a live hare for him to hunt, discovered that he would have absolutely nothing to say to that Puss, and, in a frenzy of wrath at what they thought the perfidy of Albion, slew the poor brute, only to find, too late, that he had been doing exactly what he had been carefully trained to do.

(1) En déplacement—Chasses à courre en France et en Angleterre. Par Donatien Levesque. Paris: Plon.

M. Pierre Sales has already done some creditable work in that Roman judiciaire which he makes one of his characters here (2) declare is "the only novel she reads." The worst of it is that the artist in this kind must be driven in time to emulate the immortal footman who wanted "some new hanimal." The variety of crime is not large. However, M. Sales is, comparatively speaking, a beginner, and he has not got nearly to the end of the Calendar. His present subject is arson, complicated, of course, with a plot to cheat Insurance Companies. A wicked Russian countess (of course), a good and persecuted young engineer (of course), an escape from New Caledonia—these are only a few of the attractions provided. The book is really well done of its kind. L'amant légitime (3) has not got a pretty title, and is not a very pretty book. Its three morals, however, or what we gather to be its three morals, are sound, if queerly illustrated. The first is "Don't marry a divorced woman"; the second is "On revient toujours, &c."; and the third—perhaps the wisest of all—is that of Middleton's play, Women beware Women.

Two volumes of the Pitt Press series of French Classics, which are before us, are of unequal value. Messrs. Masson and Ropes's selections from Thierry's Récits (4) are well made, the biography and introduction are judicious and sufficient, if not ample, and the notes, especially on the historical side, good. The merit of Mr. Bull's work is more strictly confined to his text. The introduction is as meagre as it can possibly be, and does not make the slightest effort to define Sedaine's place—no unimportant one—in the history of French comedy, while the notes contain such things as "un secrétaire: a writing-table," which the dictionary ought to render unnecessary. Some of the grammatical notes are, however, good.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE amateur in science must be a much more considerable person than the amateur in art, to judge from a new practical manual of telescopic research, Astronomy for Amateurs (Longmans & Co.), which is edited by Mr. J. A. Westwood Oliver, assisted by Mr. T. W. Backhouse and others. The amateur in astronomy differs from the professional observer chiefly in equipment and opportunities. He is, or ought to be, a fair mathematician, capable of patient, continuous observation in one field of work, and gifted with the self-denying virtues that become the scientific mind. He is reminded, not unnecessarily, that he cannot emulate the excellent results of amateur astronomy in the past if he is a mere desultory observer, content to "flit gaily about among the celestial orbs, spending a night or two with the moon," and then away to the stately bowers of Jupiter or the gleeful influences of Mercury. This, perhaps, is the popular impression of the man with a telescope. It does not represent those for whom Astronomy for Amateurs is designed, though it is conceivable that this book might work the reformation of one or two among the flighty class referred to. The ideal for amateurs in this many-authored volume is emphatically high, though it cannot be thought excessive when the past achievements of amateur astronomers are considered. Indeed, it is rather surprising to hear from the editor that "valuable contributions by English amateurs to astronomy are on the decrease," in spite of the vast improvements in appliances and methods. But this fact ought to stimulate amateur zest, and must be added to the ample encouragement to further exertion which is a pleasant feature of this manual. The paths to sound investigation are clearly indicated in Mr. Oliver's excellent preliminary chapter of pithy and practical advice. Mr. W. F. Denning, in an admirable discourse on the planets, and the other contributors in their allotted sections, are equally intent upon pointing out the fields of observation likely to profit the amateur. The book is well supplied with illustrative tables and a good index map of the moon.

A good system of arrangement and clear expressive exposition distinguish Mr. J. M'Gregor Robertson's Elementary Text-Book of Physiology (Blackie & Son). The definitions of terms are remarkably lucid and exact, a matter of the highest importance in a book intended for candidates and adapted to the requirements of the Science and Art Examinations in Physiology. The woodcuts and explanatory diagrams are numerous and good.

It may be doubted if a new Life of Wordsworth is a crying want in literature; but there can be no sort of doubt that Mr. James Middleton Sutherland does not fill the void by his biography, William Wordsworth: the Story of his Life (Elliot Stock). This is a dull, tedious book, heavy with all the sins of superfluous bookmaking. To describe Mr. Sutherland's style is impossible without examples as illustration. For his accuracy it is enough, perhaps, that he thinks the White Doe of Rylstone is "written in irregular metre and stanzas." He thinks it is "a notable fact" that Wordsworth at Cambridge once drank too copiously in honour of Milton, adding, with ludicrous solemnity, considering the incident is dealt with in the Prelude, "our object in thus recording what some might, perhaps, be inclined to wish had been omitted is simply to show—but that strongly—that he was a man of like passions with ourselves, subject, too, to temptations as we are, and not without sin." This precious sample of twaddle is surpassed by a passage (p. 160) commenting on a well-known anecdote in Crabb Robinson's Diary.

Mr. Paul Vedder's Playgoer's Pocket-Book (Spencer Blackett) is an excellent companion for the playgoer, and a complete epitome of production and performance during the dramatic year 1887. It retains the best features of the original issue, such as the reprints of playbills, concise statements of plots and judicious criticisms, while it makes a complete departure in illustrations. These comprise good process portraits of our leading actresses and a profusion of character sketches and tableaux which add greatly to the value of the book as a record of the contemporary stage. Altogether this handy pocket-book is an interesting memorial, and remarkably trustworthy for purposes of reference.

It is neither Jean Paul nor De Quincey who suffers by the unmerited distinction of poetic version in Levana, by J. S. De Calvados, illustrated by M. Tuke (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) Happily there is nothing suggestive of an abstract from De Quincey in the poet's wooden staves or the artist's fuliginous designs, and the fell attempt to convey De Quincey's conception through the "natural medium" of verse results in superlative bathos.

The "People's edition" of Bumblebee Bogo's Budget (Macmillan & Co.), a diverting collection of nursery poems and nonsense verses, is prettily illustrated by Alice Havers.

Practical Essay-Writing, by A. W. Holmes-Forbes (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), is a little handbook for candidates in competitive examinations, of real but limited utility; for very young and naturally inexpert hands.

The new revised edition by the Rev. C. F. Warren of Mr. Eugene Stock's Japan and the Japan Mission (Church Missionary House) is a well-illustrated and very readable account of the progress and present prospects of the Church Missionary Society's labours in Japan.

We have received Mr. Charles E. Sprague's Handbook of Volapük (Trübner & Co.); the Jubilee Edition of the Englishwoman's Year Book and Directory, by L. M. H. (Hatchards); The Wind, and Six Sonnets, by James Ross (Bristol: Arrowsmith); More T Leaves, by Edward F. Turner (Smith, Elder, & Co.), and Jack Horner the Second, by J. Jackson Wray (Nisbet).

Thus a Policy of £1,000 becomes one of over £1,654, or cash has been returned which, improved at 4 per cent., would equal £709, or the premium is totally extinguished.

Full examples at various ages will be supplied on application, but the above may be considered as representative.

N.B.—Bonus options at each division. No partnership liability. Modern practice. Simple proposal forms. Immediate settlements.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The above extraordinary results prove that a With Profit Policy opened with the SUN LIFE OFFICE can be had at considerably less than COST PRICE. Before assuring obtain and read the Prospectus of the Society.

WINTER STORMS AT SEA.

ACCIDENTS—HOSPITAL WANTED—HER MAJESTY'S SYMPATHY & HELP.

A colony of 12,000 men without one doctor in their midst is a conception difficult to realize. Yet the North Sea smacksmen are for eight weeks at a stretch cut off entirely from all home ties and comforts, and are exposed to constant and grave peril of life and limb. They labour night and day amid furious storms and bitter cold, and the cases of illness and accident—fractures, contusions, &c. &c.—are so numerous as to simply appal an average landsman.

For many years there was no succour for the poor fellows, and we have details of cases in which patients suffering from severe compound fractures were perforce detained at sea for a week, and in one instance thirteen days, before obtaining surgical treatment, and, under the most favourable conditions, a patient was two days' sail from the nearest doctor.

This state of things involved a very serious and unnecessary sacrifice of valuable lives, for many men were so badly injured as to be quite unable to survive the shock to the system caused by prolonged neglect and exposure. Immediate aid would, in many of these cases, have meant just all the difference between life and death.

The eight vessels equipped by this Mission to cruise with the trawling fleets are fitted with a well-supplied medicine closet and surgical chest, which have proved an unspeakable boon to the toilers.

It is impossible here to give details of the various cases; but the mere mention of last year's aggregate—3,633 patients, or more than 25 per cent. of the total number of North Sea Smacksmen—will show that an enormous amount of suffering has been alleviated. No one will wonder that the fishermen cry, "God bless the Mission Ships!"

What has been already accomplished, however, only compels the conclusion that the means hitherto adopted are utterly inadequate, and that a new departure is urgently necessary.

We have at various times been favoured by the visits of medical men on board the Mission Ships, and much of our success in this important department of the work is owing to the wise counsel and active help of these gentlemen.

The constant presence of a SURGEON in the fleets, for the treatment of serious cases of illness and accident on board the Mission Ship, and the retention there of the patients in cots provided for their reception, would prove of the utmost advantage to the thousands of poor fellows who are gashed, bruised, battered, and frequently suffering from severe illness.

The Hospital Committee of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen are most anxious to carry out what they consider to be the only method of adequately meeting the distressing need of these thousands of our fellow-countrymen.

The sole hindrance is the financial difficulty, and this we are assured will be promptly surmounted when the facts are fully understood by the public.

It is proposed to build and equip a NEW MISSION VESSEL, which shall serve the purpose of a FLOATING HOSPITAL. Her Majesty the Queen has graciously signified her deep interest in the scheme, and expressed a wish that the proposed vessel should bear the name of Queen Victoria, and she has further consented to become the Patron of the Mission, and has contributed £50 to the funds.

The Council of this Mission are profoundly impressed with the urgent need of suitably crowning the work so well begun, but at present their hands are absolutely tied by lack of the necessary funds.

Will not the British public, who profit by the Smacksmen's toil, contribute at this season to the help and healing of those whose life, at best, is hard and comfortless?

"NOR'ARD OF THE DOGGER"

Or, Deep-Sea Trials and Gospel Triumphs.

Being the Story of the Initiation, Struggles, and Successes of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen.

By E. J. MATHER, Founder and Director.

With Preface by THOMAS GRAY, Esq., C.B., Marine Department, Board of Trade.

And numerous Illustrations by J. R. WELLS and C. J. STANILAND, R.I.

"A very full account of the origin and work of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen, written by its Founder and Director, Mr. E. J. Mather. No time more fitting than the present could have been found for publishing this very interesting volume. No reader will lay down the book after finishing it without feeling that he has learnt much of the life that our fishermen lead when out with the trawling fleets. ....We can strongly recommend this book, and hope that more people than do so at present may be induced to support the Mission after learning its history." Saturday Review.

"A more thrilling narrative we have seldom met with.........Talk of 'the romance of Missions'! This book is the record of one continuous miracle.......... The telling pictures by Messrs. Wells and Staniland are worthy of the narratives they illustrate, and the whole forms in our judgment the book of the season." Christian.

BOOKS IN READING AT THE LIBRARIES.

THE LAST of the VALOIS; and the Accession of Henry of Navarre, 1559–1589. By CATHERINE CHARLOTTE, Lady JACKSON. 2 vols. large crown 8vo. with Portraits on Steel, 24s.

The Portraits to the above Work comprise Henry III., Henry IV., Henry de Lorraine, Charles IX., Anne, Duc de Montmorency, Sully, Le Chancelier de l'Hôpital, Gabrielle d'Estrées, and Catherine de Médicis.

THE LIFE of LORD CARTERET. By ARCHIBALD BALLANTYNE. Demy 8vo. 16s.

From the New Number of the Quarterly Review.

"Mr. Ballantyne's is the first attempt that has been made to place a full-length portrait of Lord Carteret before the eyes of posterity."

From the New Number of the Edinburgh Review.

"This book is something more than a mere character-study. To put together even the skeleton of a life whose scattered records have been waiting more than a century for a compiler is in itself no small labour. This is the first coherent account of Lord Carteret's life."

MEMOIRS of the PRINCESS de LIGNE. Edited by LUCIEN PEREY. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Portrait of the Princess, price 24s.

INSULINDE:

Experiences of a Naturalist's Wife in the Eastern Archipelago.

By Mrs. H. O. FORBES.
Post 8vo. with a Map, price 8s. 6d.

"No better account has seen the light of the general impressions to be gathered from a residence at Batavia, and from visits to Macassar, Amboina, Sumbawa, the Aru Islands, and New Guinea, in which latter country the writer was the first European woman to venture foot. The climax of the interest of the volume is reached in the chapters which describe the visit to the Timimber group."—Scotsman.

"Few more charming books of travel have been written than this description by Mrs. Anna Forbes of the experience of a naturalist's wife in the Eastern Archipelago."
Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

THE WRONG ROAD, BY HOOK OR CROOK.

By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS,
Author of "Fast and Loose," "Locked Up," &c.
3 vols. crown 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"'The Wrong Road' is as exciting and interesting as can possibly be desired."
Morning Post.

"It is an exciting story vigorously and well told........It is an eminently readable book."
St. James's Gazette.

"A wickeder woman than Mrs. Lelen was never concocted by novelist. She plays the leading part in an exciting and rattling story."—Athenæum.

"'The Wrong Road' is Major Griffiths's masterpiece."—Academy.

POPULAR TALES AND FICTIONS.

Their Migrations and Transformations.

By W. A. CLOUSTON,
Editor of "Arabian Poetry for English Readers," "The Book of Sindibad," &c.
2 vols. post 8vo. roxburghe binding, 25s.

"Mr. Clouston's book supplies a want which has been increasingly felt; and while its appearance will be hailed with satisfaction by the student, it cannot fail to give a decided impetus to the further popularising of the study with which it deals. It is eminently readable, full of matter well expressed, and set off by good paper and typography......The task which he has set himself, and in which the merit of a conspicuous success can scarcely be denied to him, has been to illustrate the growth and modification of popular tales......In one respect the book stands by itself among its kind. It gives the variants of the stories at length instead of merely indicating them by title or reference, and thus enables the reader to make his comparisons and draw his conclusions without the labour of consulting the numerous books specially devoted to the stories of particular nations."—Spectator.

NEW BOOK BY MR. FROUDE.

1 Vol. 8vo. price 18s.

THE ENGLISH IN THE WEST INDIES;

Or, THE BOW OF ULYSSES.

By JAMES A. FROUDE

With 9 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author.

Daily Telegraph.—" An excellent volume, the brightness and life of which loses nothing by contrast with occasional touches of grave speculation and prophetic seriousness."

The Globe.—" Once open this new book of Mr. Froude's and you must needs go on with it. The writer holds you by his glittering style, and you cannot choose but surrender to the spell. The fascination is complete."

Spectator.—" Possesses in a high degree the inestimable gift of being thoroughly readable, and the effect on the reader cannot but be to awaken his interest on a subject of such vast importance as the rule of the English among the negroes of the West Indies."

Land and Water.—" Simply the most fascinating book of its class ever written. Of its class, do we say? It is rather sui generis. In brilliant descriptive, in glowing pictorial beauty, it can be compared only to Kingsley's 'At Last.' In its other qualities, it can be compared to nothing."

Standard.—" Since Anthony Trollope wrote his pleasant book on the Antilles, no work half so interesting, or a tithe so authoritative, has appeared on the British West Indies as Mr. Froude's latest contribution to the literature of what were once the pearls of our colonial empire. The 'Bow of Ulysses' is worthy of the author of 'Oceana.'"

The Times.—" Mr. Froude's brilliant book on the West Indies is, perhaps, the most enjoyable he has ever written, and has a wider interest than might be inferred from the title. Never has he thrown himself with more intensity into those broad and burning questions which concern the future of the empire. Never has he found happier opportunity for fervent eloquence or picturesque description, and he has seldom displayed his powers to greater advantage."

Professor of Chemistry, Durham College of Science; and W. CARLETON WILLIAMS, B.Sc. (Vict.) F.C.S. Professor of Chemistry, Firth College, Sheffield. 8vo. 18s.

" This is perhaps the most important and profound philosophical treatise on one of the most fascinating and widely studied sciences...... There could scarcely be a more acceptable book published than this translation, which commends itself by the manifest care exercised in its production."—Scotsman.

LONDON: SPENCER BLACKETT (Successor to J. & R. MAXWELL).

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

BY THE EARL OF SELBORNE.

CHURCHES and TITHES, ANCIENT FACTS and FICTIONS CONCERNING. By ROUNDELL, EARL OF SELBORNE, Author of " A Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment " &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The Guardian says:—" Lord Selborne's 'Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment' was a cogent statement of facts, marshalled with the skill of a practised advocate, enforced by the practical sagacity of an experienced statesman, and fortified by the research of a careful statistician. But as a permanent contribution to ecclesiastical history 'Ancient Facts and Fictions' belongs to another and far higher class of literature......Regarded as an armoury of weapons of defence for the Church of England the value of 'Ancient Facts and Fictions' is very great."

NEW AND POPULAR EDITION. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE MAKERS of VENICE; Doges, Conquerors, Painters, and Men of Letters. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of " The Makers of Florence " &c. With numerous Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 21s.

The Guardian says: " Mrs. Oliphant tells us of the Orseoli and Michielli, of Enrico Dandolo and the revolt of Bajamonte, of the conspiracy of Faliero and the dishonours done to Francesco Foscari, that we are content for a while to allow the figure of the great Republic to be dwarfed and obscured by those of her citizens and servants. In other chapters we are told the story of the travels of Marco Polo, of the straits from which Venice was rescued by Carlo Zeno, and of the doubtful treachery of Carmagnola. Then the painters are dealt with—the two Bellini, Carpaccio, Titian, and Tintoretto. In the paucity of native genius for letters a chapter is devoted to the story of Petrarch, and the book ends with an account of the printing-press of the Aldi, they also strangers to Venice."

PERSONAL REMEMBRANCES of SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, Second Baronet, sometime Queen's Remembrancer. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s.

The Times says: " The writer has made acquaintance with most of the well-known wits and men of light and leading in the arts and sciences, in law and literature......In reluctantly taking leave of the 'Remembrances,' we can only repeat that they are as free from prolixity as they are full of variety."

NEW NOVELS.

THE SECOND SON. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of " The Curate in Charge," " A Country Gentleman," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

FOUR GHOST STORIES. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Next week.

PAUL PATOFF. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Author of " A Roman Singer," " Mr. Isaacs," " Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Saturday Review says:—" Altogether 'Paul Patoff' is one of the freshest and most original books that have been published for some time."

The Academy says: " Did space permit we should like much to quote many wise passages in this delightful book."

The Daily Telegraph says: " It need hardly be said there is witty dialogue and bright description in the novel."

A PALPABLE HIT.

FROM the number of protests which we have received in regard to the article headed "And other University "Men" in last week's Saturday Review, we can only suppose that the shaft has gone home. And we are very glad of it. Of personal reference there was, we need hardly say, nothing in that article which was not justified by public documents, open to all intelligent readers, and familiar to most such. But from the indignation which the exposure has caused to some persons concerned, we can see, as we previously suspected, that the said persons concerned have been utterly ignorant of what they are doing. That is what we thought. There are supporters of Home Rule whom no one would suspect of ignorance, and in regard to whom no one need, therefore, take rough methods to awaken the sleeper. But there are others who are evidently unaware of the company which fate and the metaphysical aid of Mr. GLADSTONE have compelled them or induced them to keep. It is not a question of advocating this or that method of arranging the Legislature and the Executive of a part of HER MAJESTY'S dominions. It is a question of encouraging, directly or through the abettors of them, murder, cruelty to women, cruelty to animals, rent-stealing, insults to the QUEEN. We can shake hands with men who differ with us as to the suffrage, as to tariffs, as to the House of Lords, as to foreign policy. We can shake no hands with men whose entire scheme and creed is the abrogation of the common principles of humanity and morality. Now we believe, and we are much strengthened in our belief by the protests above referred to, that simple ignorance is at the bottom of much of the support (poor as it is) that Mr. GLADSTONE'S conversion to Home Rule has received. The references made to the Parnellism and Crime pamphlet, which is a simple collection of fact, as if it were a new and unsupported mass of assertion, might have proved this. But the wincing of the galled jades proves it still more. We do not pretend to have any mercy on their galls. For they have nothing to do but to throw off their burden and be free folk once more. And we take the opportunity to assure them that we shall never treat Home Rulers of the present kidney as ordinary political enemies, and that no man who knows the facts of recent and past Irish history ever will treat them so. For they are not politicians—they are malefactors; they are not partisans—they are simply perpetrators or abettors of the basest and most cowardly crime.

THE PARLIAMENTARY PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

FATE was in some respects unkind to the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY when he spoke at Chelsea last Monday. The Irish supporters of Mr. GLADSTONE had not then committed their last murder in Kerry or been convicted of their last false witness in Cork; and Mr. SMITH had to talk of Ireland. Yet he was able to make some effective points even in this part of his speech, and to demonstrate that, despite the disaffection and the distress of which we hear so much, the loyal people of Ireland are able considerably to increase the returns of the whisky duty, at the same time that they do not neglect the enlargement of their accounts with the Savings Bank. A more convincing testimony as to the grinding poverty which oppresses the country under the rule of Mr. BALFOUR and the landlords could not be desired. Nor were Mr. SMITH'S references to domestic and purely English affairs unimportant. He did not, indeed, claim credit as, after an announcement in the newspapers a few hours before, some expected that he would, for a singular improvement in the management of his own department. Last year the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY had to confess that the funds available for Civil List pensions had been so forestalled that there was no money for one of the most original of English writers, who was at the time in the greatest straits. This reckless way of administration must have been changed, for this year there is apparently money enough to supply a pension for "services to literature" in the sad case of a young lady, a member of a wealthy family, who, having travelled for her amusement during several years, has recorded her travels in a series of volumes, lively and popular enough, but the writing of which is about as much a service to literature as, let us say, the writing of the present article. Mr. SMITH said nothing about this, but he said some sensible things about tithes, and some other sensible things about reciprocity. A less good-natured person than Mr. SMITH might have commented with more pungency and less good humour on the conscientious resolve to keep in one's own pocket something which, even if it had not to be paid to persons conscientiously objected to, in no real sense comes out of one's own pocket at all. We are, however, frequently told that sarcasm is not statesmanship—a doctrine, at all events, convenient for, and perhaps natural to, a party whose only Mr. Sarcastic is Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT. In reference to what appears to be called popularly the "free and fair" discussion there is nothing more valuable than common sense, and even his enemies admit that Mr. SMITH has plenty of that. Some of those enemies would have shown more of the quality if they had not hastened to hint that Mr. SMITH, in admitting the theoretical perfectness of reciprocity, displays the cloven foot of Protection. There may be some Free-traders so silly as to think that Free-trade has, like other fetishes, virtues independent of its demonstrable or intelligible working; but it would be well for them not to proclaim their belief quite so unreservedly.

On none of these points, however, was the speech listened to, nor did it deserve to be listened to on any of them, with as much interest as that which rightly belonged to its utterances on the prospects of the coming Session and on the intentions of the Government as to the conduct of business. These intentions were announced with a frankness rather unusual, though, of course, etiquette prevented the actual details of the Government proposals from being communicated to a non-Parliamentary audience before the meeting of Parliament. Mr. SMITH is to be congratulated in at least one respect, that he did not mince his words in describing the state of things which has made the new proposals necessary. As in the other case of the fraudulent detainers of tithe, he used no offensive epithets, but his language was as plain as any one can desire. "The time has passed away when the House of Commons," regarded, not as a whole, but as a collection of individual and irresponsible members, "was capable of so "conducting itself that its business was performed with "order and decorum." This is an uncommonly ugly thing for a Leader of the House to have to say—a thing the ugliness of which is perhaps a little concealed by the combined simplicity and mildness of the language used. But no worse charge could be brought against any legislative Assembly [illegible]nately, no truer charge could be brought [illegible]ative Assembly in question. Translated [illegible]uave and conciliatory phrase into blunt [illegible]nent comes to this. The House of Commons [illegible] composed, with rare exceptions, of gentlemen [illegible] so composed now. It used to be composed, with rare exceptions, of men of business; if we wish to apply that term generally now, we must, in a very great many cases, translate it loosely into French, and say that the House of Commons is largely composed of political chevaliers d'industrie. The House of Commons used to be composed, with the rarest exceptions, of men who were loyal to the Crown, the Constitution, and the general interests of the country, though they might differ about the best way of showing their loyalty; it is now composed in great part of men who are wilfully, if not avowedly, traitors to all three. That is a very pretty state of things, and, unfortunately, it is the true state.

We profess no enthusiasm whatever for Mr. Smith's and the Government's scheme of endeavouring to remedy this state by increasing the powers of the majority, and of the Speaker or Chairman as the majority's mouthpiece and representative. We are not particularly sanguine even as to the power of these remedies to achieve an immediate and apparent cure; and we disbelieve altogether in their power of eradicating the disease. It might be a satisfaction to the carnal man to see a metaphorical or even a literal chokepear put into the mouth of Mr. Conybeare or Dr. Tanner. But the carnal man himself, if he were rational as well as carnal, would acknowledge that the proceeding is a beginning at the wrong end. It is, perhaps, Mr. Conybeare's fault that he is Mr. Conybeare, but it is not his fault that he is member for Camborne. That is the fault of the constituency; and unless the constituency is taught better, or disfranchised, a Conybeare will a Conybeare succeed. When it is taught better, or disfranchised, the gag will become unnecessary. But it is, no doubt, true that the Government have a sufficient practical answer to this discouraging philosophy. They cannot disfranchise Camborne, or teach the individual miner of that unlovely town, and not very lovely district, that he cannot commit a greater political crime than to return Mr. Conybeare. They can gag Camborne's elect. Nor are they guilty of the beginning of Clôture, wherein, as in Land Acts, as in State Socialism, as in all other kinds of political nostrum-taking and dram-drinking, the lesser dose inevitably brings on the greater. In some respects, too, the actual working of the experiments in Procedure of the last few years has, no doubt, taught some lessons, and discovered some remediable faults. It may be undesirable to have Clôture at all; but it is clearly still more undesirable to have a mock system of Clôture, which is partly inoperative and partly provides shelter and machinery for the evil ones. All this is true enough, and those who are most inclined to the pessimism formulated above will acknowledge that no doubt the Government is expected to do something. And it is at least satisfactory that, if they are going to do something, they are, as would appear, not going to take half-measures. The protection of minorities may be and is a good and desirable thing. But it is probably impossible to fix any hard-and-fast point at which a minority ceases to be so small that it ought to submit to neglect, and another hard-and-fast point at which it becomes so large that it is not safe to neglect it. Practically the sense of the majority for the time being must always determine these points in fact, and therefore there can be no very strong reason why it should not be formally permitted to determine them in theory.

LOVES OF THE POETS.

Love, according to the Latin Delectus (which, like Angelica, "is always right"), is "a strange thing." Poets differ about it, and Mr. Matthew Arnold and Mr. Alfred Austin have been differing. It began with Mr. Arnold, who, in a diverting review of Professor Dowden's Life of Shelley, spoke his mind about Shelley's flirtations. "What a set, what a world!" cried Mr. Arnold, thinking of Godwin, thinking of Miss Claremont, of Byron, of Emilia Viviani, of all the Harriet and Mary problems.

Mr. Alfred Austin is not satisfied. He thinks that Mr. Arnold has become a Philistine, or that the Delilah of respectability has cut the locks of the critical Samson. "These dreadful poets, how much they have to answer for!" exclaims Mr. Austin, with fine irony. Mr. Austin, however, adds that the Harriets and Marys of this world "have encouraged them in their evil ways since summer "woods were leafy, and I fear they always will." Is this quite chivalrous? "The woman tempted me," said Adam; and for this excuse are his sons still blushing. Besides, did Harriet "encourage" Shelley to run away with another woman, and then to borrow money from herself to keep the other woman in elegant Continental retirement? That was Shelley's "evil way," and we have never heard that Harriet encouraged it, though she sent the money. Did Lady Jane encourage Sir Pitt to give Becky that diamond clasp? Did Mrs. Shelley II. encourage Shelley to write Epipsychidion? Did Emilia Viviani encourage Shelley to drop her, and say that "she led her husband a devil of a life"? These, these were Shelley's "evil ways," and the reply of Adam, and of Mr. Austin, is not here a valid, any more than it is a sportsmanlike, reply. The complaint is not so much that Shelley was a flirt as that he was an excessively disloyal and dishonourable flirt. "When one has ceased to "love," says Rochefoucauld, "one is ashamed of ever "having loved." Shelley used to be ashamed, and behaved as if he was.

As to the "world" and "set" he lived in, Mr. Austin asks if they were not better company than the Oriel dons, than those about Wordsworth? Well, no doubt an afternoon in a gondola with Shelley and Byron would have been more pleasant than taking tea and sonnets with W. W. No doubt Miss Claremont was prettier and more attractive than Dorothy Wordsworth. But pretty and attractive ladies do not redeem the quality of a set. When a man had stayed a week in Shelley's world, he would have had a row with Trelawny, he would have backed Godwin's worthless paper, lent money to Leigh Hunt, would have been bored by Polidori, would have got into an entanglement with Jane or Claire or one of the odalisques of the moment, and would have been as nearly starved as Scott at Rydal. Wordsworth's set were a better set, after all. Mr. Arnold talks about "Theban horrors," and Mr. Austin asks why he does not call the Theban set such a set, such a world. Why the Theban family (setting aside old scandal about Labdacus) were virtuous, but unlucky. Jocasta and Œdipus were at worst unfortunate. Their misfortunes were unconscious accidents. That is the very gist of the story. Laius did not borrow money from Œdipus, who had run away with his daughter, and was spunging on his own wife! These are horrors more than Theban, as we have heard of "mysteries more than Eleusinian." Happily there are poets and poets, loves and loves. When Scott sat, in old age, at the foot of the Tower of St. Rule's, which he had no longer the strength to climb, he remembered the name that he had cut in Runic characters on the grass, thirty years before, and found that it had "still the "power to move his heart." "'A poet sang of me,' says "one of them," Mr. Austin remarks, and he thinks that ought to satisfy the objects of the poet's transient affections pretty well. But he is not quoting a lady; he is quoting Thackeray's paraphrase of Ronsard's sonnet. However, there is a pleasant redeeming youthfulness in Mr. Austin's remark that seven-eighths of the people who read poetry and are interested in poets are women. How little a poet may know of woman's ways if he thinks that she cares for poetry! For poets she may care, when they are young and curly; but for poetry—not she! However, the whole question of the loves of the poets has been satisfactorily treated by Mme. de Framboisy in a novel of that name by M. Xavier de Montépin.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN.

Sir George Trevelyan maintained in his Welsh tour the well-earned character of being among competitors of his Parliamentary and official rank the most distinctively and exclusively a partisan; but at Swansea Mr. Dillwyn, in proposing a vote of thanks to the principal speaker, enunciated with still more perfect accuracy the Separatist creed. After unkindly reminding Sir Hussey Vivian, who had previously spoken, "that he had not been able at "first to support Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill," he boasted that "he" (Mr. Dillwyn) "had." It is but fair to admit that, after ascertaining the electioneering advantages of either policy and the resolutions of the Caucus, Sir HUSSEY VIVIAN has made up in zeal and strong language for his original hesitation. Mr. DILLWYN anticipated his friend's conversion to Home Rule for reasons which he explains with admirable frankness. "He supported Mr. "GLADSTONE's Home Rule measure from the very first. They "had hardly seen it, and did not exactly know what it con- "tained, but they knew it was a measure for the liberty of "Ireland, and put forth by a man who he was certain was on "the right side, and therefore he supported it." They did not go into detail, but he and other strong Liberals resolved to support it as they had supported other measures of reform. Such intelligent politicians relieve Mr. GLADSTONE of the necessity of finding plausible reasons for consulting his own interest, when majorities, and consequently his own convictions, shift and change. Mr. DILLWYN had followed his leader not less loyally when Mr. GLADSTONE opposed Home Rule, and passed and administered a rigorous Coercion Bill. He did not exactly know what Mr. GLADSTONE meant, but he was at all times certain that he was right. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's rule of conduct is somewhat less easy to determine, as he is deeply pledged never to dissent from any doctrine which may be adopted by the Liberal party. He has already found it necessary to join, and then to desert, one section of that party; and he might have avoided one of two successive changes of opinion if he had, like his simple-minded friend, supported the Home Rule Bill without knowing what it contained, and, still more, if he had shared Mr. DILLWYN's certainty that Mr. GLADSTONE was always in the right. Like Sir HUSSEY VIVIAN, Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN has since made up for a brief interval of heterodoxy.

In one or two of his speeches Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN fell into some confusion as to the arrest of an Irish offender in England. He first contended that Mr. COX would have been exempt from extradition in any foreign country, because the charge against him was of a political character. The answer was obvious, that Mr. COX was liable to apprehension under an Irish warrant because England was not a foreign country. Lord SALISBURY paid Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN the compliment of assuming that he could not have committed so flagrant a blunder. He therefore remarked that Sir GEORGE must have held the opinion which could alone have justified the argument about extradition. It became necessary, therefore, to choose between two equally untenable propositions, or to admit the existence of an inextricable dilemma. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN attempted to evade the difficulty by the strange explanation that "he had stated the simple fact that no member of any "other nation than Ireland could be arrested for such an "offence on British soil." In the first place, Ireland is not legally or constitutionally a nation; and, whether or not it were entitled to such a description, there is no other nation which is united with Great Britain. Of course a Frenchman or an Italian could not, except by virtue of treaties confirmed by Act of Parliament, be apprehended in England for a breach of indigenous law. It is only on the application of a foreign Government that a man can be apprehended in England for a theft committed in America or in Europe. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN himself would hesitate to contend that the relations of Great Britain and Ireland ought to be compatible with treaties of extradition. He must assuredly know that at present the legitimate method of pursuing a fugitive criminal from Ireland is to procure in England, under the proper forms, the execution of the original warrant. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN can scarcely believe that such offen.ces as that which is charged against Mr. Cox would be tolerated in any Continental country. As Chief Secretary he must have known and sanctioned the ordinary mode of following criminals within the United Kingdom.

At the close of the weary season of platform controversy it may not be unreasonable to make or to repeat a final protest against the factious attacks on the Government for performing a plain duty. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, like other political advocates of Mr. GLADSTONE's measures, shares the mischievous modern heresy that the Executive Government has a discretion to enforce or to suspend the law. The present Ministers were not entrusted with the powers which they have exercised under any obsolete statute. Parliament had, after a prolonged contest, passed the Crimes Act for the purpose of providing an immediate remedy for Irish disorder. One of the provisions of the Act rendered it necessary once more to obtain the approval of Parliament before any political organization could be proclaimed as unlawful. At the end of the Session Parliament expressly authorized the proclamation of the National League. The enforcement of the Proclamation in any district was to be left to the judgment of the Lord Lieutenant. Even the wildest Separatist can scarcely deny that the Government has strictly confined itself to the execution of the Act. If it is wrong to punish newspaper proprietors for publishing reports of National League meetings, the fault rests, not with Mr. BALFOUR, but with an overwhelming majority of the House of Commons. It is greatly to be regretted that Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN followed the example of coarser and duller agitators in making violent attacks on Irish courts of justice. He had, according to his own account, to go back to the days of the STUARTS to find such shameful scenes as that of the trial of Mr. T. HARRINGTON "in what "was called a court of justice." "Lord SALISBURY had pro- "cured a Bill enabling the Government to send men for "trial on the charge of belonging to the National League." A politician of long experience and great ability should not need to be told that when Lord SALISBURY or any other person procures a Bill to be passed, it is the duty of every peaceable and loyal subject to submit to its provisions; but he has now thrown in his lot with a party which has become absolutely lawless.

The Separatist orators are never tired of complaining that Ireland and Great Britain are governed under different laws. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, with his usual indifference to practical considerations, expresses deep indignation at the proposed exclusion of Ireland from the Local Government Bill. It is nothing to a theorist exclusively devoted to the interests and doctrines of a party that at the present time Irish rural municipalities would be branches of the National League, exercising their administrative and financial powers for the oppression of their political opponents. Lord HARTINGTON's doubts as to the expediency of extending the Franchise Bill to Ireland have been justified by the virtual disfranchisement of two-fifths of the population. An Irish Local Government Bill, based upon household suffrage, would be still more anomalous and unjust. The grievance of distinctive legislation furnishes demagogues with a plausible subject for invective; but when they transfer their agitation to Wales they suddenly assume an opposite position. In one of his speeches Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN professed to think that, in some respects, the Welsh were worse treated than the Irish, yet there is not the slightest difference of law, of custom, of political or social conditions, between the Principality and the rest of the kingdom. The landlords are, for the most part, Welshmen, and, until the recent agitation began, they have been on the best terms with their tenants. Improvements are in Wales, as throughout England, made by the owner, and the occupier enjoys exactly the same legal protection as in other parts of England. There are even now comparatively few unoccupied farms in Wales; and the economic reasons which account for the general fall in the value of land give the tenant, in Wales as elsewhere, a great advantage as often as a new bargain is made.

Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN perhaps referred to the existence of the National Church in Wales, while the Irish Establishment has been suppressed. It would probably not occur to him to inquire whether any possible advantage would be derived from the confiscation of ecclesiastical property. It is more in his manner to assert that the Church in Wales offends the susceptible tastes of the Liberal party. His own well-known hostility to all Church Establishments impairs his authority when he selects for condemnation a special instance of the obnoxious system. No one listens to the Peace Society when it protests against any particular war; nor is it possible to believe that the assailants of the Church in Wales are actuated by any motives which would not induce them to pursue a similar policy in England and Scotland. There can be no doubt that the local and partial disestablishment of the Church would be represented as a conclusive argument against the continued maintenance of the remainder. The Irish Land Acts were passed on the assurance of Mr. GLADSTONE and others that the same agrarian theories could never be applicable to England or Scotland; yet the measures which were deemed to be exceptional are now habitually quoted as precedents for legislation in Great Britain. Another of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's Welsh grievances is, like the Church Establishment, common to all parts of England. The Justices of the Peace are, as he indignantly states, usually appointed in Wales, as in Yorkshire or in Kent, by the Lords Lieutenant, and not by popular vote. It is not surprising that, like almost all members of their class, the majority of the magistrates are Churchmen. There is no obstacle to the appointment of qualified persons who may happen to be Nonconformists. If a Lord Lieutenant shows partiality, the Lord Chancellor, of late years most often a Liberal, has absolute power to reject his recommendations and to supply his omissions.

Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN boasts that, as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he appointed two workmen as magistrates. It is to be regretted that any official person should gratify his party prejudices at the expense of the settled and ancient traditions of the Constitution. There may be a difference of opinion as to the comparative merits of a paid and an unpaid magistracy. It is certain that, if justice is to be administered by non-professional and unpaid functionaries, the magistrates ought to belong to the upper classes. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, if he thought of the practical working of his experiment, would perhaps not differ widely from those who disapprove of the appointment of mechanics as justices; but his habit of preferring party or democratic symmetry to all other considerations is rapidly becoming inveterate.

WHAT IS THE INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT?

THE present debate on the state of the navy possesses in an eminent degree all the elements of a very pretty quarrel. There is a considerable personal element in it, as may be seen from the emphatic assertions of all concerned that they have no personal feeling in the matter. This of itself is enough to give liveliness to the "in Court Persian "shindy" which is likely to go on till it is lost in the Donnybrook on the Address. But the most hopeful signs are these—that all parties are using the same words in quite different senses, than which nothing conduces better to the prolongation, sincerity, and acrimony of quarrels—and that the real question is much larger than the ostensible one. The fertility of confusion in the meaning of terms is nicely illustrated by the little passage of arms between Lord NORTHBROOK and Lord CHARLES BERESFORD as to the existence or non-existence at the Admiralty of an Intelligence Department before the present Ministry came into office. The former First Lord says that there was such a thing. The late Junior Sea Lord replies that this is only another proof of the need of an expert's opinion; for Lord NORTHBROOK has absolutely confounded the Foreign Intelligence Committee with the Intelligence Department, which is quite a different thing—so different, in fact, that it consists of ten officers instead of four. Obviously this is no answer, and it is open to Lord NORTHBROOK or Admiral RICHARDS, who has come to his help, to reply that the number of officers employed is not the essence of a department, and on this they may go on making contradictory assertions and chopping logic while the columns of the Times endure. In the meantime the bystanders can only make out that both sides are talking on parallel lines. We, who have a very strong personal feeling in the matter—namely, a vehement wish to see the British navy as powerful as it should be in the interests of all of us—would like, as a preliminary, to beg—since we cannot force—everybody concerned to define their terms.

A very little examination shows that what Lord GEORGE and Lord CHARLES have fallen out about is their respective ideas of an Intelligence Department. What, then, is this new piece of administrative machinery, and particularly, what is it according to Lord CHARLES? From its name it may be supposed to be a section of the Admiralty employed in collecting information, and for this work, four officers in London receiving reports from officers on active service and naval attachés would have been amply sufficient. But it was much more than this, according to the late Junior Lord, and even on the showing of Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, who confesses there was something "emergent" to be done in the Admiralty, and that the Intelligence Department emerged to do it. Lord CHARLES says it was formed to organize for war. This is a very good thing to do, no doubt, and had long been indifferently done; but, after all, it is a vague phrase, and stands itself in need of explanation. Everything depends on how you organize, and whether you are content with organization, and do not go on to fussy interference. Now, we are by no means persuaded as yet that the department had not gone at least some distance on this last bad road. Admiral RICHARDS has, no doubt, as the Times tells him with withering sarcasm, served for ten years in the Admiralty, and is so far suspect; but he has made a quotation from Lord CHARLES and a comment thereon which are worth reading. The late Junior Lord has told the world that in case of war, "the wires being cut," the commander-in-chief on a foreign station "would have no "plan of campaign, would not know what to do himself, "would not know how many foreign ships were on his "station, would not know where he was going to get his "coal, and would not know what the British Admiralty "were going to do to help him." If this is really so, then something was very "emergent" in the state of the British navy—and it was the necessity for instantly putting all the admirals on the retired list, not to say Bynging (by analogy with Dewitting) a dozen or so of them just to encourage their successors. On Lord CHARLES's showing, all the existing list of flag officers are born idiots, who are habitually and grossly ignorant of their duty. The seniors of the present seniors who were sure in their day that the service was going to the devil would seem to have been in the right. But we can hardly believe it even when Lord CHARLES tells us so. On the whole, it seems to us less probable that all admirals are lazy fools than that the new broom in Whitehall was desperately anxious to sweep with vigour. We are confirmed in our opinion by Admiral HORNBY, although he does write to support Lord CHARLES; for his letter shows that one admiral at least understood that the business of a fighting force is to fight, and that the duty of its commander is to know how to fight. If the Intelligence Department really wishes to direct every squadron from London, and supply plans of campaign to the admirals responsible for the fighting, the sooner it is sent to see a little active service on the east coast of Africa the better. We do not accuse it of such gross folly, and make the necessary allowance for the vehemence of Lord CHARLES's language. Still, it is not taking his words too seriously to believe that, in his opinion, the Intelligence Department ought to be the final authority at the Admiralty. All the talk now going on about the improper use of the pronoun "we" by the First Lord (a mere civil usage which deceives nobody who is not what Lord CHARLES by implication calls the British admiral) means nothing else. It is a defensible proposition that both the navy and the army ought to be administered by professional men, and not left at the mercy of Parliament as they are. If any man says so, we shall think twice before contradicting him; but then the change could be effected without the need of a new department. It is our unlucky fate, however, that all attempts at improvement in administration mean more "departments" and more officials—ever new wheels to the machine, and not better use of what we have.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

ALTHOUGH the details of the Local Government Bill, as it is to be laid before Parliament, are by this time settled, some of the questions which it will raise may be profitably discussed. Novel and complicated measures are seldom passed in the exact form in which they are first introduced; and the Ministers are in this case neither impressed with strong convictions of their own nor well informed as to the wishes of the country or the House of Commons. Scarcely any Bill of similar importance has up to the present time been expected with equal indifference. The counties have intimated no desire for the intended organization, and only a few political theorists are anxious for a symmetrical adjustment of local authority. The reasons for producing the measure have had little to do with the merits of rural municipalities. It has been thought necessary that the Government and the House of Commons should undertake some kind of legislation which has no relation to Ireland; and the less numerous section of the Parliamentary majority is especially anxious to prove that its energies are not wholly absorbed in the struggle for the maintenance of the Union. The Resolutions on Procedure, which are announced as the first business of the Session, may possibly disclose differences of opinion between the Ministers and their Liberal allies. On Local Government, which comes next in order, Mr. RITCHIE is confident that there will be complete agreement. No political party is pledged to any definite opinion on the subject, except that the Liberals will urge the adoption of a representative system founded on a popular suffrage. When the debates begin it may perhaps appear that unforeseen difficulties must be encountered, especially in the definition and limitation of the powers which are to be conferred on the new governing bodies. The framers of the Bill have had little opportunity of anticipating the judgment which may be formed on their proposals. It has been found impossible to elicit local opinion, partly perhaps because it has at present no existence.

Some representatives of urban Corporations have, with commendable vigilance, lately held a meeting for the purpose of guarding their own jurisdiction from encroachment. They probably express the opinion of all the existing municipalities in protesting against schemes of making the Corporations for any purpose subordinate to the new County Boards. If any design of the kind has been entertained, it will almost certainly be defeated. The wants and interests of townsmen and of rural populations differ widely; and constant jealousy and friction would result from any attempt to include them in the same organization. But for the vague language which has been used by some speakers and writers on local government, there would be little reason to apprehend such proposals as those which have been hypothetically discussed. The Boundary Commission has for the present provoked dissatisfaction rather in the counties than in the towns. Birmingham has made the appointment of the Commission an excuse for attempting to extend its own territory, and the Commissioners have been bent on re-adjusting the areas of Poor-law Unions without hitherto meddling with boroughs. It may be assumed that no projector would meditate interference with the independence of great cities such as Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham. It is not equally certain that smaller towns may not be in some manner placed in connexion with the new system of departments. It is hardly worth while to enumerate the objections to such an arrangement, because its fate would depend rather on votes than on arguments, and the borough members, who form a majority of the House of Commons, would, on the application of their constituents, easily defeat it.

It may perhaps be necessary for Parliament at some future time to make some changes in the law or practice affecting municipal boroughs. The vast amount of debt which they have, within a few years, incurred would be a proper subject for inquiry. The whole amount is estimated at two hundred millions; but probably the liabilities of Local Boards are included in the calculation. There are also anomalies which require correction in the police arrangements on either side of borough boundaries. It sometimes happens that criminals escape with impunity because the county and borough authorities are disinclined to common action. There may perhaps be other matters which require legislative supervision; but if the Ministers are well advised they will, on the present occasion, leave the Municipal Corporations alone. The Local Government Bill will afford them sufficient employment for the greater part of the Session, and possibly it may cause them some embarrassment. They will have aggravated the difficulties of their task if they propose to give new authorities a share in the administration of the Poor-law, which has hitherto been kept apart from the functions of Local Governments. Undue importance has been assigned to the overlapping of administrative areas, which causes no inconvenience to local residents, though it offends the sense of uniformity as it is represented on a map. The best chance of passing the Bill depends on confining its provisions to the real objects of the measure. The Ministers engaged in the undertaking because it seemed judicious to remove an apparent anomaly. The boroughs which are already governed by elected authorities need no such remedy. The Corporations would greatly resent a disturbance of their administrative system for the purpose of making it coincide with the new county government.

There is a still stronger reason for abstaining from interference with the Municipal Corporations. Their success and efficiency furnish the strongest argument for extending the same organization to counties. On all points a prudent legislator will frame the provisions of the Local Government Bill on the model of the Act of 1835. If the rule is observed, the functions of County Boards will be defined after the precedent of Town Councils, and rural as well as urban authorities will be strictly confined to their proper duties. Mr. RITCHIE stated at Sheffield that his Bill would not confer on the local authorities about to be created all the powers of Parliament. It may be hoped that it will not confer on those authorities any of the powers of Parliament. There has been much idle talk about relieving Parliament of a part of its duties by transferring the control of local legislation to the new municipalities. It would be grossly unjust to confer either legislative or judicial powers on elected bodies. Even in those cases in which their constituents are not interested, administrative Boards ought not to be erected into tribunals. Leeds and Manchester, Liverpool and Glasgow, have neither exercised nor claimed any power of the kind. It would have been an outrage to propose that the expediency of making the Manchester Ship Canal should be referred to the great Lancashire Corporations. Manchester would have unanimously sanctioned the scheme, and Liverpool would have been equally resolute in its condemnation. Neither would have thought of any interest but their own. Parliament is at present meditating the creation of a tribunal which will perhaps have to decide on similar issues, though its constitution and jurisdiction are not yet finally determined. Time will show whether it is competent to discharge its functions; but it can by no possibility be so unfit as a Committee of a Corporation which may be party as well as judge. Mr. RITCHIE's language seems to imply that the present Courts of Quarter Sessions will continue to exercise their present criminal jurisdiction. As he truly says, it would be a great misfortune to lose the services of the country gentlemen. The alternative would be the appointment of paid magistrates.

The defeat of the Local Government Bill by the opposition of the Municipal Corporations or from any other cause would be a serious blow to the Government. One great risk may be averted by avoidance of possible collision with the towns. It may perhaps not be equally easy to defeat Parliamentary resistance. The occasion will be peculiarly tempting to factious adversaries, because neither they nor the House of Commons will greatly care for the acceptance or rejection of the measure. Its progress may perhaps be comparatively smooth if the election of the governing bodies is entrusted to the present Parliamentary constituency. It is true that Mr. GLADSTONE is already bent on a further deterioration of the suffrage, to be effected under the pretext of a supposed improvement in registration; but it might be possible to give some protection to ratepayers in determining the municipal franchise. It will be interesting to learn whether, as in the urban municipalities, women will be admitted to vote. Lord SALISBURY's latest speech was understood to indicate his assent to a more democratic Local Government Bill than that which he might himself have approved. Mr. RITCHIE's statement that the provisions of the Bill were settled some months ago seems to imply that Lord SALISBURY's language applied to some other subject.

MR. GOSCHEN ON SAPPING.

AN eminent living statesman when asked what had been his favourite diversion at Eton replied, "Oh, I was one of "those —— saps," using the epithet which United Ireland weekly bestows upon Mr. BALFOUR. When the present Lord Rector of the University of Aberdeen was a boy at Rugby, he doubtless received from his schoolfellows one or more of the choice epithets which he enumerated in his Address on Tuesday. Whether Mr. GOSCHEN was called a "smug," a "swot," a "bloke," or a "mugster," he has always been, in the coarse but expressive phrase applied to a well-known schoolmaster, "a glutton for work." His remarks to the students of Aberdeen were loudly cheered, and they were indeed admirably adapted to the intellectual palate of Scotland. But perhaps they would have been more useful if they had been delivered at an English public school. The habit of preaching to the converted, of "carrying coals to "Newcastle," as Mr. GOSCHEN puts it, with daring novelty of phrase, is becoming far too common among those whom, with equal originality, we may describe as men of light and leading. Whatever may be the exact meaning of "intellectuality," it suggests at once the fervid youths who come from Scotland to Balliol, and are there familiarly known as "Snells"—a name not to be found, for obvious reasons, in Mr. GOSCHEN's vocabulary. We shall next hear of some eminent improver of his kind going down to Eton and telling the boys to spend as much of their time as possible on the river, or mildly suggesting at Harrow that cricket is pleasanter than VIRGIL in the summer quarter. Mr. GOSCHEN, however, can secure a more than local congregation for his sermons, and it may be hoped that his warnings against mental indifference, which is, if we remember rightly, one of the seven deadly sins, will be duly regarded by those whom they concern. His Address is an amusing contrast to that of his brother Lord Rector at St. Andrews. Mr. GOSCHEN has been complimented by Mr. GLADSTONE on his "un-"governable conscience," and a spirit of almost ferocious earnestness breathes through his advice to young men. Mr. BALFOUR takes things more lightly, more humorously, and less as if his life depended upon the use he made of the next half-hour. Mr. BALFOUR'S Address has been attacked as aimed at the formation of intellectual voluptuaries, which is the fine modern way of putting what your grandmother meant when she told you to mind your book. Mr. BALFOUR'S counsels were really very much like Dr. JOHNSON'S, who got through as much hard work as most people, and was nevertheless a great advocate of skipping. No imputation of frivolity can be made against the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. He denies, by implication, even the sacred axiom which has achieved an authority almost equal to that of Holy Writ, that all work and no play makes JACK a dull boy. His imagination is fired by the thought of German clerks discussing tough points of commercial law by way of relaxation from their more regular labours.

Mr. GOSCHEN'S Address is perhaps in its general tone, certainly not in its particular illustrations, more German than English. The intellectual passion of the Teuton is not a specially English quality, if intellectual doggedness is. The text of Mr. GOSCHEN'S discourse, though he did not quote it, was the Latin Father's injunction, "Concupisce tuum opus, et salvus eris," which may be roughly translated, "Fall in love with your work, and your "work will pull you through." It is impossible not to agree with Mr. GOSCHEN'S general conclusions, even if we still think that APOLLO was right in not always keeping his bow stretched. APOLLO had no German competition to fear, and was not forced to shoot for his living. A mechanical discharge of compulsory functions is probably the dreariest and most futile mode of behaving in the "conflux of two eternities." Mr. Justice BULLER'S idea of Heaven was "sitting at nisi prius all day, and play-"ing whist all night." Another learned judge, who took a "very brilliant degree, defined the law as just like classics, "an infernal grind." These things are matters of temperament, and Mr. GOSCHEN must have met with instances of good speakers who hated speaking. It is impossible for him or any one else to condemn too strongly the odious affectation, so common among English schoolboys, of winning success in examinations without working for it. No later form of priggishness can be worse than the hypocrisy of concealing legitimate efforts to gratify a laudable ambition. Mr. GOSCHEN somewhat overestimates the rage for athletic sports, which has been perceptibly abated during the last few years. The "intellectual interest," which he places at the bottom of his scholastic list, is a good deal less rare than he thinks, and has been stimulated by a wider range of teaching, as well as by better acquaintance with the art of education on the part of teachers themselves. But the most interesting passage in Mr. GOSCHEN'S address is that in which he draws the portrait of his own father. The elder Mr. GOSCHEN, of whom the public has hitherto heard little, must have borne some resemblance to the immortal WALTER SHANDY. He went to law, not with the object of gaining a vulgar material triumph, but for the sake of establishing a principle. He hated arbitration, because he learned nothing from it. "What was necessary for com-"mercial instruction, to establish a mercantile precedent, "was that a knotty point should be decided by a competent "judge, after having been argued out by first-class counsel "on either side." This is not a type of character very often to be found among men of business. It did not interfere with the late Mr. GOSCHEN'S success, any more than DAVID RICARDO'S "theories" prevented him from making a fortune on the Stock Exchange. If it were more frequently met with, it would do no particular harm to any one, and much good to lawyers.

M. TISZA'S SPEECH.

IT is interesting to contrast with the Hungarian PREMIER'S speech last Saturday a string of announcements which were made to the newspapers of the days immediately subsequent. There is, of course, in the first place the proposed expenditure of Germany, which, as before stated, amounts to some fourteen millions of English money to be sunk at once, while that sum is expressly declared to be not the certain limit. This imposes on a nation which has hitherto steadily resisted the formation of a large public debt the necessity of raising all but a fraction of the fourteen millions by loan, and consequently a solid addition to yearly expenditure. There is the announcement, peculiarly gratifying to Germany, that the Russian Government is about, at great expense, to create a new naval port in the Baltic—a port which not only threatens German shores, but is in itself to be situated at Libau, in Courland—in Courland, which is regarded by all Germans as part of Germania irredenta. New fortifications have been formally sanctioned by the CZAR at Warsaw and other places on or near the Polish frontier, as well as at Batoum, that remarkable free port which the vicarious generosity of Europe conferred on Russia for commercial purposes at the end of the Russo-Turkish war. That the attempt of the Roumanian Government to secure a guarantee of the neutrality of Roumanian soil should have failed is not in itself surprising, nor indeed very much to be regretted. The small States springing up in the East are not very desirable things in themselves; but in any case, if they exist, it is at least necessary that they should understand that they must make their own hands keep their own head. But at this particular time both the application for the guarantee and the refusal of it are significant things. And it is believed that some not very definite expressions of M. TISZA'S own point to a scheme for increasing the Austro-Hungarian forces somewhat similar to the new German scheme, and involving, like it, a considerable expenditure of money and an extension of military service.

The speech itself, though very much what was to be expected, has what may be called a warlike difference. The hope that peace-loving monarchs and governments will succeed in maintaining peace, the disclaimer of all aggressive action, the somewhat unceremonious denunciation of accusations of desire for aggrandizement as pure lying, are all, of course, proper; and, if any one suspected Austria of wishing to disturb the peace wantonly, they might be satisfactory. But it is at least unusual for a Minister in such a speech to use such words as "the marked displacement and transference of the troops of Russia towards the West." Nor is it very common in such cases to find the inevitable politeness of accepting the explanations given from the Russian side qualified by an "as far as prudential regard for our safety "permits." To accept a declaration from a suspiciously advancing person as far as prudential regard for your safety permits is practically not to accept it at all. And, finally, a Minister who has much confidence in the preservation of peace does not, as a rule, speak of "the many "elements that are driving on to discord and war." It is, no doubt, to be taken into consideration that Hungary, though, as M. TISZA'S interpellators protested, not wishing to go to war with Russia merely to pay off the old grudges of forty years ago, is not exactly Russophile, and represents the most active section of the Austrian Empire as regards the determination to resist, at any cost, the interposition of a great, and inevitably hostile, European State between the Danube and the Ægean. Bulgarian Ministers, therefore, may always be expected rather to "force the note" as regards this determination. But there does not appear to have been any fire-eating spirit either in the interpellators or in their answerer, and there is certainly nothing of brag or of defiance in M. TISZA'S utterances. The question there posed is very simple. Is Russia, or is she not, going to cease massing troops on her Western frontier? And the only answer yet forthcoming is that Russia has since been going on massing troops on her Western frontier more busily than ever.

It would seem, however, that, as was probable from the first, the Russian armaments, even if their hostile intention be assumed, are not intended for direct action. The line of conduct which appears to have recommended itself to the CZAR and his advisers is to mass enormous forces on the German, Austrian, and Roumanian frontiers, and to put the fortresses on which the defence of those frontiers, or, as the case may be, the organization of offensive operations from them, rests, in a state of complete readiness for war. Meanwhile everything points to the renewal, probably on a larger scale and at several points at once, of the Bourgas raid. It is perfectly well known that the number of disbanded soldiers, brigands, and miscellaneous persons possessed with the old idea that the only respectable occupation for the male sex is war is very large in the Peninsula just now; while a famine in Montenegro has further swelled the number of desperadoes out of business. The money is never wanting in such cases, and the very unwise attitude of some of the Powers towards Prince FERDINAND gives some colour to the pretence that it is not only Russia which regards him as an intruder and usurper. By a course of persistent filibustering Russian agents (of whom, of course, their Government can at need disavow any knowledge) may hope to produce serious disturbances in Bulgaria, if not to secure some actual part of Bulgarian territory. In either of these cases the chances for Russia would be considerable. The continual annoyance might make the Bulgarians, out of mere weariness, accept Russia's views—at any rate, to the extent of getting rid of the obnoxious Coburger. Or the anarchy might reach such a point that a pretext for interference would arise, with or without the connivance of the other Powers. To secure such connivance, the threatening of the frontiers might, or might be thought to, go a long way, while even if it did not, the preparations would be useful for defence in case Germany and Austria took any steps to make their wishes respected and to interfere with the Russian interference. It would, therefore, seem to be to Bulgaria, not to Poland, that attention should be directed for the appearance of the first signs of real and serious trouble.

All this is so clear to a tolerably intelligent and well-informed observer that the toleration extended by Prince BISMARCK to Russian preparations, and his compliance with Russian prejudices in the matter of Prince FERDINAND, become every day more and more surprising. They would be not surprising, but unaccountable, except on the theory that the PRINCE sees no other way of preventing immediate disturbance, and, like Lord DERBY, but unlike his former self, thinks that, if war must come, it had better come to-morrow than to-day. The disadvantage, however, of allowing an almost certain enemy not only to choose his own method and time of attack, but to strengthen himself as much as he likes and as long as he likes, is so evident that nothing but the combined operation of strong personal influences and a genuine and hearty dread of war can explain the German attitude. Prince BISMARCK is doubtless superstitious—it is only fools who are not—and he may share the common dread of the "third wave." He is also himself, no doubt, doing his best to embank himself against that wave. But this process of preparation and counter-preparation bodes no good, and is not likely to lead to any. The latest result of it appears to be a slight diversion of the vague irritation which it naturally engenders in German minds to this country. Some Germans, and it is difficult to find fault with them, seem to wish that England would admire them less and imitate them more—in other words, that England would take a little more active part in promoting peace, instead of expressing merely wishes for it. But this only shows that Germany, though she is rapidly learning, has not yet learnt the full blessings of Parliamentary government. "Representative institutions," some cynic has observed, "are simply perfect engines of government so long as they are not representative." The dislike of England which has long animated the Continental mind is not likely to be mitigated by the reflection that Continental countries have borrowed from us the form of polity which prevents us, and may some day prevent them, from exercising the influence of a nation.

THE TWO WEAPONS OF THE PARNELLITES.

IT is a curious and, to all but the unteachable, it should be an instructive coincidence that the same impressions of the daily newspapers contained the account of the latest agrarian murder in Kerry and the report of the proceedings against Major ROBERTS. In these two incidents, taken together, we have the most effective presentment, in their positive and negative aspects, of the tactics of the party of Separation. Cynical indifference to the hideous crimes with which their own cause is associated concurs with unscrupulous readiness to believe, or feign belief, in any criminal accusation, however vague or unsubstantial, which may be brought against those by whom that cause is opposed. The former of the two incidents has nothing special to distinguish it from the multitude of other like deeds of blood by which Mr. GLADSTONE's present friends in Ireland have from time to time endeavoured to enforce the doctrines which he once denounced. It is only another homily on that converted preacher's now recanted text that murder is the sanction of boycotting, and that those who would otherwise defy the boycotter have too much reason to know that the Moonlighter stands behind him. JAMES FITZMAURICE, the unhappy old man who has been the last to fall a victim to the assassin, had committed one of the usual offences. He had been joint tenant with his brother of a farm from which they had been both evicted for non-payment of rent, and he had afterwards been guilty of accepting a sole tenancy of the whole. Upon this the Lixnaw branch of the National League passed a resolution condemning him as a land-grabber, and effect was given to their sentence upon him by a resort to what Mr. GLADSTONE regards as the legitimate practice of "exclusive dealing." FITZMAURICE had been excluded from dealings with his neighbours for some time past, but would, no doubt, have been able to defy his persecutors if there had been nothing else to be feared by him than boycotting. He knew, however, as well as Mr. GLADSTONE did, before the return of 86 Parnellites shook his faith in the law of causation, that, if he defied the boycotter, he would have the Moonlighter to reckon with; and for the last six months he had been, at his own request, under police protection at night-time, though not in the day. Unfortunately for himself, the old man, who seems to have been by no means wanting in courage, insisted on treating the early morning hours of the month of January as though they belonged to the latter, and not to the former, division of the twenty-four. He dismissed the two constables who wished to accompany him to the fair at Listowel, for which he set out last Tuesday at 4.30 A.M., and he was waylaid and shot in the legs by two physical force promoters of the practice to which Mr. GLADSTONE has extended his moral support. FITZMAURICE died of hæmorrhage an hour afterwards, and only stupidity or dishonesty can deny that his death is as directly traceable to the system of "exclusive dealing" according to the Gladstonian nomenclature, as the bullet wounds by which his legs were shattered are traceable to the muscular impulses of the ruffians who pulled the triggers of the revolvers. Our mild-mannered Radicals, who so abound in sympathy for the sufferings of imprisoned Parnellites, bestow, of course, their customary word of conventional compassion on this last victim of the tyranny which these interesting captives have been striving to uphold; but their empty professions of horror at poor FITZMAURICE's murder do not induce the slightest relaxation of their efforts to maintain a state of things in Ireland which, so long as any vestige of it survives, must continue to bear fruit in like atrocities. And that it is not yet put an end to is evidenced, not only by the murder itself, but by the further report, of sinister significance, that the daughter of the murdered man is believed to have recognized, and yet dare not name, his assassins.

The real indifference underlying the pretended concern of our English Parnellites at crimes of this sort represents, as we have said, the negative aspect of their profoundly immoral policy. Its positive side stands revealed to us in the disgraceful eagerness of some of them to seize upon and make political capital of the baseless charge which has been trumped up by an Irish ecclesiastic, with the assistance of an Irish municipal magistrate, against the Governor of the Cork Prison. We question whether any more shameful piece of unprincipled partisanship has ever met with exposure than that which was stripped bare by the briefest possible investigation in the Cork Police Court on Tuesday last. To say that the witnesses against Major ROBERTS, those veracious and reputable young women to whom the police have been so studiously denied access, broke down immediately on their story being sifted by cross-examination would be to understate the case. It is not even the whole truth to say that they broke down under examination in chief. Their story was one of such a nature that it is impossible to believe in its having really obtained credence even from those who professed to put faith in it. Canon O'MAHONY, whatever we may think of his moral sense, is presumably a man of ordinary intelligence; and no man answering to this description could have persuaded himself—we will not say of the actual, but even of the possible—truth of the foul fables which the witnesses MARY SCANLAN and NORAH LANE repeated last Tuesday in the police court. The slightest and most perfunctory examination of those fictions must have convinced him that they were destitute of any basis in fact; and his obstinate refusal to allow the police to inquire into them before taking proceedings can now only be accounted for by a strong suspicion on his part that the result of such a proceeding would have been to extinguish the scandal before it had time to serve its political purpose. His replies to cross-examination by Major ROBERTS's legal representative revealed a condition of mind which it is hard to reconcile with the most elementary notions of the duty, not of a minister of religion, but even of a commonly just and honourable man. When he said he made use of the expression—when, that is to say, he publicly charged this much-injured official with immoral conduct towards girls of tender years, "the only information he had was what "appeared in the depositions." And what is more, he had not even had this information direct from MARY SCANLAN herself. He had merely "heard from another that the "charge could be proved. He was aware, he went on to "say, that his words could have borne the impression that "he referred to girls under thirteen," while a particular girl whom the witness MARY SCANLAN pretended to have seen with the defendant was admitted by her to be about eighteen, and was only referred to by her as a "little "girl" because she was short of stature for her years. "The age don't count," said this amazing witness; "'tis the height of her." Now, can any one believe that Canon O'MAHONY was unaware, or that, if he made the slightest inquiry, he would long have been ignorant, that SCANLAN's charges, or rather her one charge, had no relation to a little girl, in the sense of a girl of tender years, at all? No one can possibly believe it; and yet we have this clerical traducer studiously keeping a witness like this out of the way of every one who could test her story, while his vile allies of the gutter press were encouraged to reiterate their calumnies until the police authorities were weak enough to act upon them, and subject an officer thus vaguely and weakly accused to the indignity of a prosecution. We cannot but think that Major ROBERTS has some cause to complain of the way in which he has been treated by those whose official duty it was to see that he had fair play. As to the treatment to which he has been subjected by Canon O'MAHONY, that was bad enough to have passed, we should imagine, out of the domain of moral into that of legal wrong; and if that is, in fact, the case, we sincerely trust that his slanderers may not yet have heard the last of the matter.

Here, however, we will take leave of these two incidents, only inviting the English public to study the illustration they afford of the twofold method of Parnellite attack—boycotting and murder for the Irish peasant; slander, supported by perjury, for those higher up in the social scale. Captain Moonlight shoots at and shatters the legs of obnoxious farmers; his moral accomplices in the Nationalist press and Nationalist Societies seek to maim the characters and destroy the careers of obnoxious officials. The public in this country are familiar enough with both these kinds of malpractices considered in severalty. What we wish them to do is to view them as organic parts of the same infamous system of political warfare. What we want them to understand is that men like Canon O'MAHONY and his English abettors are in virtual solidarity with men like the murderers of FITZMAURICE, and that the slanderous tongue is plied, just as much as the murderous revolver, for that end of Imperial dismemberment which Mr. GLADSTONE once recognized as the true goal of those apostles of the gospel of public plunder with whom he is now hand and glove.

THE ARMY.

IT would be rude, but not wholly inaccurate, to say that as the Session approaches the materials for darkening counsel as to the state of the army accumulate with their customary rapidity. Gentlemen—ex-official, official, and non-official—are criticizing, explaining, making authorized statements, and prophesying on all hands. Unquestionably they are all full of disinterested zeal, and more or less competent authorities into the bargain; but their multitude is great, and the differences between them in matters of opinion and matters of fact alike are not small. General Sir JOHN ADYE may stand for the ex-officials, and Mr. BRODRICK, M.P., gives the official view. The author of Greater Britain, again, has been giving the non-official version of our military things at great length, and even with pertinacity, for the last third of a year. Between the three the modest man who merely wishes to learn is like to attain only to the knowledge that nothing is known; or else how comes it that the pundits differ so hopelessly? If Sir JOHN ADYE is right in his opinion that the senior list of the army is being unduly reduced, and that we are threatened with a superfluity of elderly juniors, Mr. BRODRICK must be wrong in saying that we have too many generals, and the War Office has made a mistake in raising the age of retirement for captains and majors. Sir JOHN ADYE, again, has a theory as to the real explanation of the extravagance in army administration which we all deplore, and also as to the real responsibility for those errors in the manufacturing departments which we all remember. It is briefly that the infallible Government official is unduly hampered by the friends of contractors and business men in the House of Commons. The General is so far an authority that he was rather intimately connected with the manufacturing departments while those mistakes were being made; but for that very reason he is perhaps too much a party in the suit to be qualified to act as judge. His interest must needs influence his judgment somewhat—as when, for instance, he complains that Sir JAMES STEPHEN's Committee listened too much to officials talking about matters not appertaining to their own departments. Every man should have been heard on his own hostile witness, of course. We seem to remember that one of the things proved to the satisfaction of the Royal Commission was that the Government manufacturing departments did not know how to make a sword, although the art of producing these weapons was familiar in many lands from a period long anterior to the Christian era. On the whole, officers employed about those times would do well not to remind the public too vividly of the evidence taken by Sir JAMES STEPHEN's Commission.

The author of Greater Britain is not a witness of the stamp of Sir JOHN ADYE. His lengthening chain of articles is not written, whatever purpose it is meant to serve, to prove that all is right as right could be with the War Office, if only meddlesome outsiders would let it alone. He sings the very reverse of the song of PISH TUSH, and has a great deal to say as to the want of organization and of many other necessary things. With much of what he has to say the Saturday Review agrees, and, to use the useful figure of speech called a bull, agreed before it was said. We have no need to insist on our approval of his condemnation of the reduction in the Artillery. The War Office deserves all the castigation he gives it on that score. But the articles, good as they are in parts, hardly come up to the promise made by the author when he began them, or even to the promise of the preceding series. They were to have contained a scheme for the organization of the army on a satisfactory footing, at no great increase in its cost. This black tulip is still to come, but it lags sadly on the road. The introduction is terribly long, and there are features in it which arouse some doubt as to whether we ever shall have it. The author goes back so much on what he has already said, stops so often by the way to parley with critics, gives so much familiar, not to say stale, information as to the state of the German army, and so forth, that we begin to doubt whether, when he came to subject his notions to the wholesome discipline of black and white, he did not find that it was more difficult to evolve an ideal British army out of his inner consciousness than he had at first supposed. Besides, there are signs of confusion of mind in this introduction which do not promise well. It is far from clear whether the author thinks that the British army ought, or ought not, to be able to conduct an aggressive campaign single-handed on the Continent of Europe—whether the country ought to prepare to go back to the practice of HENRY V., or to content itself, as it has done ever since his time, by acting as a principal at sea and an ally on shore. Again, it is not clear what kind of war the writer has in his mind when he speaks of the probability that England may have to fight single-handed. Are we to face an enemy who can collect a great army opposite our shore, or an enemy who can only attack us in India, or a coalition which can do both? Are we, in the first or third case, to be prepared to act on the offensive on a great scale? If so, then the British army of the future must be raised to some equality in numbers with the Continental hosts. Again, the writer has a habit of eliminating the navy from the game. He would probably deny the charge, but practically this is what he does when he talks as if it could ever be possible in a war which might end in invasion to dispense with a great fleet in the Channel. We never have done so, and certainly never will. To the end of the great revolutionary war the blockading fleet of Brest was one of the largest and often much the largest we had at sea. In future, as in the old war, the Admiralty will need to retain the power to concentrate a formidable force in the Channel. We do not deny what the alarmist habitually forgets—namely, that the enemy cannot be in two places at once. If he is attacking the Cape he cannot be at Brest to cover an invasion. Where his great fleet is, ours can be, and if he sends flying squadrons to our colonies, flying squadrons can answer for him. The author's historical examples also hardly inspire confidence. He speaks of the rapidity with which NAPOLEON could embark and disembark his men at Boulogne, but forgets to add that under the conditions imposed by modern artillery, the flotilla of invasion could be destroyed by ships lying six miles out at sea. Yet he can remember the power of long-range guns when it is a question of destroying an English port. In another passage he says that NAPOLEON continued to believe in the possibility of an invasion of England until the return of NELSON and the battle of Trafalgar. As a matter of fact the EMPEROR broke up from Boulogne after VILLENEUVE's defeat by CALDER off Ferrol, and the battle of Trafalgar was fought when the French army was in the thick of the Austerlitz campaign. These are not very important errors, perhaps, but they are significant of the author's tendency to exaggerate the weakness of this country, the power of its enemies, and the narrowness of our escapes. They show want of criticism, and the habit of overcolouring, overcharging, and shrieking, which make the alarmist. It is, at least, partly because so much comment on our naval and military position is of this kind that so little good is done.

Mr. BRODRICK's is the official voice, the voice of the Financial Secretary of the War Office; and it, of course, gives a different sound from either of the other two. He differs from Sir JOHN ADYE in believing that much has been done of late to improve the Office; and we are not surprised to hear it. One of the distinguishing qualities of the War Office of this week is always that it is a great improvement on the Office of last month. In this respect the whirligig of time will bring about its revenges, and many now alive will, before attaining to a venerable age, learn from some future Financial Secretary that things are much better than they were in the bad days of Mr. BRODRICK. The changes quoted as improvements do certainly deserve the name. Effect has been given to the changes in organization announced last summer; and there is to be more professional control in army matters and more direct responsibility. The Order in Council defining the duties of Commander-in-Chief appears opportunely to support Mr. BRODRICK's speech. Of this Order it is equally true and discreditable to the common sense of Parliament to say that it will help to put the army administration at last on the footing it should have been on long ago. It will make it more possible to govern the army as a real fighting force. Nothing can be better as far as it goes, and it deserves all the polite things Lord WOLSELEY says of it; but the value of these arrangements of machinery depends on something of which Mr. BRODRICK's speech should have reminded his audience at Guildford. The Financial Secretary told them with pride and amid applauding cheers that in future the Surveyor-General of Ordnance will be a military gentleman qualified to survey ordnance generally. This seems rational; but then it was meant from the first that it should be the case. The Surveyor-General was a distinguished soldier until it was found necessary to capture the place for the benefit of rising young politicians who have unfortunately failed to rise. Will something of the same sort never happen again? We shall see; but of a certainty these new arrangements will do good just as long as the Minister and the House of Commons allow them fair play.

THE FUTURE OF LITERATURE.

THE popular novelist has many things to endure, including proposals like the following invitation. It was presented by the agent of an American Insurance Company to an English writer of whom America may truly say that "piracy is the sincerest form of flattery":—

> Dear Sir,—I am authorized to secure an author to write a novel, by a very wealthy and powerful Corporation. Said novel to bear the name of a large Hotel they have built on the Pacific coast, and the scene mainly to lay therein. To contain 300 pages. Will you undertake this, and at what price? They will spend a large sum to give the novel a world-wide circulation. Let me hear from you at once.
> Yours truly,

It is apparently the novel, not the hotel, that is to accommodate "300 pages."

This is not a "high-toned" invitation; the grammar and the style are far from being high-toned. But the social evolution does not run in the direction of altitude of tone. It divides into two currents, one of which makes for Socialism and a universe of level industry with "no takers" for the products, while the other makes for frantic speculation and commercial advertisement. Literature has thus rather a poor outlook. When the Commune comes, the Commune will not want poets and novelists any more than the Republic wanted chemists, or thought it wanted them. There will be no literature in the strange times coming, if that plan prevails. But if we go on in the present way, if advertisement is the soul of business and if business is the soul of everything, then, again, literature will have but a bad chance. Even now, as the author of Obiter Dicta pathetically remarks, people send to MUDIE's for a ninepenny book, rather than expend a sum proverbially agile. The libraries have only to say that a book is "out," when the student forgets all about it, and there is an end of that work. New blood is wanted in literature, and that new blood can only be advertisement. Once make books the vehicles of the commercial spirit, and they may do very well.

A proposal not unlike that of the American Hotel Company was once, we believe, made to Sir WALTER SCOTT, who created, indeed, the fortunes of many hotels, but entirely without intending that benevolence. The great soul of FITZBOODLE, dreaming on things to come, invented the Advertisement Novel. But perhaps nobody has grasped the great idea so completely nor stated it so succinctly as the Secretary of the American Company. It never dawns on him that a writer may think the proceeding a little undignified. "Will you undertake this, and at what price?" It does not appear that the author, over and above the "price" paid for his name as an advertisement, is to share in the profits of the fiction. He should, at least, receive a great many fully paid-up shares in the Hotel Company, but this, of course, would be a matter of arrangement. Much will depend on the name of the hotel. The Red Lion, by the author of King Solomon's Mines, would sound very much in keeping. The Four Pine Flat Hotel would suit Mr. BRET HARTE. The Tom Sawyer Arms might be entrusted to Mr. MARK TWAIN. Mr. WILKIE COLLINS, we think, has already done The Haunted Hotel, but there must, in the interests of the property, be no allusions to A Very Strange Bed. Mr. CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, in a recent work, more or less of fiction, conducted his characters through a round of American watering-places, and this may have been good for business. But this is not concentrated enough. There are authors whom we, if we were a Hotel Company, which is absurd, would not willingly trust with our novel. It is perfectly certain than one author could not get on without letting loose Mr. BARNUM's menagerie, a tribe of Apaches, and an earthquake on his ill-fated hotel. Would that attract tourists? Obviously not. Another author would certainly bring in a ghost, and give the hostelry a bad name. It would cease to be haunted by visitors. A third would assuredly set the customers digging for treasure all over the gardens. A fourth has promised to "do" the inn at Burford Bridge, and may be regarded as previously engaged. A fifth, if a French novelist, might make the company and their manners and morals fail to reach the proper pitch of respectability. Others might make the hotel so dreadfully and unimpeachably dull and analytic that nobody would go there except Mr. HOWELLS. In the hands of other masters dynamite would frighten away the public. In short, we may doubt if the art of fiction is to be saved by advertising Hotel Companies?

SHAMEFACED SOCIALISM.

IT is equally good-natured and futile to express sympathy with the deputation from Lord COMPTON's Committee which waited on Lord SALISBURY last Wednesday. No doubt there is a commendable air about the easy phrases which tell how everybody must approve of the motives of gentlemen who desire to benefit the destitute. They sound well, and serve to lead up to the inevitable "but," which must needs be their goal in the comments of people who do not think that the multiplication table can be made to prove for charity what it will not prove for business. Perhaps, since we are all agreed that we would wish our honest brother men to be happy and prosperous (the weaker sort would include even the dishonest), it may be better in future to take that for granted, and, when contradictory and impracticable propositions are made, to call them by their name at once without preliminary flourish of compliments. After all, contradictory and impracticable things do not change their nature because they are asked for in the name of charity. They will not fail to do good the less because the man who tries to apply them overflows with brotherly love. Regard for those whom it is proposed to benefit requires that they should be opposed; and it is, therefore, quite unnecessary, if not a little hypocritical, to soothe their advocates with fair words. For which reasons we shall not compliment the deputation to Lord Salisbury. It is really not a meritorious act, but decidedly the contrary, for men to come forward with applications for State help when they are not only in a negative state of non-agreement, but in a positive state of disagreement, as to what they want done. There is no more empty kind of philanthropist—and God knows they are an empty generation—than the gentleman who is sure there is an evil, but does not in the least know what to do with it; but is vehemently convinced that somebody else ought to do something. Substantially that was the condition of the deputation. It had a string of suggestions to make, to be sure; but Lord Herschell, who was spokesman, disapproved of them all, and the other members could not agree as to any one of them. They even contradicted one another flatly as to the extent and character of the prevailing distress. The net upshot of their afternoon's work was to give Lord Salisbury an opportunity of knocking the heads of the proposals against one another, by which the reader of the daily papers is, no doubt, instructed, but the unemployed are no whit benefited.

So far the deputation was merely useless; but, when everybody else had spoken, Cardinal Manning did his best to make it mischievous. Other members only differed as to the possibility of starting public works or State-aided emigration, but this Prince of the Church talked Socialism. The fact is that the Cardinal Archbishop came forward some time ago with a plan for making all the poor comfortable, which would be a nice thing to do, and had this further advantage, that the mere mention of it would show various persons with sweet voices what a sympathetic institution the Church of Rome is. The plan was not a very definite one. He summed it up himself very fairly last Wednesday by saying that "it appeared to him that under "the Poor Law there ought to be work at such a moment "as this for unemployed honest deserving men." The suggestion has a charitable look at a hasty glance, but, as the Archbishop was told at the time, has the defect of being what is called, in the Scotch language, fusionless. He was asked where the work was to come from, how it was to be made, and who was to pay for it. To all that Dr. Manning had nothing to answer, except, in substance, that he was himself a most pious, kind-hearted man, and other people ought to take the trouble and find the money. This did not appear practical, and it even drew forth a certain hollow sound of laughter, which would appear to have been ringing ever since in the Cardinal's ears. On Wednesday he held forth about the hard bad men who would not listen to his amiable little suggestion. Lord Salisbury has spared us all the trouble of criticizing Dr. Manning's nostrum any further by calling it by its name, "national work-"shops." Of course, the Cardinal protested, and has repeated his protest in a letter to the Times; for the words sound ill in the ears of a Prince of the Church, and besides it would never do to let one's kindly sympathies with the poor entrap one into flagrant approval of revolutionary methods, disliked by the paying part of one's community, and condemned by the Church. But Dr. Manning had forgotten before what swordsman he stood. "If," said Lord Salisbury, "the work offered is to have nothing in it "of a workhouse test; if it is to be work offered in time of "destitution by the State, which shall be in all respects on "all fours with and similar to the work offered by private "employers, it would really be nothing in effect but rate-sup-"ported workshops." Precisely so, and naturally the Cardinal does not like the name, though he is prepared to recommend the thing. With all due regard for Dr. Manning's dexterity, we hardly think he will contrive to serve two masters successfully, and not even for his alleged motive's sake will we express the smallest respect for his position. Saint Charles Borromeo we understand, and Cardinal Rinuccini also, and respect them both; but as for the Cardinal Archbishop of anywhere who tries to do a little advertising Socialism, and shirks the application of his own cheap proposals, for him we have no respect. He is really too like the angels who were neither for God nor the Devil.

TWO MUSICIANS.

STEPHEN HELLER, who died the other day in Paris, was rather a rare artist in music than a great musician. His melodic inspiration was exquisite in kind and inexhaustible in degree; he had, in uncommon fulness, the gift of form and the sense of style; his work is touched throughout with the quality of distinction; he may be said to have written better and sounder stuff for his instrument—which was the piano—than any one since Chopin. His music is not often heard in public; for he detested difficulty for difficulty's sake, and was far more concerned with the right development of expression than the encouragement of mere agility. But his influence has none the less been deep and wide. He was a teacher's teacher, and the twenty books of Études which he made and published are destined, one likes to believe, to a longer life than all but the finest achievements of the greater masters. They are studies in expression, but they are also models of delicate form and examples of sweet and unaffected sentiment; they are admirable exercises, but they are charming poetry as well. It is the same with the Nuits Blanches, the Im Walde, the Valses Capriccs, the Lieder ohne Worte, the Petit Album, a score of volumes more. They are brimful of wit, humour, richest fancy, the sincerest emotions; and withal they are works of art in the best sense of the term. The composer was not more keenly alive to the capacities of his instrument than he was conscious of the limitations of his talent. In an age when affectation and effect and self-consciousness were no bad substitutes for genius, he kept his head and respected his art. A musician first of all, he preferred what is good to what is merely novel, and was content with legitimate aims and processes and effects. As someone has said, "his "endeavour has been not to write true poems, or paint "true pictures, or sculpture true statues, but to make good "music, and by its aid, and within the limits imposed by its "strictest conventions, to express his views of life, and his "impressions of the world." In other words, he was a master craftsman who was also a true musician; and the best of his work unites the essentials of inspiration and accomplishment in such a way as to be at once exemplary and irresistible.

His life was worthy of his music. He was born at Pesth in 1813, and at nine years old the pianist, Franz Bräner, produced him as a musical prodigy—a public rival of Chopin and Franz Liszt. He studied for three years at Vienna under Halm; and, after a successful appearance there and a series of concerts in his native city, he made a tour through Hungary, Poland, and Germany. But he soon tired of the career of a wandering virtuoso, and, settling down at Augsburg, he remained there for six years, absorbed in study. At twenty-five he came to Paris, where he sojourned in the strictest retirement, and where, as we have said, he died not many days since. He was known to the public only by his works, of which—to say nothing of those to which no opus number is attached—a hundred and forty are quoted in Mr. Ashdown's list. He lived, from first to last, for his art and nothing else; and it is not surprising that he should have been a favourite with Berlioz, whose lovely romance, La Captive, he transcribed and arranged for voice and piano, and who speaks of him with a singular warmth of admiration. Some two or three years back it was found that he had lost his eyesight, and was in needy circumstances; and a subscription in his behalf was set on foot by a Committee which included Mr. Browning and Mr. Charles Hallé. The only news of him since then has been this of his death. It was inevitable; perhaps it was long deferred; but it will everywhere be matter for regret.

The tenor Fancelli was a virtuoso of another type. Strictly speaking, he was no musician at all. He had an admirable voice—a voice exceptional in quality and compass, individual in timbre, and finely equable in tone—and therewith a musical endowment of remarkable quickness and vigour. But he was born and bred a labourer; he was long past educating when he took to the stage; to the last he knew music only in the manner of a piping bullfinch. Yet in opera he was the reverse of ineffective. He never pretended to act; it took him all his time to watch the conductor's beat, to count his pauses, and look after his entrances, and in all the rest he relied on his voice and on a memory tenacious as a savage's; and he was more than once justified in the event. He looked, as the saying is, a stick; but he sang with uncommon brilliance and energy. Every note had, as it were, to be pumped into him; but the accuracy and propriety with which he repeated his task were amazing. Still more amazing was the fact that he won his greatest successes, not with the simple and flowing strains of BELLINI or the passionate melodies of VERDI, but with music so complex in structure, so "precious" in style, so full of intellectual and emotional subtleties as that of Lohengrin and Raoul de Nangis. It was something not far removed from the prodigious that he should have sung these parts at all; but the fact is, incredible as it may seem, that, speaking relatively, he sang them almost as well—if that be possible—as he played them ill. He had in him, indeed, the makings of a great tenor; and it was his own misfortune and the world's that he was obliged to figure before the public as, not an artist, but a kind of miracle.

THE DUBLIN DEMONSTRATION.

IT is certainly not worth while to discuss the question—regarded, it would seem, by the Nationalists as of vast importance—whether the demonstration in honour of Lord RIPON and Mr. MORLEY has been, from the spectacular point of view, a success. We are, for our own part, quite willing to settle any dispute on this point by unconditional surrender. We will admit, if the admission will give any pleasure to the Parnellites, that never before in the history of the Irish capital—or never, say, since the historic landing of GEORGE IV. at Kingstown—has so impressive a display of popular enthusiasm been evoked by the arrival of any English visitors. Let it be granted, if the Separatists wish it, that, considered from the stage-manager's point of view, the reception of Lord HARTINGTON and Mr. GOSCHEN will not bear a moment's comparison with it, and that, in the matter of demonstrating against each other—if the success of a demonstration is measured by the number of flags, torches, and street sightseers that can be paraded at a given moment along a given line of route—the latest performers have got the best of it. Not that we know or believe that this is the case, but merely that we regard the whole question as one of such extremely small importance that it is well to get rid of it by a simple process of wholesale concession. We are much more interested in considering not what the Dublin demonstration of last Thursday looked like, but how much it means; and here, fortunately, we derive the greatest assistance from one of the two distinguished recipients of the compliments. Mr. MORLEY practically gave up the point at which the Reception Committee have been labouring for some time past—the endeavour to prove that the promoters of this movement would make as good a show as their opponents if votes are to be weighed instead of counted. Mr. MORLEY, we say, has left these supporters of his somewhat cruelly in the lurch. He has as good as told them that he is all for the counting of heads, and protests against the doctrine that heads ought not to be counted, which means he supposes that "we "ought to weigh purses." That is a good, plain, intelligible Jacobinical confession of faith—fatal, as we have said, to the recent contention of his Dublin hosts, but none the worse, at least in our judgment, for that. The pity is that Mr. MORLEY was not content with it; but showed in the next sentence, in which he asked "where the wealth of Ireland "came from if not from the labours of the people of Ireland," that he wants to weigh purses too. We may, however, pass this, as also the hint that it is too delicate a question to inquire which side has the advantage in intelligence, as mere rhetorical side-hits. In the main he frankly accepted the position that heads, and heads alone—or perhaps skulls would be a better word, as begging no question as to their contents—must be counted by those who would judge correctly of the wants of Ireland in the matter of Home Rule; and that a majority of these skulls being found to be ranged—if that word is not too suggestive of the catacomb—on the side of Mr. GLADSTONE's policy, that policy ought to prevail.

Lord RIPON, as might be expected, did not lay quite so much stress on the skull-counting question; nor did he show quite the same disposition to make light of property and intelligence, as, indeed, he clearly could not on his own account afford to admit that neither of these qualifications ought to weigh in political matters. It is, however, of little consequence to consider what Lord RIPON said, because the real interest attaching to him consists, not in his words, but in the mere fact of his presence. His conjunction with Mr. MORLEY in this enterprise is so curious and comic—the contrast between the two men is so salient and piquant—that both would suffice to supply abundant food for reflection if Lord RIPON had never opened his lips. We do not refer to the difference between the religious opinions of the two politicians—opinions of which we regret to see that an ungenerous use has been made as against Mr. MORLEY in a quarter where we look for a higher standard of controversial fair play—we are thinking simply of the mental and temperamental differences between them. It was a masterstroke of comedy on the part of whoever devised it to yoke the twice-converted with the inconvertible, the too pliable peer with the inflexible philosopher. The figures of Lord RIPON and Mr. MORLEY irresistibly suggest two of BUNYAN'S characters whose names—to avoid ill-omened suggestions of the fate of these eminent persons—we will leave unwritten. But the Marquess must not detain us longer than is required for the enjoyment of the droll contrast between him and his companion. His speeches, too, were of a more than usually platitudinarian character even for him. Perhaps the only two points in the report of them which are at all worthy of special notice are, first, Lord RIPON'S reference—contained in just four lines and a quarter of that report, and therefore four lines and a quarter more than was bestowed on the subject by Mr. MORLEY—to the last agrarian murder in Kerry; and, secondly, his attempt to remove the fears of the Irish Protestants as to the possibility of a religious persecution under a Nationalist Government. It seems to have been imagined that Lord RIPON, as having held both, would speak as an expert as to the probable relations between the two creeds; but, having regard to the proverbial disposition of converts, perhaps his assurances of toleration were expected to come with a certain weight of the à fortiori from him. The suppressed argument may be meant to be, "If I, who "was once a Protestant myself, have no desire to per"secute Protestants, how much less likely are they to "undergo such treatment from those who have been "Catholics all their lives?" "Moreover," concluded Lord RIPON, "the Irish people knew that, if they lifted a finger "to do an act of injustice to their Protestant fellow"countrymen, the English people would not allow it. They "would come in, and, sooner than it should be done, would "undo their work."

And at that point we will leave Lord RIPON—not merely because it is not worth while to pursue his speech further, but because these two sentences, grossly and distinctively inconsistent as they are with the fundamental principle of Gladstonian Irish policy, bring him into line with his colleague. Mr. MORLEY is a much abler man than Lord RIPON, and his speeches were immeasurably better performances; but they are argumentatively ruined by precisely the same inconsistency which was fatal to Lord RIPON's last-quoted contention. At the back of Mr. MORLEY's as of Lord RIPON's advocacy of Home Rule there is a reserve, a qualification, a safeguard, which occasionally in the course of discussion they have to bring forward to the front; and no sooner do they do so than the whole fabric of their previous argument crumbles into ruins. "The English people would not "allow it." That has to be the last words on the lips of men who spend their lives in endeavouring to prove that the English people ought to and must allow something which they will not at present allow; and that they ought to and must allow it for no other or better reason than because a numerical majority of the Irish people—from which wealth and intelligence are virtually excluded—demand it. Lord RIPON says that, sooner than allow the Irish Protestants to be unjustly treated, the English people "would undo their own work." But who is to be the judge of the justice, or injustice, of their treatment? The same numerical majority of the Irish people whose decision on the question of Home Rule is accepted as final by Lord RIPON? And if not, why not? Again, Mr. MORLEY declares that, though he does not believe for an instant that the Irish people "cherish idle and visionary "schemes of separation," he cannot deny that dangerous and violent language has been used about the connexion between England and Ireland; but his belief is that, after the struggle is over, and Home Rule has been granted, "that violent and desperate language and that violent and "desperate policy will gradually and assuredly disappear." But suppose he is mistaken, and an attempt is made to put the violent and desperate policy into action. We will not ask him whether England in that case would or would not interfere to, as Lord RIPON puts it, "undo her work"; we will only ask him whether, on the showing of his previous argument, she would be justified in doing so? For what was his argument on the question of self-government? It was that Great Britain was not of one mind in refusing self-government to Ireland, and that Great Britain never again would be of one mind on the point. Substitute independence for self-government, and is there a single word of Mr. MORLEY'S argument which would be applicable to that case? Does Mr. MORLEY mean to say that any one who wished to do so would have the slightest difficulty in making out that England was "not of one mind" on this question of Separation—especially if Mr. GLADSTONE was in Opposition and wanted to return to power? And even if this point were not made out, in what way would the appeal to the persistent wishes of the Irish people be met on Mr. MORLEY'S principles? It would not be met on these principles at all, and those, therefore, who are advocating Home Rule on the sole ground of the Irish demand must be perfectly conscious of one of two things—either that the political principle to which they appeal is a false principle, or that the name of "Separatist," against which they protest, is a true appellation.

THE OLD POSTMASTER.

THE postmaster of the old school is one of the typical characters of Alpine life which are rapidly passing away. The few that still remain are to be found in wayside inns, whose extent is often in an inverse proportion to their custom. Their large dining-rooms are empty, their vast stables are desolate, and the proprietor wanders like a ghost through the scenes of his former triumphs, with the bitter knowledge that his house has not at present one-tenth of the value that it used to possess. It would be childish rather than churlish to complain of the present condition of the post, which has greatly improved and is improving; but those who can remember the pleasure of arriving at a mountain hostelry after a long drive in the keen air, the cosy parlour, the good supper, and the jovial host who was able and willing to give every possible information about the district, will own that something has been lost in consequence of the gains that railways have brought. The new ordinary is but a poor substitute for the few but savoury dishes which the old inns could supply, and the international conversation that is carried on at them wants the raciness of the old talk at the round table, where every one knew something of the subjects on which he spoke. How pleasant those old talks were, when the most ancient legend was gladly given in exchange for the latest news, and the story which had begun to pall on village ears was quite unknown to the traveller! How sorry one was, in spite of one's weariness, when the priest gave the signal for departure, or we were told that the carriage was waiting! Does any one feel thus in the monster hotels of to-day?

Of course there was a shadow side to all this. One's letters had a bad habit of going astray, which, when they contained money, was an annoyance. A bath was an all but impossible luxury, and on Fridays meat was unknown or could be obtained and eaten cold only in the kitchen or otherwise unexplored holes and corners. Yet even in the latter prohibition there was a kind of charm. One felt something like a schoolboy's pleasure, when one had received one's veal and ham, on being told to hide oneself while one ate it, and in the houses where the fasts were not strictly observed one felt that one of the attractions of Alpine travel was wanting, and knew one was pretty sure to be overcharged. The bath was a more serious matter; but are there not brooks with still and secluded basins, in which, though popular opinion declares it certain death to enter them, a passing Englishman, who did not look upon cold water as poison, might take a safe and invigorating plunge?

The postmaster of old times, like the forester of to-day, possessed a double training. He had passed through the higher classes at school, and then been sent to practise at a distance, and before he was allowed to enter upon his office he was subjected to an examination. Still he was to all intents and purposes a host and a farmer. He must be so, indeed, to make his business pay, as he was required to keep from ten to twenty horses in his stables, and permitted, if they were not sufficient for the traffic, to seize as many of those of his neighbours as might be required, their services being, of course, adequately recompensed. The post, therefore, naturally became the chief inn of the place, and the best houses of entertainment to be found in the villages of the Austrian Alps are still called by that name. Of old, the office, too, was almost hereditary; it went with the house, if only the heir could pass the usual examinations, for where else could the necessary accommodation for man and beast be found? Thus for generations the postmasters of a village belonged to the same family.

To understand their character one must remember the position occupied by their houses. They were the centre of the social life of the place. Everybody who desired to hear or tell some new thing went to the post. The peasants frequented the room designed for the coachmen and other servants, who told the latest news from Vienna, Trieste, Innspruck, or Verona, and the last piece of scandal from the neighbouring town. There was always something new to be seen or something new to be heard, and so it was better to play one's evening game of cards there than elsewhere. Similar motives attracted the higher classes to the parlour, where also most of the village business was done. A separate table was always spread for the stranger; but, if he was at all inclined to be sociable, his company was eagerly welcomed. In fact, life in these houses was very similar to that which the novelists of the last century loved to describe, though it may be doubted whether any of them were quite equal to the best inns on the old Dover road.

At times, however, there came a stress of business. This happened chiefly in winter, when the passes were blocked by snow which could not immediately be removed, and travellers of all sorts and conditions had to make the best of what accommodation was to be had. Then the inns which were known to have the best kitchens and cellars were thronged, and all the ingenuity of the host and hostess was required to provide for the sudden crowd of guests. It was discovered that beds could be erected in the most unlikely places, and dishes were improvised in which an infinitesimal quantity of fresh meat was compelled to season a wilderness of stored vegetables. On such occasions, it must be confessed, cured pork in one of its various forms was usually the staple dish, and of that there was always enough to satisfy the most ravenous of pig-eaters. In summer an English milord or a German prince, with a retinue of servants, would occasionally pause to lunch or dine, and then the resources of the establishment were taxed to the utmost. Every one, from the master to the stable-boy, felt that the credit of the whole valley was at stake, and among the servants, at least, a patriotic pride was stimulated by the hope of large gratuities.

Thus the postmaster was brought into a direct social connexion with men of all classes, and if he wished his business to succeed he must satisfy them all. Yet he had none of the servility of a country innkeeper; he knew he was the largest proprietor and most important person in the place, and he never forgot that he held a government appointment. This blending of two characters was characteristic of the whole class, and rendered it always amusing. If the postmaster was possessed of tact and humour, he was an excellent companion, a brief chronicle of the history of the valley during the three last generations at least, whom you could always consult without his ever becoming obtrusive or familiar; if he was wanting in these two qualities, he became a comic figure, as he could never quite make up his mind as to whether he was your servant, your equal, or your superior. Men of the latter class were, however, rare. The habits of a long lifetime were in themselves a discipline, and the hard office, stable, and farm work knocked the nonsense out of most young men who had any brains to begin with; if they had none, they soon found it necessary to sell the old house and resign the office.

In the old days, however, it was not often that a postmaster was young. People have a habit of living long in the Alps, and it lay in the nature of the case that a father was usually glad to leave the management of his estates to his children, and even to divide his property among them, years before he felt inclined to resign his office or to give up his position as host. The son, therefore, often managed the whole business of the post and inn for a considerable time before he had any real authority or responsibility. These were the merriest years of his life. Though at intervals a great stress of business would come, he had, as a rule, plenty of leisure. His double position and his known wealth or expectations secured him a hearty welcome in all society except the highest, where he himself would have been but ill at ease. It was his own fault if he was not the best judge of horses and the best rider and driver in the neighbourhood, and it was a fault of which he was rarely guilty. Even when he had attained all the honours of his office, he was proud of displaying his skill in the latter art, and would seat himself on the box when a stranger of unusual distinction or an intimate friend changed horses at his house, or when there was a pressing occasion and his servants declared the roads to be impassable. The narratives of such adventurous excursions were his favourite subjects in later years, and one could always gain his heart by listening to them with attention.

As has been said, the old postmaster is now shorn of his glories; he is one of the blades of grass that have been broken down by "the constant march onwards of mankind." Whither that march is tending no one quite seems to know. Perhaps it is a pitying Providence blinds our eyes. At any rate, the postmaster, such as has been described, is a creature of the past. Some who bear the old title in their native hamlets have sold the houses and grounds, and are doing either well or ill in distant towns. Some are making a strenuous, but for the most part a futile, endeavour to render their residences places of fashionable summer resort. A few still cling to the old ways as well as the old houses. They are inclined to take rather a gloomy view of life, and to fancy that the golden age of Austria, if not of Europe, passed away with the old coaching days. We who think ourselves better informed may smile upon them not unkindly.

The new postmaster is a man of quite a different stamp. He is usually a neat and rather dapper man, who clothes himself in strict accordance with the latest fashion that has penetrated the nearest town. He has a remarkable acquaintance with geography, and a marvellous knowledge of postal rates. He will probably be able to tell you at once where the towns of Bismarck and Gladstone lie, and exactly what a letter to either of them should cost. But if he distinguishes a horse from an ox, it is chiefly because the latter has a habit of wearing horns, and it would be wiser to consult him on an abstruse question of science or philosophy than to trust to his local knowledge on any matter. He lives in hired lodgings, and is surrounded in his office by a bevy of young ladies who feel the solemnity of their duties so deeply that they would hardly venture to smile on an accepted lover through the glass or wire cages that enclose them in business hours—that is in provincial centres. In the smaller villages the innkeeper is generally still the postmaster; but now he is a meek and subservient man, who brings out his books and consults you as to what is the proper charge for the letters, books, or packages you wish to send to any outland place. He is so gentle that it would be heartless to find fault with him; and the postal service, we repeat, has improved and is improving; but the old bluff postmaster who had always either a smile or a curse upon his lips, except when he was eating, sleeping, or laughing, was a more picturesque figure.

MORE PROOFS.

WE had thought that the convincing evidence we brought forward last week as to the identity of Bakespeare would satisfy the public. But apparently the public wants more. Some Bakespearians are even quite indignant with us for giving credit of part of our brilliant idea to Colonel Moore; and though, with true Bakespearian modesty, they (following their great original) will not allow their names to be published, they accuse us of having been too generous. Nay, but it is not so. Scribe always allowed copyright in ideas, and used to send cheques, which much astonished the recipients, and sometimes were the cause of unreasonable further demands on their part, to authors who had given him a hint. Why should we not acknowledge the suggestion of Colonel H. L. Moore, Lawrence, Kansas? "As Paulina," quoth Colonel H. L. Moore, Lawrence, Kansas, "pulled aside the curtain, and the living, breathing Hermione stepped down to greet her friends, so Francis Bacon steps out from the shadow of almost three hundred years." And shall we fail to acknowledge the Colonel's copyright? No, by the living, breathing Jingo!

However these flattering notices (pity that our friend is so modest as to insist on not being quoted by name!) put us on completing the interesting task which we began last week. We left off with that "untimely beer," or bier, which was for so many thoughts at the end of Richard II. Now it need not be said that the plays immediately following are the very kernel (no offence to H. L. Moore) of Shakspeare. Whoso wrote Henry IV. wrote Shakspeare, the comic Shakspeare, as certainly as whoso wrote Hamlet and Othello wrote the tragic Shakspeare. And what do we find at the end of Henry IV. Part I.?

> And since this business so fair is done
> Let us not leave till all our own be won.

That is to say, of course, "since my plays have been so successful, let me not be satisfied until Mr. Watts and Mrs. Pott and the other fashionables have shown that I wrote them." Can anything be clearer than that? Yes, the Second Part. We do not dwell much on the last words of the verse, "Come, will you hence?" though they are evidently addressed to the ruffianly Stratforder, and signify "Get out of this." But there is here an epilogue, and we have noted that the epilogue always clenches the matter. Any fellow who can doubt after reading this epilogue is a kind of Thomas, and worse. "What I have to say is of mine own making"—a distinct avowal of authorship, even if "making" did not rhyme to "Baking," the popular pronunciation (cf. W. M. Thackeray, "My lady is gone to Brighting") of Bacon. This is important, but it is nothing to what follows:—"For Oldcastle died a martyr, and this is not the man." Ever since we first read these words, which was a little before the gifted Delia saw Bedlam and Bacon clear before her at the same time, we have had no doubts. Henry V. is more ambiguous; but the eleventh and twelfth lines of the curious sonnet-chorus probably hold the secret (concealed thus, no doubt, lest even the stupid dolt of a Stratforder should find it out):—

> Whose state so many had the managing,
> That they lost France and made his England bleed

Note that "managing," which is clearly a reflection on the vile business of the loose-lived maltster-usurer. The three parts of Henry VI. are avowedly puzzles, representing work in respect of which, though it is clear why the player Shaxper might have sometimes cared to adapt it, it cannot be easily explained why Shacon, a man of leisure and of unlimited genius, should have done any such thing. Accordingly, in the First and Second Parts (and these are just what are known to be least Shakspearian—that is, Baconian) there is little traceable evidence, though we have a theory. At the end of the Third, however, things clear up:—

> And now what rests, but that we spend the time
> With stately triumphs, mirthful comic shows, [Bacon was great at triumphs.]
> Such as befit the pleasures of the court.
> Sound drums and trumpets, farewell sour annoy!
> For here, I hope, begins our lasting joy.

That is to say, putting the remarkable coincidence of the marginal note aside, "here ends our adaptation; now we're going to be original, and get rid of Shaxper." The finale of Richard III. deals rather in innuendo than in actual assertion—such as references to "traitors," and so forth. But there are (we hope here be truths!) five letters in Bacon. Now, if you take the first letter of the last word of the fifth line from the end, the last letter but two of the last word of the fourth, the last but one of the last word of the third, the second letter of the first word (mark his cunning) of the second, and the last letter of all ("blood," "increase," "peace," "now," and "Amen") they make B-A-C-O-N!!!!!

It was necessary to begin a fresh paragraph after that; but we are not going to tail down yet. Henry VIII. has a mixed tradition as to authorship; but its last line—

clearly means that the proving of the Baconian authorship will be "a little holiday" for the Bacon Society. It is awkward dealing with Troilus and Cressida in some respects, but here is one of those genuine utterances of Shaxper which, as has been so often pointed out, strengthen the chain of evidence:—"A goodly med'cine for my aching bones" i.e. to be found out. "O world! how is the poor agent despised!"—[we wish Messrs. Spottiswoode had type big enough for this]—"Why should our endeavour be so loved" [for remember F. B. must have taken some trouble to get W. S. to do what he wished] "and our performance so hated?" Surely no more can be needed? But if any more is needed, Timon gives it. "Let our drums strike," that is to say—for "drum" is commonly used for "drummer," for an inferior officer—let this Shaxper, our noisy instrument, strike or surrender, and let us, F. B., come forward. Coriolanus is also conciliatory:—

> Yet he shall have a noble memory;
> Assist—

that is to say, "join the Bacon Society." It would also seem from the last words of Julius Cæsar—

> To part the glories of this happy day—that Bacon, as we should have supposed, was, at any rate at times, a fairer-minded man than some of his partisans, and was quite willing to give poor Shaxper some of the credit. And much the same conclusion may be drawn from the end of Antony and Cleopatra, the instruction to Dolabella:—

> Come, Dolabella, see
> High order in this great solemnity.

Just before, too, is a striking expression in the same sense:—

> No grave upon the earth shall clip in it
> A pair so famous.

And, by a very curious coincidence, there is something of the same tone in Cymbeline:—

> Never did a war so cease
> Ere bloody hands were washed with such a peace.

But in all these there is distinct reference to the controversy. Titus Andronicus ends with a caution to Lord Halsbury and all other Chancellors not to go and do likewise:—

> Then afterwise to order well the State,
> That like events may ne'er it ruinate—in other words, "Don't you go and write plays for Mr. Irving in his name." The suspicions which rest on Pericles might dispense us from looking there for evidence, yet even there it is to be found:—

> So on your patience evermore attending
> New joy wait on you. Here our play has ending.

That is, F. B. knew that "the next age" (or the next after the next, for it doesn't matter) would have the "new joy" of finding him out if it had any "patience." We are not quite certain (for the true Bakespearian never attaches too great certainty to any indication, lest it should be proved wrong) of the interpretation of the last words of Albany in Lear:—

> We that are young
> Shall never see so much or live so long.

But we think they mean that nobody living would ever dream that Bacon wrote Shakspeare. And nobody did.

Romeo and Juliet is also by comparison doubtful, though the antepenultimate line—

> Some shall be pardoned and some punished—looks like a clue. But with Hamlet and Othello, the twin summits of Shakspearian genius, there is no doubt:—

> Go bid the soldiers shoot of course means "let them hail the advent of Delia and Donnelly." And we fear, we greatly fear, that, in the last speech of Lodovico, "this hellish villain" refers to Shaxper, while "O enforce it" is an appeal to the Bacon Society to drive Bacon's claim home.

However that may be (and it is necessary to repeat that, on all right Bakespearian principles, if any demonstration does not suit it kin be changed), every true worker will acknowledge the toil with which we have gone through the last lines of all the plays attributed to Shaxper. Few Bakespearians, we suspect, have done so much.

EDWARD LEAR.

EDWARD LEAR, the artist, author of Journals of a Landscape Painter in various out-of-the-way countries, and of the delightful Books of Nonsense, which have amused successive generations of children, died on Sunday, January 29, at San Remo, where he had lived for twenty years. Few names could evoke a wider expression of passing regret at their appearance in the obituary column, for until his health began to fail him he was known to an immense and almost a cosmopolitan circle of acquaintance, and popular wherever he was known. Fewer still could call up in the minds of intimate friends a deeper and more enduring feeling of sorrow for personal loss, mingled with the pleasantest of memories; for it was impossible to know him thoroughly and not to love him. London, Rome, the Mediterranean countries generally, Ceylon and India, are still all dotted with survivors among his generation who will mourn for him affectionately, although his latter years have been spent in comparatively close retirement. He was a man of striking nobility of nature, fearless, independent, energetic, given to forming for himself strong opinions, often hastily, sometimes bitterly; not always strong or sound in judgment, but always seeking after truth in every matter, and following it as he understood it in scorn of consequence; utterly unselfish, devoted to his friends, generous even to extravagance towards any one who had ever been connected with his fortunes or his travels; playful, lighthearted, witty, and humorous, but not without those occasional fits of black depression and nervous irritability to which such temperaments are liable.

Great and varied as the merits of his pictures are, Lear hardly succeeded in achieving any great popularity as a landscape painter. His work was frequently done on private commission, and he rarely sent in pictures for the Academy or other exhibitions. His larger and more highly finished landscapes were unequal in technical perfection; sometimes harsh or cold in colour, or stiff in composition; sometimes full of imagination, at others literal and prosaic; but always impressive reproductions of interesting or peculiar scenery. In later years he used in conversation to qualify himself as a "topographical artist"; and the definition was true, though not exhaustive. He had an intuitive and a perfectly trained eye for the character and beauty of distant mountain lines, the solemnity of rocky gorges, the majesty of a single mountain rising from a base of plain or sea; and he was equally exact in rendering the true forms of the middle distances and the specialities of foreground detail belonging to the various lands through which he had wandered as a sketcher. Some of his pictures show a mastery which has rarely been equalled over the difficulties of painting an immense plain as seen from a height, reaching straight away from the eye of the spectator until it is lost in a dim horizon. Sir Roderick Murchison used to say that he always understood the geological peculiarities of a country he had only studied in Lear's sketches. The compliment was thoroughly justified; and it is not every landscape painter to whom it could honestly be paid.

The history of Lear's choice of a career was a curious one. He was the youngest of twenty-one children, and, through a family mischance, was thrown entirely on the limited resources of an elderly sister at a very early age. As a boy he had always dabbled in colours for his own amusement, and had been given to poring over the ordinary boys' books upon natural history. It occurred to him to try and turn his infant talents to account; and he painted upon cardboard a couple of birds in the style which the older among us remember as having been called Oriental tinting, took them to a small shop, and sold them for fourpence. The kindness of friends, to whom he was ever grateful, gave him the opportunity of more serious and more remunerative study, and he became a patient and accurate zoological draughtsman. Many of the birds in the earlier volumes of Gould's magnificent folios were drawn for him by Lear. A few years back there were eagles alive in the Zoological Gardens in Regent's Park to which Lear could point as old familiar friends that he had drawn laboriously from claw to beak fifty years before. He united with this kind of work the more unpleasant occupation of drawing the curiosities of disease or deformity in hospitals. One day, as he was busily intent on the portrait of a bird in the Zoological Gardens, an old gentleman came and looked over his shoulder, entered into conversation, and finally said to him, "You must come and draw my birds at Knowsley." Lear did not know where Knowsley was, or what it meant; but the old gentleman was the thirteenth Earl of Derby. The successive Earls of Derby have been among Lear's kindest and most generous patrons. He went to Knowsley, and the drawings in the Knowsley Menagerie (now a rare and highly-prized work among book collectors) are by Lear's hand. At Knowsley he became a permanent favourite; and it was there that he composed in prolific succession his charming and wonderful series of utterly nonsensical rhymes and drawings. Lear had already begun seriously to study landscape. When English winters began to threaten his health, Lord Derby started a subscription which enabled him to go to Rome as a student and artist, and no doubt gave him recommendations among Anglo-Roman society which laid the foundations of a numerous clientèle. It was in the Roman summers that Lear first began to exercise the taste for pictorial wandering which grew into a habit and a passion, to fill vivid and copious notebooks as he went, and to illustrate them by spirited and accurate drawings; and his first volume of Illustrated Excursions in Italy, published in 1846, is gratefully dedicated to his Knowsley patron.

Only those who have travelled with him could know what a delightful comrade he was to men whose tastes ran more or less parallel to his own. It was not everybody who could travel with him; for he was so irrepressibly anxious not to lose a moment of the time at his disposal for gathering into his garners the beauty and interest of the lands over which he journeyed that he was careless of comfort and health. Calabria, Sicily, the Desert of Sinai, Egypt and Nubia, Greece and Albania, Palestine, Syria, Athos, Candia, Montenegro, Zagóri (who knows now where Zagóri is, or was?), were as thoroughly explored and sketched by him as the more civilized localities of Malta, Corsica, and Corfu. He read insatiably before starting all the recognized guidebooks and histories of the country he intended to draw; and his published itineraries are marked by great strength and literary interest quite irrespectively of the illustrations. And he had his reward. It is not any ordinary journalist and sketcher who could have compelled from Tennyson such a tribute as lines "To E. L. on his Travels in Greece":—

> Illyrian woodlands, echoing falls
> Of water, sheets of summer glass,
> The long divine Peneïan pass,
> The vast Akrokeraunian walls,
>
> Tomohrit, Athos, all things fair,
> With such a pencil, such a pen,
> You shadow forth to distant men,
> I read and felt that I was there.

Lear was a man to whom, as to Tennyson's Ulysses,

> All experience is an arch wherethrough
> Gleams that untravelled world.

After settling at San Remo, and when he was nearly sixty years old, he determined to visit India and Ceylon. He started once and failed, being taken so ill at Suez that he was obliged to return. The next year he succeeded, and brought away some thousands of drawings of the most striking views from all three Presidencies and from the tropical island. His appetite for travel continued to grow with what it fed upon; and, although he hated a long sea-voyage, he used seriously to contemplate as possible a visit to relations in New Zealand. It may safely, however, be averred that no considerations would have tempted him to visit the Arctic regions.

A hard-working life, chequered by the odd adventures which happen to the odd and the adventurous and pass over the commonplace; a career, brightened by the high appreciation of unimpeachable critics; lightened, till of late, by the pleasant society and good wishes of innumerable friends; saddened by the growing pressure of ill health and solitude; cheered by his constant trust in the love and sympathy of those who knew him best, however far away; such was the life of Edward Lear.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS IN INDIA.

THE announcement that the Government of India has found it necessary to impose additional taxation to the extent of 1¾ million sterling, is one for which those who have watched the course of Indian finance for several years past can scarcely have been unprepared. That course has been one of decline, so rapid, so continuous, and so serious, as to justify the very gravest anxiety. The story may be told in a few words. Up to the year 1882, whatever may have been the other embarrassments of the Indian Government, its financial position was unassailable. Confronted at once by a famine of unprecedented severity and a costly war, Lord Lytton and his Financial Minister had courageously met the emergency by the necessary taxation, and had provided a surplus, which was designed to supply the necessary means of defraying periodical famine expenditure and the other incidental outlay of a great empire. Substantial surpluses were the result. Apart from the special war expenditure, the revenues of 1879 and 1880 exceeded the expenditure by 3½ and 7 millions respectively, and the year 1881, notwithstanding the expenditure of 1½ million on military expeditions, and a loss of 3½ millions by exchange, showed a surplus of 2½ millions. Taking the fourteen years which ended with 1884, there resulted a net surplus of 4 millions. As during this period 20 millions had been spent in war, 14 millions in famine relief, 30 millions had been lost by the fall in exchange, and 6 millions had been devoted to "famine insurance," the result was one which seemed to justify a feeling of security. Even at this point, however, careful observers were sounding a note of danger, declaring that the position was not as strong as it looked, and that the fair day of Indian finance might easily be overcast. The financial equilibrium, it was pointed out, depended on various contingencies, all of which were beyond human control. Silver, opium, the due advent of the monsoon, the maintenance of peace, were matters which defied alike calculation and control.

The course of any one of them might, at any moment, strike a crushing blow at the Indian finances. Nor was the Exchequer as strong as it had been, for in 1882 Lord Ripon had presented the Indian taxpayer with a present of 3 millions by a remission of the Salt Duties, the Customs, and Local Cesses to that amount. Meanwhile the future of silver was precarious, opium was exposed to various alarming risks alike from competitors and philanthropists, and the condition of the military frontier on the North-West and of our military force in the country was declared by all competent authorities to be dangerously inadequate to meet contingencies which it was certain could not be for long ignored, and might, at any moment, call for immediate action. Before the year 1885 closed the soundness of these gloomy vaticinations became disagreeably apparent. The net receipts from opium dropped by a couple of millions, the fall of silver received a disastrous impulse, the movements of Russia in the neighbourhood of Herat necessitated an expenditure of more than two millions in preparing for a counter-demonstration in that direction, while at the opposite side of the Empire the affairs of Burmah called for the costly measures which have ever since formed so serious an item on the expenditure side of the Indian balance-sheet. The estimates for the year 1885 showed a surplus of half a million, the actual result showed a deficit of nearly three millions. A still more serious consideration presented itself in the fact that, by the general consent of all competent authorities, it was decided that the proper military precautions against Russian movements on the North-West Frontier must involve a permanent addition of two millions annually to the military expenditure. Stringent measures of economy were at once adopted. With such a balance-sheet it had become in vain to deal specially with an apparent surplus, and the 1½ million hitherto provided in excess of expenditure and known as the Famine Insurance Fund was absorbed. The Provincial Governments were constrained to divert half a million of their revenues from local improvements to meet Imperial necessities. An Income-tax was once again imposed. By these expedients a bare equilibrium was established; revenue and expenditure standing at about 76 millions sterling. Subsequently the causes of trouble have lost none of their force. Silver has fallen more disastrously than ever. The expenditure in Burmah has exceeded all anticipations. The new Convention with China has involved a permanent reduction in the proceeds of opium. The railway income has fallen short of the expectations of the estimates by nearly half a million. The year 1887 would, it was hoped, show an equilibrium at 77½ millions; but as early as last September this hope had already proved vain. The expenditure side of the account has sprung up to nearly 79 millions, and it has become necessary, if a deficit is to be avoided, to provide additional income to the extent of 1⅞ million. This is to be effected by an enhancement of the Salt-tax, and by a newly imposed duty on petroleum, an article, the large and increasing consumption of which has frequently of late years attracted attention and suggested it as a natural and appropriate contributor to the national revenue. By these measures, it is hoped, the financial equilibrium will be re-established. But how materially has the position of the Indian Exchequer altered for the worse! Instead of having, as it had to the close of 1883, a substantial surplus, ranging between 3 and 4 millions, of which about half was devoted to strengthening its position against future famine, the Government has been obliged to abandon its policy of famine insurance altogether, to divert half a million from the provincial exchequers to its own, to impose an Income-tax, which, small as are its proceeds—1⅜ million—presses painfully on its contributors, and now to raise a further sum of 1⅞ million by still further calls on the general taxpayer.

As to the expediency of the sources from which relief has been sought, no doubt is entertained in India, nor indeed can any rational person entertain a doubt. It is manifestly impossible to reimpose Customs duties which would involve a hot contest with the manufacturing interest in England, and rescind the policy which has been pursued by the Government with signal success for many years past. The growth of Indian trade has been, during a period of almost universal distress, signal and continuous. While the commerce of other nations has been at a standstill or has retrograded, the foreign trade of India has advanced from 102 millions sterling in 1874 to 162 millions in 1886. Any interference with it would be to strike a fatal blow at the prosperity of the country. Equally impossible would it be to enhance the Income-tax, which, as it is, falls with cruel severity on several classes, especially English officials, who have already been mulcted of a third of their income by the fall in exchange, and spares the very classes who have profited by it, the owners of produce for export. In the same way it would be in the highest degree inexpedient to reopen at such a moment the question whether the landed proprietors of Bengal might not be called upon to contribute more largely to the measures by which they have benefited so enormously and to the Government under which they have enjoyed such unexampled prosperity. There is, then, no other import but the Salt Duty by which the resources of the entire community can be reached. Nor need any hardship be occasioned. The tax is often selected by ignorant critics as a topic for denunciation. But its history shows that no denunciations can be more groundless. It was originally imposed in 1837 and the following years as a substitute for a system of transit duties and other local imposts, which were infinitely more oppressive to the people. The modifications carried out in 1882 with a view to its equalization involved a surrender of nearly 1½ million of revenue. The increase of consumption since the reduction of the rate has not realized all that was hoped, but it has been substantial. The annual consumption is now greater by about 24 millions of pounds than it was in 1882. The new taxation will not add appreciably to the cost of salt to the consumer. Even if it did, it was expressly announced when the reduction was made that the tax must be reserved as a resource to be drawn upon in time of trouble; and that time has certainly arrived. It has now become abundantly manifest that the remissions carried out with so much self-glorification by Lord Ripon were not justified by the real circumstances of the case. There were grave dangers ahead, which he deliberately left his successors to face as best they could. There were measures of military defence which called for immediate execution in the interests of the safety of the Empire which, with a scandalous recklessness, he chose to postpone. How serious was the risk the Government realized in 1885, when, at a moment's notice, it was obliged to spend a couple of millions in preparations, which luckily proved unnecessary, for a campaign in the Candahar plateau. Lord Dufferin at once realized the gravity of the position, and met it honourably and courageously. That in order to do so he has been obliged to call upon the Indian taxpayer for an unwelcome sacrifice means only that he is devoting to necessary measures of precaution the resources which his predecessor in office, in the shameless pursuit of popularity for himself and his party, had the hardihood to abandon.

YOUTH AND AGE IN POLITICS.

MR. GLADSTONE, who little more than a month ago completed his seventy-eighth year, will in a few days enter upon his fifty-sixth Parliamentary Session. It cannot be said of him that he has observed the Horatian precept and been consistent with his own beginnings. Rather, there has been a striking change, not merely of opinion, but in some respects of character. In common with most of the group of his University and Parliamentary contemporaries, who were afterwards known as Peelites, Mr. Gladstone during his earlier years in the House of Commons was remarkable for a certain decorous and puritanic solemnity. The gravity and stillness of his youth were as notable as those of Montano. The Peelites were essentially well-behaved young men, decent to the verge of smugness, modelling themselves in this respect upon their great Parliamentary chief. Mr. Gladstone, in fact, as a young man was the precise contradictory of what he has become as an old man. It would almost seem as if a miracle of the Vice Versâ order had been performed on him; and that while an aged spirit worked in his youthful frame, a boyish mind and temper has been imprisoned in the body of his old age. Cautious and circumspect during his earlier political life, he has become impulsive and reckless in his closing years. The nearest parallel of which we can think to his Irish adventure is to be found in the exploit of the Duke of Saldanha, who a few years ago, at the supposed age of ninety, put himself at the head of others of the ardent youth of Portugal, and stormed the Royal Palace at Lisbon. Age, as a great many commonplace illustrations and etymologies testify, has been usually considered as the period of true senatorial wisdom. Years are supposed to have a calming and moderating effect, and to bring the philosophic mind. Mr. Gladstone's political career seems likely to terminate in a whirlwind of passion. His old age is disorderly and turbulent. Other statesmen who have attained or approached to the term of life which he has reached have disentangled themselves from the connexions of party, and become the counsellors of the nation as a whole, the trusted and intimate advisers of the sovereign in emergencies which transcended the usual conditions of party government. Such was the position which towards the close of their careers the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, the Marquess of Lansdowne, and Lord Aberdeen occupied. Mr. Gladstone also has ceased to be the leader of a party; but only to become the ringleader of a faction, bent apparently upon disorder and turbulence out of doors, and upon impairing the efficiency of Parliamentary government. The decline has been precipitate, and it seems to verge upon a catastrophe, which is likely to overwhelm his political reputation, and which in this personal ruin threatens to bring down with it other things more precious to the nation than any individual repute.

Nearly half a century ago Mr. Disraeli propounded in Coningsby the doctrine that the future of England was in the hands of its youth. He proved his proposition by the historic method—by an enumeration of great warriors, great discoverers, great ecclesiastics, great statesmen, great lawyers, great poets, painters, and men of science who in early manhood or even in boyhood had marked the world by the greatest achievements. "The history of heroes," he inferred, "is the history of youth." The induction bears a striking resemblance to that by which Lord Macaulay, ridiculing the Baconian method with an imperfect understanding of it, proved, by way of reduction to an absurdity, that the prevalence of Jacobinism was owing to the practice of bearing three names. Charles James Fox, John Horne Tooke, Theobald Wolfe Tone, and others whom he cited were the positive instances. William Pitt, Henry Dundas, Edmund Burke, and some more were negative instances. It would have been as easy, if it had suited Mr. Disraeli's purpose, to prove the proposition of Cicero that the youth of a nation are more likely to be the ruin than the salvation of States, the great security of which lies in the balanced wisdom of old age. In our own time M.

Thiers, whose earlier manhood misled France into many disreputable and perilous adventures, in his wiser and more disinterested old age rescued his country, so far as rescue was possible, from the consequences of M. Émile Ollivier's youthful gaiety of heart. If Don John of Austria, as Mr. Disraeli reminds us, won Lepanto at twenty-five, Dandolo at over ninety took Constantinople by storm, and made Venice the Power which "held the glorious East in fee, and was the safeguard of the West." The Sophocles of the Œdipus at Colonos may be set against Byron and Burns dying at thirty-seven; the artistic old age of Titian against the artistic youth of Raphael; the papacy of Innocent XII., to say nothing of Leo XIII., against the papacy of Innocent III. and Leo X.; and the premiership of Lord Palmerston or of Lord Beaconsfield himself against the premiership of Mr. Pitt. Probably, however, Mr. Disraeli's doctrine of youth, advanced when he himself was somewhat beyond the confines of middle age, but had still a long way before him all that has made his career memorable, was not very seriously held by him as a law of history. He wrote rather as a moralist than as a philosopher; in the spirit of the sentence which, on the title-page of Lothair, he quoted from Terence—"Nósse omnia hæc salus est adolescentulis." There was always a good deal about Mr. Disraeli of the character which Mr. Squeers attributed to himself when he uttered the celebrated definition, "Squeers, a noun substantive, a instructor of youth." At the time when Coningsby was written Mr. Disraeli was the centre and master of the group of young men who were known as the "Young England" party. The age was one of frivolity and excess among the gilded youth of the day. The turf, the club, and the saloon were the haunts of a frivolous and jaded indolence. There is no need to attribute to Mr. Disraeli, with all the affectations and the eager personal ambition which marked that period of his life, any other than a generous motive in urging young men, whose rank and wealth exposed them to ignoble temptations, to "scorn delights and live laborious days," to give themselves up to arduous toil in the service of the State. It cannot be said with truth that Young England saved Old England. The Coningsbys and Millbanks, the Henry Sydneys, and Buckhursts and Veres, have not furnished their country with any pre-eminent ruler of men. But, not a few careers, respectable and even distinguished in English politics, owe possibly their first inspiration and their steadiness of purpose to Mr. Disraeli's insistence on the possibilities and responsibilities of youth and opportunity.

It is curious to note, however, that the half-century or thereabouts which has passed since Mr. Disraeli preached the doctrine that England was to be governed by its young men has been a period in which more completely than in any equal term of our history England has been in the hands of aged statesmen. Lord Palmerston, Lord Derby, Lord Russell, Lord Beaconsfield himself and Mr. Gladstone have been septuagenarian, or even octogenarian, Ministers. Two, at least, of these distinguished men exercised their most paramount ascendency over their countrymen when they had passed the conventional threescore and ten which is supposed to be the limit of natural life. The Boys who played a prominent part in Parliament during the Ministry of Walpole have no successors or representatives in public affairs at the present day. Politics have, to a great extent, ceased to be a separate profession, and the House of Commons is in a very secondary degree now the training school for a political career. Men make their way into it when they have spent the best years of their life and their amplest energies in other pursuits. The most distinguished public men who now sustain the reputation of the country for Parliamentary pre-eminence in the world had their training under political arrangements different from those which now prevail. Mr. Chamberlain is the only remarkable exception which the present House of Commons presents to this rule, the only instance of a man who, having made a fortune in business and a reputation in municipal affairs, has reached a foremost place among Parliamentary leaders. Mr. Bright has always been more of a Parliament-man than a business man; and Mr. Cobden's failure in trade was as signal as his success in political life. In present circumstances youth is almost out of the running in the race of public distinction and public service. The elder statesmen, to whose hands the conduct of affairs has almost of necessity been committed, have everything their own way. We cannot fairly judge as yet of the effect which this condition of things will have upon government in England; for these older statesmen are for the most part men, as we have said, who were trained under the old system, and have learned from a youth and middle age passed in office and in the House of Commons the business of office and of Parliamentary debate and management. It seems likely that the House of Commons of the next generation will be a House of Commons of middle-aged men, without training for public affairs. The prospect is not a hopeful one; but the morrow will doubtless make as good a provision as it usually does for the things of the morrow. There is in the English character an element of flexibility and of adaptation to political circumstances which is not, perhaps, so conspicuous on its purely intellectual and moral side. The need of guidance cannot, indeed, be trusted to ensure sound and upright guidance; but there would be faintheartedness in supposing that the resources of a national genius pre-eminent beyond all others in statesmanship are exhausted, and that men will be wanting to the imperative summons of the hour.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

THE late Tom Taylor's adaptation from Le Retour de Melun of MM. Brisebarre and Nue was revived last Saturday at the Olympic Theatre, where it was first produced twenty-five years ago, with Mr. Henry Neville and Mrs. Stephens in their original parts. The cast is a very strong one, containing as it does the names of Mr. Willard, Mr. Yorke Stephens, Mr. Julian Cross, and Mr. Calhaem, in addition to the two actors we have just mentioned. Those who have seen the play are not likely to forget that it is in many respects a remarkable one. The interest, though barely awakened until the close of the first act, is well sustained to the end. This is more than can be said for most of the plays produced of late years, where everything that can be made of the motive of the piece seems to be exhausted by the second act, and the third act has, as a rule, very little use, except as a vehicle for the display of elaborate scenery or upholstery, though it is sometimes used still for killing off a character or so. The piece contains four men's parts of the first importance, and no female character that could not be written down without materially injuring the main interest of the piece. Of course we could not now spare Mrs. Stephens's clever rendering of Mrs. Willoughby, the lodging-house keeper. But in the case of her son Sam it is different, and we could wish that the evil tradition of casting an actress, instead of an actor, for this part had not been adhered to. We must, however, admit, in justice to Miss Helen Leyton, who played the part, that she was fairly successful in her attempt to overcome the disability of her sex. No dramatist has, in a play of any considerable length, dared as yet to follow the successful departure made by Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Haggard in fiction and dispense with a love interest altogether, nor is there much likelihood that such an attempt will soon be made. We cannot remember any play, however, where the necessity for such an interest has received such grudging recognition. Our sympathies are aroused entirely by Jem Dalton, alias The Tiger, by Hawkshaw, the detective, and to a less extent by Bob Brierly—though this is no fault of Mr. Henry Neville's—and we care nothing about that colourless young person May Edwards, who falls in love with Bob Brierly on the shortest notice, and weeps her way through the piece. Mr. Henry Neville has managed to preserve an amount of life in his impersonation of the character of Bob Brierly which is certainly wonderful. His make-up was not very fortunate in the second act, where he has just returned from Portland convict prison; but the matter is not of much importance. We believe that this is Mr. Willard's first appearance on any stage in the character of Jem Dalton. If this be so, his performance must increase his already great reputation. The scene in the third act where Jem Dalton goes to the bill-broker's office disguised as a City man is alone worth going to see. Mr. Willard's make-up was perfect. In his snow-white wig and thin white beard, his frockcoat and light waistcoat, his identity with the Jem Dalton of the first act was entirely lost. It would be difficult to convey an idea of the distinction and finesse with which he played the scene. Mr. Yorke Stephens gave an impressive and sometimes even brilliant rendering of the character of Hawkshaw. Mr. Calhaem and Mr. Julian Cross, who appeared as Gibson and Melter Moss respectively, acted well without departing in any way from the traditions of their parts. Of Mrs. Stephens we have already spoken, and for the minor characters it may be said that they were adequately filled.

We desire to draw the attention of the lessee of this theatre to the utter absence of any provision for the comfort of the audience in the lobbies or elsewhere. Some too zealous person has been allowed to try his hand at ventilation, with the result that the whole house is like a barn. The present manager, too, might at least see that the stairs are kept decently clean.

It is difficult to know what to say about such a work as the comic opera Babette, lately produced at the Strand. It is not good enough to praise. The music lacks originality and appropriateness, the story is not very diverting, the construction has little ingenuity, the dialogue is without wit; yet M. Michiels, the composer, writes tunefully; at times a passage is skilfully orchestrated; the plot may be held to suffice, and there is little to call for harsh criticism in the book. It is not bad enough to blame. Everything depends upon the way in which pieces such as this are played; and the representation of Babette is neither very good nor very bad. Miss Camille d'Arville, the heroine, sings agreeably, acts cleverly, and altogether does very much to obtain for the opera such success as it has the fortune to secure. She is Babette, a peasant whose hand, according to the custom of the district in which she is the most attractive girl, is the prize of that lucky villager who, after the grapes have been gathered for the vintage, can pick out from a barrel the largest bunch. She has three lovers—a youthful Duke, a page, and a preposterous old Baron, who, of course, lights on the biggest bunch, and whose claims have to be evaded. Mr. Bracy is as satisfactory a representative of the Duke as could easily be found on the London stage, which is not well provided with the heroes of comic opera. Babette is understood to be the first attempt of M. Michiels to compose a comic opera. It is really hard to say whether he should be encouraged or discouraged. Worse music has become popular, and better has failed.

INCREASED BUYING OF INVESTMENT SECURITIES.

In spite of the apprehensions in Vienna, excited by the concentration of Russian troops in Poland, there has for the past couple of months been a very marked increase in the buying of sound investment securities. Prince Bismarck's famous speech in the Reichstag a year ago created a general belief throughout Europe that a great Continental war was impending, and as such a war would be attended by borrowing on a large scale on the part of the belligerent Governments, and by a vast demand, not only for the matériel of war, but for everything necessary for the maintenance of armies in the field, bankers desired to keep their funds well in hand, and merchants were equally eager to retain the means of supplying the anticipated demand. Further, investors of all classes foresaw that a heavy fall in the prices of Stock Exchange securities was likely, and therefore they suspended buying, in the hope of purchasing on terms more favourable to themselves. Peace was preserved throughout the year; but, nevertheless, investment-buying did not recommence. The result was towards the end of the year an extraordinary accumulation of unemployed money. Owing to the fears of war and to the financial difficulties in the United States the value of money throughout the greater part of the year had been high, and, consequently, the owners of this unemployed money were able to obtain a fair interest upon the money; but towards the close of the year the rates of interest and discount began to decline, and they have steadily fallen ever since, until at present the rate of discount in the open market in London is under 1½ per cent., and the rate of interest ranges from about 1 per cent. to 2 or 2½ per cent., according to the terms and the length of time for which the loans are made. It has become, in consequence, unprofitable to leave money on deposit, and equally unprofitable to lend it out on the Stock Exchange. Indeed, the demand for the Stock Exchange, not only in London, but upon the Continent and in the United States, is exceedingly small - so small that it is impossible to employ much of the money lying idle, the war scare at the beginning of last year having checked speculative business. Towards the close of last year, therefore, the purchases of sound-investment securities began, and the buying has steadily increased ever since. There is one exception—the Three per Cent. Funds of our own Government. The impression is very general that these funds will be converted very soon, and holders therefore are to a large extent selling. It may appear that the sales of Consols are the cause of the buying of other investment securities; but, though the sales of Consols necessarily occasion a demand for other securities, they do not account for the whole of the buying that is going on, because the buying is not confined to this country, it is general upon the Continent as well as in the United States. The real explanation of the buying is the accumulation of unemployed money to which we have been referring. And that this is so is further evident from the fact that speculative business is still very small. With the exception of some metals—notably copper and tin—and mining shares, there is, indeed, exceedingly little speculation upon the Stock Exchange either at home or abroad. From this it seems to follow that it is not merely greater confidence in the political situation that is encouraging investors. No doubt the number of alarms that have been gone through is gradually accustoming investors to look with less apprehension to the future. As war has been staved off so long, they are hoping that it will be postponed still longer. But, if political alarms had completely subsided, there would be a revival of speculation; and, since there is not a revival of speculation, it is clear that the real motive for the large purchases of investment securities of all kinds is the unwillingness of the saving classes to allow their money to lie idle any longer when they can obtain for that money such exceedingly low rates of interest.

Some years ago Mr. Giffen estimated that the annual savings of this country between 1865 and 1875 averaged about 240 millions sterling. Since 1875, no doubt, the rate of saving has been less; but still the annual savings at home are enormously large. In the United States it is believed that the annual savings exceed those of the United Kingdom. The savings of France are less than those of either England or the United States, but they also are very large; and, while Germany, Italy, Austria-Hungary, and Russia are comparatively poor, their aggregate annual savings mount up to a considerable sum. The total thus arrived at is vast; and, while it is quite true that the greater part of the annual savings are reinvested in the businesses of those who save, there yet remains a considerable balance which is every year invested in Stock Exchange securities. When the investment is suspended for nearly a year, the amount of savings becomes very great indeed, and at last the impatience of the saving classes grows so great that they begin investing, no matter what their anticipations as to the future may be. They consider that the loss of interest in the present will destroy the advantage that might be gained by waiting longer in the hope of buying on more favourable terms. It is a noteworthy feature of this large investment-buying that the saving classes in this country are purchasing more largely just now the very best American bonds than they have done for many years past. Hitherto investors proper have looked with suspicion upon American railroad securities of every kind. Those securities have been left very largely to the home market and to speculators in Europe. But now the very best classes of investment securities at home have risen to so high a price that investors are buying largely high-class American bonds—the bonds, that is, of the great railroad Companies which pay high rates of dividend, and which are, therefore, reasonably certain to be able to continue to pay the interest on the bonds, however trade may fall off in the United States. When, for instance, an investor holds a bond that used to pay him 4 per cent., and now finds that the price has risen so high that it yields only 3½ per cent., or perhaps less, he is tempted to sell the security he has held, and to look out for some other security reasonably safe that will give him the old rate of interest. The large buying that is going on is thus attended by a very considerable shifting of securities. Securities that used to yield 4 per cent., and now yield less, are sold by the old holders and bought by persons who formerly held Consols that yielded them 3 per cent. or thereabouts. Other bonds that yield 4 per cent. are bought, and the sellers of those other bonds look out for other classes of securities that yield a higher rate of interest, and so the process goes on from step to step. After a while it is reasonable to expect that the supply of sound investment securities will fail. Then investors of the more speculative kind will have to buy dividend-paying stocks—stocks, that is, whose annual yield varies according to the conditions of the time and place—and the buying of dividend-paying stocks will lead in due course to the buying of purely speculative stocks, purchasers hoping that they will receive in the capital appreciation of what they purchase compensation for the non-receipt of dividend. This of course, however, will depend upon the maintenance of peace. The outbreak of a Continental war would derange all calculations. It would raise the value of money, would stop investment-buying, and would probably—for the time, at least—disturb all the money markets of Europe. If, however, peace is preserved, it seems reasonably certain that the investment-buying that is going on must result in a revival of speculation.

One of the consequences of the continuance of investment-buying that may be reasonably foretold is a large increase in the issue of new Companies of all kinds. When the public is looking out for investments that will yield a better return than the old investments, they are always inclined to subscribe to new issues. Buying on the scale that is now going on leads necessarily to a marked rise in prices, and every rise in price, of course, lowers the return upon the money invested. It is one of the characteristics of the past dozen years that there has been outside of North and South America very little creation of new securities. It is, indeed, this absence of new securities of a high class that is leading to the extraordinary appreciation of old securities. In this absence of new securities there is a strong inducement for promoters to bring out new undertakings, and we expect to see, therefore, if peace is maintained and investment-buying goes on, a very large increase in new issues of all kinds in the present year. It will behove investors to be very careful in their investigation of these new securities. Many of them doubtless will be perfectly good, but many, also, will be exceedingly bad, and, unless much caution and judgment are exercised, the investors in the latter class will suffer heavy loss. At the same time the promotion of new issues will tend to improve trade. The public having more money than they can safely and profitably invest in the securities now existing, will be more inclined than they have been for some time past to encourage new ventures; and new ventures, if wisely conceived, will, of course, tend to improve trade. As regards the demand for sound American railroad bonds, to which we referred above, that will obviously tend to revive railroad building. Owing to the extreme dearness and scarcity of money last year the railroad Companies were compelled to drop to a very large extent the plans for new lines which they had conceived. The new lines built since 1885 had been constructed by the aid of money obtained from bankers upon bonds created for the purpose. A vast mass of such new bonds had accumulated in the hands of the accommodating bankers, and as capitalists throughout the United States in the course of the summer were able to obtain from 6 to 12, and even 14, per cent. in lending money upon bills for a short time, they were unwilling to buy bonds that yielded only 5 or 6 per cent. Consequently the railroad Companies were not able to obtain advances to continue their operations. The springing up of the demand for sound American bonds in Europe has relieved the bankers who took the new bonds. By selling in Europe old bonds of well-established soundness they obtained money enough to relieve themselves from any difficulties that might be apprehended, and at the same time the fall in the rate of interest throughout the United States has induced investors there to buy second and third class bonds. In this way it is estimated that fully half the new bonds created since the summer of 1885 have now been taken up by real investors, and if the investment-buying in Europe and America continues the probability appears to be that in the course of a few months more the bankers will be entirely relieved from the load of new bonds which quite lately they were financing. Then they will be in a position to accommodate once more the railroad Companies, and we may expect to see, consequently, a fresh start in railroad building. Railroad building upon a large scale will create a strong demand for iron and steel and for coal, and, consequently, new activity will be imparted to the iron and coal trades. It is quite true that the capacity of the United States for producing both iron and coal is now so great that but little is required to be obtained from Europe. Still, the productive capacity is not quite equal to the whole demand in periods of active railway building, and consequently there will be again a demand for English iron and coal if railroad building becomes as active as it was twelve months ago. The final result, then, of the buying of sound-investment securities which is now going on will be, if peace is preserved, a revival of speculation, an inducement to promoters to bring out new Companies of all kinds, a resumption of railroad building upon a large scale in the United States, and a decided improvement in the American iron and coal trades, which will impart some greater activity to the iron and coal trades here also.

MINOR GALLERIES.

THE late M. Monticelli's pictures exhibited at Messrs. Dowdeswell's Gallery do not altogether improve upon an intimate acquaintance. It is impossible to deny genius to the man who painted them, and yet no one can be justified who takes upon him to maintain that he was a genuine artist. We may almost say that he was gorgeously lacking in sincerity. "A king of shreds and patches," he adapted the motives and the means of execution of all sorts and conditions of painters, and with infinite care and shrewd dexterity wove out of them a mantle for himself, which, considered as the foundation of a serious reputation, may not inaptly be likened to the lion's skin which Tartarin sent home to Tarascon. Monticelli was a "méridional méridionalisant"—a tall man of his hands—of an exquisite sensibility to physical impressions, dramatic, over-emphatic, fanciful, wholly devoid of real imagination, and determined, at all costs, to appear original. The impression left upon the eye after seeing his pictures is one of great fatigue. It has been claimed for him that he was a colourist; but there is no science of colour based upon the great facts of nature to be met with in any picture in the present collection. In many instances a brilliant effect is obtained; but this result is attained to through the knowing artifices of the scene-painter rather than through the patient observation of the artist. Notably in his landscapes a false effect of sunlight is given by the foreground being painted in a higher key than the sky, and by the shadows in the trees being indicated by an uncompromising dark red. Many of these pictures would be wholly admirable considered as designs to be executed in some other material—such, for example, as the Montigny ware—but they do not fulfil the requirements of the medium in which they have been given to the world. A striking instance of the crying sin of worthless artificiality to which Monticelli was addicted is to be found in his picture of a banquet, in which the lights and lustres of a chandelier, which is apparently the source of light in the scene represented, are distinctly lower in tone than many of the objects upon which the rays from the chandelier are cast. Such examples abound throughout his work, and may be dismissed without further comment. It is a more congenial task to follow him in the execution of such pictures as "L'Invocation aux Dieux" and "Au Clair de Lune," which may fairly be accepted and judged as eminently successful set scenes, frankly arbitrary in conception and execution, in which form and colour are authoritatively combined to produce a delightful impression. In such pictures everything in the nature of local truth of tone or colour is deliberately and justly set at defiance, and we have only to consider whether the result is pleasing or the reverse. It is very pleasing, and in these works and in "Dolce far niente," in which bright and delicate tones of flesh are skilfully picked out from a red ground, it seems to us that we see Monticelli in his most congenial atmosphere. Here neither distinguished form nor exquisite yet strong colour are wanting, yet even here we are haunted by continual reminiscences and suggestions of other artists. It may, as a matter of fact, be doubted whether he had a very strong personality. It would, for example, be beside the mark to endeavour to compare him seriously to such a man as Goya, yet there is something in him which involuntarily suggests the comparison, unjust as it is, and certainly damaging to Monticelli. Of his peculiar method of execution it is hardly necessary to speak; it was, in the main, founded upon that of Diaz in his least truthful period, and has not led to any achievement on his part which might not have been compassed by employing simpler means. We may cite among the most remarkable productions in the present collection "Au Bord de la Mer" (13), "Dames et Cavaliers dans un Jardin" (35), "Paysage—Automne" (36), and "Fête dans le Jardin d'un Palais" (41). The exhibition of Monticelli's works is undoubtedly interesting, but will leave the aims and conditions of painting much where it found them.

Mr. Bearne's exhibition of water-colours at Mr. M'Lean's Gallery is decidedly promising. Mr. Bearne has a distinctly personal note, though it is not, perhaps, a very strong one. We prefer his sketches of Italy to those of Switzerland, but then Switzerland is a less paintable country. Mr. Bearne would do well to rid himself of the woolly execution which he affects, and to be a trifle more frank in his juxtaposition of tones. His study of the "Ponte Vecchio by Moonlight" is interesting and true, and the same may be said of his view of the "Duomo and Campanile from Old Market, Florence." The scene which he has selected from San Remo is vigorously rendered, and in the main sincere, though rather too yellow in general effect to be quite locally true. Among his Swiss studies, No. 18, "From the Churchyard, Grindelwald," seems to us the most successful.

RECENT MATINÉES.

AN interesting matinée performance was given late last week at the Prince of Wales's Theatre of a version of Alphonse Daudet's Arlésienne, by Mr. Jocelyn Brandon, and entitled The Love that Kills. M. Daudet's piece was originally produced at the Vaudeville in 1872, and recently revived with some success at the Odéon. Mr. Brandon has done his work very well indeed, and he shows therein that he possesses dramatic instinct of a high order, and it is unfortunate that he did not employ it on a worthier piece; for L'Arlésienne, when first represented on the boards of a Parisian theatre, was voted dull and unprofitable. The plot of this drama will, we fear, never interest an average English audience, for its character is far too Southern, and the passions it depicts are even abnormal in that ardent region, where suicides induced by the pangs of unrequited love are but too frequent. Fréderi, the son of a wealthy farmer's widow named Rose, has fallen in love and into the clutches of a scheming Arlésienne adventuress, and is about to be married to her, with the consent of his mother, who, like himself, believes her to be virtuous. Just as the ceremony is about to begin a horsedealer arrives in great haste to prevent the marriage, by producing irrefutable proof that the beauty of Arles is a woman of infamous life. On hearing this unpleasant news, Fréderi almost loses his reason—a sad state of affairs that does not rouse the sympathy of the audience, since the beautiful wanton never appears once throughout the piece. Rose hopes that Vivette, an innocent girl, will be able to wean her son from his mad passion for the Arlésienne. Fréderi at first appears to forget the adventuress and to be consoling himself with the purer love of Vivette. But a sudden encounter with his rival in the affections of the adventuress drives him to distraction and revives the fierce love which can only be calmed in death. His mother after this watches him night and day, fearing mischief. But he contrives to evade her, rushes past her with much violence, climbs the granary staircase, and throws himself from the window of its lofty tower, to fall bruised and dying at her feet. So gloomy a story is not calculated to produce a very agreeable play, and this notwithstanding the magnificent overture and incidental music composed expressly for it by Bizet. This music, which is well known to amateurs, was exceedingly well performed by a large orchestra under the able lead of Mr. Ivan Caryll, and the choruses were charmingly sung by the members of the Dorothy company. The preludes and the few bars preceding the entry of the principal performers, written somewhat after the fashion of Wagner's leit music, were now heard for the first time, and, although naturally very brief, they manifested the same exquisite quality which distinguishes the better known portions of this delightful composition. To Miss Sophie Eyre fell the honours of the acting, and her performance was conspicuously Southern in its intensity and capriciousness. Most powerful in the scene in which her son kills himself, she displayed really exquisite tenderness in the earlier scenes when watching Fréderi's every movement, feeling certain that his mind may easily be unbalanced by so cruel a blow as the one which has been inflicted upon him by the Arlésienne. Miss Norreys played the part of Vivette, which was originally sustained by Mlle. Bartet, and did it justice, although her pathos was, as usual with her, less interesting than her comedy. Mr. Laurence Cautley's Fréderi was an impassioned and forcible performance, and Mr. Julian Cross made an excellent Balthazar, the solemn spokesman of a trio of old men who form the family council, and who after a time become very wearisome by reason of their numerous predictions of evil and their never-ending allusions to troubles which have nothing whatever to do with the plot. Mr. Arthur Williams was Patron Marc, a brother of Rose, and the conceited captain of a sailing-vessel. He presented rather the appearance of a thin Captain Cuttle than that of a seafarer of the Mediterranean. Miss Clara Jecks as Bibi, an idiot boy, made a marked impression by her clever and unexaggerated acting of a difficult part.

Considerable excellent work of a purely literary sort is displayed throughout Mrs. Oscar Beringer's play Tares, produced on Tuesday afternoon last at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, but she has unquestionably employed her talent upon a subject which contains so many fatal flaws that it is scarcely likely ever to prove successful. The plot turns upon the subject of the misfortunes of the daughter of a hunting rector, who nurses a morbid affection for the forsaken child of a guilty relationship which has existed between the man she was formerly engaged to and an adventuress. Unquestionably the author works against human nature, for the conduct of Margaret Gyde, in wishing to sacrifice her own reputation in order to retain the little lad with her when its mother demands its restitution is a matter which surpasses belief. It is quite true that she has loved passionately Nigel Chester, the father of this child, in days gone by, but it is equally true that his seduction of Rachel Dennison occurred at a time when he was actually courting her. To be brief, we will pass over a number of events which would take too long a time to narrate here, and remark upon the climax of this piece, which is, to say the least, singular. Rachel returns to the rectory, and at the instigation of Mr. Chester's evil-minded cousin Luke insists upon her child being given back to her; for Luke fears that, should his cousin marry Margaret, who has become reconciled to him, he will not inherit certain large estates. At first Rachel, under the name of Mrs. Stanhope, sternly refuses any compromise. She will have her boy at all costs, however great may be the pain she inflicts upon the woman who has reared it with so much tenderness and care; but in time her heart is touched, and she relinquishes her natural claim. Then, when she is left alone to ponder over matters, Luke appears upon the scene, and, finding that she has disobeyed his commands, in a furious fit of anger springs at her throat and throttles her. This is a climax the audience scarcely expected, and which Mrs. Beringer has not worked up in an artistic manner at all; for the curtain falls on the dead Rachel without it being made certain that Mr. Chester will marry Margaret, or that the assassin Luke will be brought to justice. And Rachel, whose throat has been so much injured that death ensues, walks about, delivers speeches, and even answers Margaret and Nigel that she alone is guilty of the act which soon puts an end to her existence. The literary part of this drama is powerful. It is so interesting that the many incongruities of the plot pass almost unperceived, and this is notably the case in the scene between the real and the foster-mother, in which Miss Sophie Eyre and Miss Janet Achurch displayed their remarkable histrionic ability to much advantage. But, admirable as is the dialogue, it also has many blemishes, being thickly sprinkled with coarse allusions, and the frequent invocations to the Deity by his holiest synonyms—"Almighty," "Creator of the world," "Maker of us both," &c.—are painfully offensive and in the worst possible taste. Mr. Forbes Robertson made a "hit" by his forcible acting of the part of Chester, and Miss Vera Beringer was perfectly natural as the little boy Jack.

A comedietta by an anonymous author was produced at the Criterion last week with some success. The French piece from which it was translated and adapted is entitled La Femme qui Pleure, and the English version, Why Women Weep. Its plot is absurdly strained, and not worth relating; but the acting of it was so excellent as to atone in a manner for its improbability. Miss Norreys, Miss Ffolliott Paget, Mr. Edward Emery, Mr. Sydney Brough, and Mr. George Giddens did all they could to rescue the trifle from the fate of existing but for a single evening, like the night-blooming Cereus.

THE LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

MR. HENSCHEL offered good entertainment in his programme on Thursday in the way of classical and of modern music. Schumann's Overture to Manfred stood first on the list, and it was played vigorously, if not with all the point that could be wished. The strings, hardly strong enough by the way, did not always shine out clearly, and so some of the furious themes were occasionally involved in an undesirably confused roar of instrumentation. Beethoven's "Concerto in G for Piano" (No. 4) followed, and was placed in the hands of one of the most capable of modern players. This Concerto, if not the best of concertos, at least the most adapted to the qualities of its instrument, has seemed from her first dealing with it admirably suited to the talent of Miss Fanny Davies. This sympathetic artist always had a delightful touch, but every time we hear her she has improved in richness and depth of sentiment. On this occasion a quite masterly style of phrasing gave full value to the purity of touch with which she executed the graceful gambolling passages of the first movement. The "Andante" we have seldom heard performed with greater taste. Both the soloist and the orchestra deserve the highest praise. The final "Rondo" might have come in with more effect perhaps; but the players soon warmed to their work, and Miss Davies gave a rendering of her part remarkable at once for its fluency and its quiet artistic reticence of effect.

The Symphony of the day was Mozart's, in G Minor. We cannot give entirely unqualified praise to this rendering of one of Mozart's greatest and most mature works. The music certainly deserved a more careful and more elegant interpretation. The "Allegro molto" entered too slowly and with too ponderous and lumpy an expression. Though marked "Andante" the second movement might have been less dull and more intrepid. The beautiful piquancy of the fragmentary melodies demanded a lighter and more pointed execution. The "Minuetto," although perhaps a little lumbering, was carried off on the whole with more vigour, while the last movement pleased us best of all. The impetuous rush of the first subject of this "Allegro Assai," with its mad plunging intervals, was given with plenty of force and spirit, and if the second subject would have been the better for greater sweetness of tone, the rendering of the movement was on the whole eminently satisfactory.

It appears that Mr. G. Marshall-Hall, though a young man, has already written a good deal of music which has never been performed. His "Scena" (The Defence of Earl Godwin before the Witan) from the opera Harold shows considerable knowledge, and may be called promising in a young man. He is, however, at present hardly original. He borrows his idea of dramatic writing, as well as his idea of dramatic subject, from Wagner. Earl Godwin's speech appeared, though finely, too heavily orchestral. The voice was not important enough, and the words were set hysterically without any idea of dignified declamation. The ballad, "Count Eustace," was a great success, however, and deservedly, as the lines are set straightforwardly and with great spirit. Wagner's Overture to The Mastersingers of Nuremburg closed the concert with more fracas than was necessary.

TEA WITHOUT TOAST.

I ASSURE ye, Mr. Clancy, 'tis a mere malicious fancy
This report about a banquet having been Set afoot, and dropped by stealth lest we'd have to drink the health,
After dinner, of Her Majesty the Queen.
'Tis a slander diabolic that we ever meant to rollick
With our two distinguished visitors at all,
Or so frivolously fête any statesmen so sedate—
Ye might just as well propose a fancy ball.
I'm unable to make out how the story got about;
Give a dinner? How unlikely! how absurd!
Though my feelings I would smother, may I never eat another
If a soul in Dublin ever said the word.
But when Tim Maloney asked if my brains I hadn't tasked
How to give our hospitality its fling,
Then said I to Tim Maloney, "Hold a conversazione,"
And said Tim to me, "Bedad! the very thing."

Both the jaynius of the race and the spirit of the place
Such a function better suits, we all agree,
And no patriot of desert 'll prefer champagne and turtle
To a muffin and a simple cup of tea.
Yes, that that was all that passed on the subject, first and last,
That no dinner was proposed of any sort,
And that, save prefixed by "buttered," the word "toast" was never uttered,
I would readily make oath in any court.
It appeared to us a feast wouldn't help the cause the least,
And we settled that to give a "crush" at nine
Would be greatly more effectual, and far more intellectual,
Than at six o'clock to, greatly daring, dine.
And we liked, we all confessed, such an entertainment best
As permitted us our wives to it to bring,
And, in fact, the verdict ran of the ladies to a man
That a conversazione was the thing.

They have never held the creed that to see their husbands feed
Is among the sights that elevating are,
And they want to know the heroes who denounce our modern Neros,
And whom now they only worship from afar.
Since to pay their homage, then, to these most distinguished men
Is a thing that they have set their hearts upon,
They will never be contented till they all have been presented To the Marquess and Right Honourable John.
'Twill be surely understood that all these are reasons good
Why no banquet in our programme finds a place,
For that such a formal function as a dinner or a lunction
Would altogether fail to meet the case.
But, be that as it may, I emphatically say,
And most firmly to the statement I will cling,
Our Committee, undivided and unanimous, decided
That a conversazione was the thing.

So 'tis monstrous to pretend, as they say you do, my friend,
That a banquet, never thought about, has been Dropped—burked—suppressed by stealth, because we daren't propose the health,
After dinner, of Her Majesty the Queen.
Such suspicions trouble sorely the repose of Mr. M-rl-y,
As distinctly from his protest you may see,
While the worshipful Lord R-p-n has at once upon his lip an Exclamation of offended loyaltee.
There are some who may be sorry that, although we give a swarry,
We must leave the "leg of mutton biled" alone
(And Sir G-rge Tr-v-ly-n wished, when the dinner should be dished, To supply the joint with trimmings of his own).
Yet I still protest and vow, you know all our reasons now,
'Tis a matter of convenience at most,
Not because we view the mention of the Queen with apprehension
That we mean to give the tea without the toast.

REVIEWS.

THE PATRONAGE OF ART IN FRANCE.*

THIS dry financial statement, with its lists of proper names and long tables of figures, is a husk which contains a singularly interesting kernel. It is a section of the French Budget which resembles nothing which our own Treasury publishes, and it enables us to define very exactly what it is that France does for the encouragement of the fine arts in her midst. It also gives us an idea of what the duties, privileges, and responsibilities of an English Minister of Fine Arts would be if we could ever persuade our own Government to found such a department. The official theory of fine art in France is that it is a branch of the higher education. When Emerson and Margaret Fuller went to the opera to see Taglioni dance, the former remarked that this was poetry. "No, Waldo," his remarkable companion exclaimed, "this is religion!" The French seem to have something of the same opinion; for all the arts, including the opera and the ballet, find themselves marshalled with education and religion, under the protection of a single Minister. The sympathy which this branch of the service meets with in France is very considerable, though perhaps a little less universal than British critics of our own system are accustomed to believe. It is certainly surprising, in the face of the apparent zeal for the living arts in France, to find that the budget of this department has for several years been persistently reduced, and that some Radical politicians clamour for the entire separation of fine art from the protection of the State. There have been several notable appeals to the better feeling of the nation to adopt a more generous policy. The museums of France bitterly complain that England and Germany are able to enrich themselves with the monuments of antiquity far better than the French can, and, oddly enough, M. Antonin Proust was eloquently pointing to the progressive grants made by the English Government at the very moment when Lord Randolph Churchill was cutting down the British Museum. We look to France with envy, only to find that France is envious of us. The heart of every nation knoweth its own bitterness!

* Rapport présenté au nom de la Commission du budget chargée d'examiner le projet de loi portant fixation du budget général de l'exercice 1888, Ministère de l'instruction publique, des cultes et des beaux-arts. Section II. Service des Beaux-Arts. Par M. Henry Maret, député. Direction du "Journal Officiel." 1888.

The fact becomes obvious after careful investigation of this Report, that while the total sums expended by England and France respectively are not widely different, the mode in which those sums are spent is very distinct. England spends almost nothing on living art, except occasionally on architecture. France encourages the drama and music, painting and sculpture, even lithography and etching, with money out of her treasury. There are fifteen coryphées in the French Civil Service, and four individuals drawing large salaries who are distinguished as "Soprani-dramatique-Falcon." There are twenty-four figurantes in the service of their country, but the pay of these ladies is no great burden on the pockets of the ratepayers. In studying the tables before us we cannot help being struck by the minute and sympathetic attention shown in them to all the details of the various contemporary arts. This is very Parisian. Who can imagine an English Minister stooping to inquire whether one dramatist draws larger audiences than another, or who is the most promising sculptor of the year?

The details connected with the service of the theatres are fascinating. As far as the Comédie Française is concerned the figures for 1887 are not completely given. So fully as they were published, however, they show a slight tendency on the part of M. Claretie to subordinate the "répertoire ancien" to the "répertoire moderne." We hope that this will not be carried too far. In 1886 Molière still held his old ascendency. He was played sixty times, Racine twenty-one times, and Corneille fourteen times, L'Avare and Les Précieuses Ridicules being by far the most often repeated of the old plays. In all, in 1886, eighty pieces were played seven hundred and fifty times at the Théâtre Français. During the season that has just closed the great successes, as the Report does not fail to note, have been Hamlet and Francillon, and unusual pains and cost have been expended in the mise-en-scène of these plays. A little item of statistical information never collected before 1886 may be worth quoting. In that year 307,785 persons paid for their seats at the Comédie Française, and 156,412 took places gratuitously. The audience of the troupe of the Français, therefore, may be roughly estimated at half a million persons a year—a goodly number to have entered the doors of the national museum of French dramatic literature. In regard to the Odéon, the Report speaks in highly favourable terms of the success of the classical representations started at this theatre, and also of those, which amused and puzzled some English writers on education, especially destined for schools.

The support of the drama is less novel an idea to us in this country than the elaborate patronage of the plastic arts now carried on in France. In this country, save on the very rare occasions when a Maclise or an Armstead is called upon to decorate a public building with paintings or sculptures, the State buys no modern art. The British Government has, in the past, been generous and even on occasion lavish, in the purchase of works of deceased masters. But what a flutter it would cause in artistic bosoms, what trembling between hope and fear, if it were part of the duty of Mr. Plunket to attend the private view of the Royal Academy every year, with the intention of selecting a number of works for the State. Yet England is perhaps the only country of Europe where, to some extent, this is not done; and in France it occupies a great deal of public attention. For instance, no less than fifty-two pictures of one sort or another, from M. Roll's enormous canvas down to a lithograph, as well as twenty-two pieces of sculpture, were purchased by the French Government from the Salon of 1887. It is very easy to see what an encouragement this must be to all sorts and conditions of artists. The only thing we have like it in this country is the Chantry Bequest, under the regulations of which a certain considerable sum of money has to be spent annually in the purchase of pictures or sculpture from the Royal Academy Exhibition of the year. This has proved to be a great encouragement to our native art; but it is a very small, and moreover a private or semi-private, benefaction, while the "achats du Salon" are numerous and national.

The prices given for works of art by the State in France are looked upon as honorary and almost nominal. That is to say, they do not in any degree represent the value of a successful artist's work in the window of a picture-dealer. The ordinary art-student's notion even exaggerates this smallness of price, and you will be told in a Paris studio that 40*l.* is the maximum beyond which the State never goes in making an offer for the largest and most important picture. The Report before us shows the absurdity of this legend, while still displaying a series of exceedingly modest prices. The highest sum given for a picture in 1887 was 7,000 francs for the "Marche en avant" of Roll, to which we have just alluded. The very striking Artois scene of M. Tattegrain, "Les Casselois," fetched 6,000 francs; of course, an absurd price for a picture of that importance. But it must be recollected that enormous canvases are of no other use than to attract a gaping public for a season in the Salon, and then to adorn the largest wall of some provincial museum, and also that the advertisement of public purchase is a very valuable one. As for the legendary 40*l.*, however, it is worthy of notice that no fewer than forty-three of the pictures bought in 1887 exceeded this absurdly supposed limit in price.

Larger sums were paid for the pieces of sculpture purchased, as indeed the costly materials of bronze and marble demanded. For M. Cornu Vital's beautiful bronze group of "Belles Vendanges" 11,000 francs were given—a very small sum, and one which could not directly repay the sculptor, yet the highest record of State price in the Salon of 1887. M. Cadoux received 10,000 francs for his marble group of "A la Fontaine." But the State does not merely purchase modern works of art, it sometimes orders them, and pays down part of the price beforehand, in order to help the artist. In these cases the Government, like any private amateur, occasionally gets taken in, and the reader of this grave Report smiles at a note which informs him that a certain landscape-painter who received a commission for a picture in 1870, and who, moreover, had drawn out five-sixths of the stipulated sum, has died without finding time to paint the landscape that was ordered so long ago. In giving these commissions, the State sometimes goes far beyond the limit of price customary for purchases from the Salon. For instance, we find that M. Turcan, whose plaster model of "L'Aveugle et le Paralytique" was one of the notable ornaments of the Salon of 1883, was desired to execute this group in marble for the Government for the not extravagant, but certainly not absurdly low, figure of 18,000 francs.

It may be, no doubt, that for political purposes it has suited certain personages in the Chamber to oppose the expenditure on art to which we have briefly called attention. But there can be little question that this expenditure is popular, not merely with the educated and professional classes, but with the artisan, and even the peasant. Each department in France has a provincial museum in its chief city, and this museum owes its attraction with the vulgar, not to its Roman coins and bracelets, not to its scraps of Old Masters, but to the living, bright art which comes to it from the Ministère des Beaux Arts. We were once ourselves witness in a very remote department of France of the eagerness with which a crowd, largely of peasants in their Sunday best, welcomed the unveiling in their museum of a brand-new picture, as large as the side of a barn, which had come straight from the Salon. Some day, it cannot be doubted, the claims of modern art, whether plastic or dramatic, will be forced on the English Government. The people tax themselves for parks and public libraries already. There is only a step from the grant for South Kensington to one for a national theatre and for national collections of contemporary painting and sculpture. The advantage to the public is one which is easily perceived, even if its degree be denied. What is not always so clearly noticed is the advantage to the artist. At the present time we have almost a mania for giving scholarships, prizes, purses, and the like, as incentives to very young men and as aids to their education. In an enormous majority of cases the show of juvenile talent which led to this expenditure proves to be illusory, and the money is wasted, with no encouragement to art. But, while we nurse the seeds which may possibly spring up and bear blossom, we neglect entirely the plants which have proved their flowering capacity. The theory is that these form a group which needs no help, which is secure of success. But this is often very far from being the case, and a man of real genius, struggling through poverty to bring great visions to the birth, sees sums of money lavished upon boys of no real talent which, if expended in a moderate commission on his own work, would enable him to produce a genuine masterpiece. In France, at all events, as the interesting Report before us shows, the artist has not this source of complaint. If he can prove that he is capable of a great undertaking, and deserves to be helped to execute it, he has a very good chance of being helped to do so by the State. The consequence is that, whatever does not flourish in France, the plastic arts do.

duces them to something stranger than ever. He has not laid bare the wonders of an unknown race of civilized aborigines defying Mr. Hall Caine in the inward parts of the Isle of Man, nor has he described a curious people inhabiting the South Pole, the bottom of the sea, or any other unexplored parts of the world; but he has discovered what is, at least, equally remarkable—the "Salvation Army" as it appears to the people—if any—who believe in it. His heroine, for no better reason than that the bridegroom whom she married without caring for him in the lightness of her girlish heart was compelled to go straight from the wedding-breakfast-table to penal servitude, becomes a "Salvationist," and goes about preaching the beautiful doctrine that it is of no use to be good without being vulgar, and that noise and profanity are the only effective agents in the spread of practical Christianity. Happily at the end of the book she is herself rescued by a noble being who wears a long beard and a golden chain (whereto hangs an irrelevant tale), and has been so fortunate as to serve in the armies first of the E. I. C., then of Her Majesty, and finally of a native prince, who reluctantly dismissed him with a gratuity of 10,000*l.* and "a handful of diamonds," then to make a large fortune in cotton, and finally to come home to spend it as a gentleman at large, and all by the time he reaches the mature age of thirty-five. This favoured individual, whose name is George Brandon, is, as may be supposed, a man of some sense, and we strongly suspect that Mrs. George did not wear out many poke bonnets after her marriage. Brandon is a bit of a Monte Cristo; so much so that, "as he never gave less than double fare, he could always secure the best of cabs and the swiftest of horses." Did he prepay his cabmen? He had a black servant, who was of great use to him. When a woman whose heartless and mercenary character is unpleasantly and improbably apparent in everything she says tries to poison him, the black frustrates her wiles; and, when the existence of the convict is particularly inconvenient to Brandon and the "Fair Crusader," the black promptly disposes of the difficulty by sticking a long knife into his heart from behind. So cunningly, too, does he do it, that there is no reason to suspect anybody, and Brandon is provided with a conclusive and genuine alibi. And he is better than the persons who performed a similar service for Henry II., inasmuch as he acts on his own responsibility, without any kind of hint from his employer. It will be seen that the "Fair Crusader" and the "Salvation Army" have not much to do in the story. This is its chief merit. But there they are, and there they ought not to be, and that is why the book, on the whole, is reprehensible, and deserves to have so many of its secrets set out in a review. They are not exhausted, however, and will repay perusal.

Young Mistley is the work of an anonymous and apparently new author. It is highly promising, the writing being correct, pleasant, and humorous, and the people portrayed with unusual skill. At the same time, it has faults characteristic of inexperience. For instance, there is a poem, or piece of a poem, at the beginning to the effect that sometimes people who lose races run faster than people who win them. This means that Mr. Charles Mistley was a more virtuous and heroic person than his brother, Mr. Winyard Mistley, who got the young woman they both wanted. He certainly was, because the author says so; but if the author had not said so, no one else would have known it. Winyard was a man of much ability, and the author is so carried away by admiration of him that he quite forgets to exhibit any of the weaknesses or moral blemishes which he says constitute his inferiority to Charles. The plot is not much, but the people are excellent, and talk well. One conversation is so good an example of humour, combined with truth to nature, that it shall be extracted. Adonis was a dog:—

> Presently Adonis, who, having conceived the idea that there might be water-rats about, had turned his attention to the river's edge, looked up and broke the silence.
> "Woff!" he said—an internal interlabial bark, the sound of which appeared to strike the gleaming barricade of teeth, and travel down again to the inward parts of his muscular person.
> "I beg your pardon," observed his master absently, being at that moment absorbed in the deft placing of his flies beneath an overhanging branch across the stream.
>
> "Woff!" repeated Adonis, showing all his ribs with a sudden drawing-in of breath.
> "Indeed!" said Winyard with kindly interest; and following the direction of the dog's eyes, he saw the cause of his annoyance.

Of course the talk is not all so good as this, but it is seldom bad, except in a few passages about some excessively stupid and partly mad Nihilists. Of the two Mistleys, Winyard is clever and Charles is superficially dull—and it is a good thick surface. Lena, whom they both love, is just an ordinary little girl, done in the same way as most other heroines. Her father is an old soldier, who discovered Winyard's abilities; and he is capital. There is also a silent old man, who makes a good pendant to the silent Charles Mistley. He comes in rarely, but is meritorious. The author appears to be under the impression that, if a good man loves and his affection is not reciprocated, he devotes his life to stalking about saying nothing, unselfishly helping the woman Another has won, and intimating the dictates of almost supernatural wisdom by a system of winks, nods, and syllables, capable of being fully understood only by other good men similarly circumstanced. This opinion has the merit of novelty. There are one or two small mistakes in the book. On pp. 64 and 66 of vol. i. Charles is alternately older and younger than his brother, and it is only in the second volume that his primogeniture is conclusively established. There is an affecting scene towards the end of the second (and last) volume, where a person just introduced into the story tells Winyard with his last breath who he is, and impresses him vastly. The reader is not impressed, because he does not know, nor is he ever told. There seems a possibility that he may be a spy incidentally mentioned early in the story, but, if he is, the circumstance is quite uninteresting. Furthermore, there is a peculiarly silly outburst of the author's about the value of dead languages in education, clumsily pitchforked into the middle of a disquisition about Winyard's character. It is worth while to point out these small faults, because they could easily be cured, and the story is remarkably good.

A certain Miss Tilly Burton was adopted by an uncle named Robert Burton. Tilly had lived all her life in a Scotch village remote from civilization, and her Uncle Bob had roamed over the distant parts of the earth, accumulating a vast fortune by mingled stupidity and good luck. When the fortune was made, they came together to London to enjoy it, and "Leslie Keith" relates their adventures. These consisted mainly in their casually meeting Tilly's long-lost cousin in a ham-and-beef shop on the evening of their arrival, and in her falling in love with him and he with her. Complications arose from the rivalry between Tilly's cousin John and her cousin John's cousin Fred. The latter made the running over the greater part of the course; but he had a black heart, which was revealed in due time. In fact, he was heard speaking his mind about Uncle Bob, concerning whom his judgment was sound. The old man, besides being stupid and vain, was a glutton, and had no manners. Still, he had been very kind to Tilly and Fred, and that youth's conduct was ungrateful. The consequence of his being overheard was that he was dismissed, and Uncle Bob died suddenly of a broken heart, just in time to escape the clutches of a speculative financier. So Tilly's path was made clear and comfortable, and she walked in it. The story is not bad, but it strongly resembles many scores of other novels. The author speaks of walking "down" Prince's Gate from south to north, which shows a noble disregard of physical geography. There is a boarding-house full of more or less silly people, whose peculiarities are fairly well described. One of them is a spookologist, and steals a valuable ring, which he subsequently finds through the agency of a spook called "George." The incident is well treated of, never being explained in so many words.

The Passenger from Scotland Yard is an anxiously elaborate detective story after Gaboriau. A detective is ordered to recover some stolen diamonds, and one never has any doubt as to whether or not he will succeed. His chief opponent, and the most entertaining person in the book, is a retired thief of great experience and engaging manners, called Byers, but known among his friends as "Grandpa," and the mutual respect, almost amounting to affection, between the two old rivals—such as that which might exist between a Lyttelton and a Webbe—is indicated with great felicity. There is a goodish, though not perfectly original, murder in the first few chapters of the story, the spoils immediately passing out of the murderer's custody in a manner which, though necessarily simple, is more picturesque than realistic. The book has a fine picture of a pair of handcuffs on the cover, and should be read in the train—if possible the night mail to Paris.

THE CANARY ISLANDS.*

MRS. STONE says in her preface that no apology is necessary for writing a book on the Canary Islands, and in this she is certainly right; but some apology is assuredly due for the wanton prolixity she has thought fit to indulge in, which goes far to mar what ought to be a most interesting record of adventurous and persevering travel. In these days, when most attainable places have been written about ad nauseam, it would be difficult to find anything better worth describing than this wonderful group of islands. Although within what is now considered short steaming distance of England, they are but very little known; indeed, only one of them, Tenerife, can be said to be well known to travellers and tourists; while Hierro, Fuerteventura, and Lanzarote are hardly known at all, and Palma, less grand than Tenerife, but more beautiful, is not often visited. All seven were most carefully and conscientiously explored by Mrs. Stone and her husband, in spite of great discomfort and occasional hardship; and naturally she has a great deal to say about them that many will care to read, but unfortunately she has chosen to dilute this with much tedious and wearisome detail that can hardly interest any one except her own personal friends. She has apparently no idea of selection and compression, and seems to think that everything that she and her husband did must be duly set forth for her readers, with regard to whom she is quite merciless in her volubility, not allowing them to escape a single item or to remain in ignorance of the most trifling facts. Thus, just to take a few instances, she gravely records how on one occasion they found, after going a little way, that some things had been left behind, and how the guide went back for them and in due course returned; mentions the remarkable fact that she beheld in a sacristy the plain wooden case of an old eight-day clock; pathetically suggests how, having eaten too much fruit, she felt knocked up, a phenomenon not peculiar to the Canary Islands; describes a fruit which was obviously a water-melon as though it was something new and strange; records the singular incident of the captain of the Matanzas having asked them to dinner, and been unfortunately prevented from receiving them; and describes, as though no one had ever described it before, the manner in which a camel rises from the ground and the sensations experienced by the traveller on its back. From these samples, taken from a great mass of verbiage, it will be seen how needlessly lengthy and how trivial in some respects Mrs. Stone's book is; and it must be added that, like other travellers who have been unable to distinguish between what interests them and what is likely to interest those whom they write for, she is never tired of recording her breakfasts, luncheons, and dinners, forgetting that the cuisine of the Canary Islands, though a matter of intense importance to those who travel there, is not a subject of specially engrossing interest to the reader, who can scarcely be so much absorbed in the mess of vegetables, fruit, and meat, in the fowls, in the beefsteaks, in the eggs, in the fried bananas, &c., as were hungry travellers avid for a meal. It would be easy to point to many other sins of commission in recording at unnecessary length dull details of travel; and, on the whole, it must be said that Mrs. Stone's inordinate and almost unpardonable prolixity has greatly marred, if it has not spoilt, what ought to have been an exceptionally attractive book of travel. When those who study her pages find her rejoicing in the fact that she learnt how to write on horseback they must devoutly wish that she had been a little less deft with her fingers, and had not been able or anxious to record every petty incident; so much of the work might be left out with advantage, and half would certainly be so much better than the whole.

If, however, Tenerife and its Six Satellites (not a very accurate title, by the way) is marked by a grave defect which should certainly have been avoided, it must also be said that it is marked by very exceptional merit. As has been stated above, it is the record of a journey of singular interest, pursued with admirable energy and determination. Notwithstanding some exceedingly valuable chapters on the history of the islands, the student of Mrs. Stone's book is not likely to admire her as a writer, but he can hardly fail greatly to admire her as a traveller. Indeed, her book, which is totally free from boastfulness or egotism, gives the idea that she is exactly what a traveller should be; of unfailing courage and energy, and also of unfailing equanimity, daunted by nothing, turned back by nothing, and, though perfectly appreciative, as every rational being should be, of comfort and good cheer, when they can be had, willing to undergo discomfort, hardship, and hunger sooner than relinquish seeing anything that can be seen. It is interesting to note that when, after much arduous travel, she was prostrated by severe illness in Las Palmas (capital of the Grand Canary, not to be confounded with Palma), the idea of giving up Lanzarote and Fuerteventura never crossed her mind. She was absolutely determined to proceed, and the record of a journey in little known countries pursued by a lady with such a spirit as this can hardly fail to be interesting, however distracting her volubility may be. That, if carried away sometimes by enthusiasm, she is, on the whole, accurate, those who have visited each of the seven islands can testify, and it is not at all impossible that her book may stimulate many to travel in the wonderful archipelago, and may lead to the discovery not only that Orotava and Las Palmas are far better for invalids than Funchal, but also that Arrecife, the capital of strange Lanzarote, is destined to be one of the great health resorts of the world.

Owing to want of space, we can only touch on those portions of Mrs. Stone's lengthy narrative which relate to the less known amongst the islands, and must pass over her accounts—sometimes tedious, it must be said—of places which are more or less frequented by travellers. She naturally went first to Tenerife, and landed of course at that dullest of seaport towns, Santa Cruz, which possesses but one object of interest, and that very painful interest, for Englishmen—the flags which were lost in Nelson's unfortunate boat attack on the place in 1797. From Santa Cruz she journeyed by the fine high road which is so well known to all who have visited Tenerife to the Puerto de Orotava, gazing on the so-called valley without the intense admiration which other travellers have felt for it. From Orotava she went to some rarely visited villages, and ascended the Peak by a route not often traversed, getting involved in considerable difficulties, owing to the incapacity of a local guide. She persevered, however, with indomitable energy, and duly reached the summit. Shortly afterwards she gave a yet greater proof of courage and determination; for she embarked on board one of the unutterably dirty and uncomfortable little trading schooners, and sailed first to San Sebastian in Gomera, and then to Hierro, the smallest and least known of all the island group. Mrs. Stone and her husband were the first English who had ever been there, and, finding herself in, what is so rare nowadays, a real terra incognita, Mrs. Stone was apparently much pleased with Hierro. Less fortunate travellers will not perhaps be very greatly charmed with it. Whatever the southern and western portion of the island may be like, the north-eastern slopes, in which Valverde, the largest town or village, is situated, are as ugly and uninteresting as any hill-sides can be. Valverde itself is a larger and better place than might be expected from its remote situation; and the principal inhabitant, the priest Candellaria, is an amiable man, whose intelligence has not been dimmed by residence in what is certainly an out-of-the-way spot.

From Hierro Mrs. Stone sailed back to Gomera, after exploring which in the most thorough manner she returned to Orotava, from which place she went to Santa Cruz, the pleasant capital of the very beautiful island of Palma. This is probably destined, at no far distant time, to become a favourite resort for enterprising tourists; but last winter Englishmen and Englishwomen were so rare that boys and girls followed them in the street and people came to all the windows to stare at them. Perhaps things will be changed before long, and many will grow rapturous over an expedition which is second only in interest to climbing the Peak of Tenerife—the ascent, namely, of the great Caldera (crater) of Palma, which a lady can make in a day, although it is more than seven thousand feet above the level of the sea. Mounting one of the strong and surefooted little mules of the place, the traveller rides nearly the whole way up, gaining thus with perfect ease a mountain-top whence there is a view of indescribable glory and magnificence. Only a portion, less than half, of the crater remains, but what does remain constitutes a vast amphitheatre of nature's building, the like of which it were surely hard to find. The sloping sides are of deep and sullen but of strangely varied hue, sometimes dark red, sometimes lurid yellow, with curious, snaky veins twisting through them. Not far from the centre runs down a huge ridge, or buttress, broken into fantastic peaks and pinnacles, amongst which rises a natural cross, which, strange to say, has escaped the attention of the Spaniards. The eye travels for long down the pitiless slopes of the huge crater, telling of nothing but maleficent nature's work, till a swelling out in them conceals the rest of the arid region, and below are seen woodland and green alps, and, beneath all, and seemingly at an immense distance below, the Atlantic. It is impossible to realize height more thoroughly. The traveller feels as if he were about twenty thousand feet above the vast expanse of sea which he looks upon.

Mrs. Stone of course ascended to the highest point of the Caldera's rim and explored Palma with her usual disregard for trouble and discomfort, undergoing the indescribable miseries of a third-rate Spanish fonda. On quitting Palma she went once more to Tenerife, and thence to the Gran Canaria, where she worked with the same resolute and indomitable spirit. For the reason given above we are unable to follow her really remarkable journey in this great island, historically the most interesting of the Canary group. It is sufficient to record that here her arduous and continuous exertion seems at least to have told upon her and that she fell seriously ill. Nothing daunted, however, she renewed her travels again as soon as she got well, and, after seeing all the wonders of the Gran Canaria, went to Arrecife, the capital of the strange, but withal most fascinating, island of Lanzarote, the easternmost of the archipelago.

It may seem paradoxical to say that Arrecife is a most charming place, as it stands in a dreary volcanic waste, without trees, without verdure, without streams; but, nevertheless, those who have once been there usually feel a strong desire to visit it again. Its attractiveness is probably due to its marvellous climate, which, when Arrecife is better known, will perhaps be considered one of the best in the world. Owing partly to the extreme dryness of the island and the absence of vegetable exhalations, and partly to the fact that it is situated on the edge of the North-east trades, the air is so bracing and exhilarating that languor, depression, and fatigue seem impossible there, and as it appears to suit the sick and the strong equally well, it is difficult to doubt that it will before long be recognized as the best place for a sanatorium, where consumptive patients can recover, and where their friends can remain with them without feeling any of the terrible lassitude and weariness which are caused by the enervating climate of Madeira. What there is to be seen in the island of Lanzarote the reader will learn from Mrs. Stone's book, for it is needless to say that she explored it in her usual thorough manner. It should be said, however, that she gives but an inadequate account of the view from what is called the burning mountain, which is much the same as might be expected in the moon, if nature had at last provided it with an atmosphere, and if a little cultivation had been started here and there upon it.

From Lanzarote Mrs. Stone went to the adjacent island of Fuenteventura, which resembles Lanzarote, but is apparently far less interesting, and travelled systematically through it, thus finishing her task of exploring the whole archipelago. In spite of her painful prolixity, her account of it will in all probability be largely read, as the Canaries are now likely to be much sought. The reader will close her second volume with delight and admiration; delight at having got to the end of it, admiration for the lady's unfailing courage and endurance, and indomitable perseverance; qualities, after all, even more valuable than literary skill. Some literary skill, we trust, however, Mrs. Stone will bring to bear should her work reach, as it deserves to, a second edition. Reduced to half its present dimensions, Tenerife and its Six Satellites would be an exceptionally excellent book of travel.

THE CHURCH BELLS OF KENT.*

MR. STAHLSCHMIDT'S work on the London bell-founders was a valuable contribution to historical literature. It was included in his volume on Surrey bells; and identified many of the old City "poters" who plied their craft on the north side of the Eastcheap, about the modern Billiter (then Bell-zetter) Square. We cannot expect new discoveries of so important a character every day; and in the present book, although there are evidences of plenty of research and untiring quest of accuracy, there is not so much to interest the general or historical reader.

Within the borders of Kent there are almost six hundred churches; all have bells except St. Paul's, at Milton by Sittingbourne; three places, on the other hand, have bells but no churches. These are Buckland, by Faversham, Hope, and Warden. The old church bells may be reckoned at about 2,000, but Mr. Stahschmidt does not, of course, deal with new ones. In addition to the bells of parish churches, he has examined some "devoted absolutely to secular uses," such as the bells of town-halls; but he describes none as of much interest, except that in the clock-tower of Leeds Castle, "the only specimen in England of French workmanship" with which he is acquainted. The largest bell in the county is that of Canterbury Cathedral, twenty inches in diameter. It was cast in 1762, as a successor to "Great Dunstan," which had cracked, and hangs in the south-western tower. Only ninety-eight have as yet been identified as dating before the Reformation, of which number some thirty are prior to 1400. "The two earliest are the very quaint pair at Iwade, locally (and erroneously) supposed to be two old ships' bells." These Mr. Stahlschmidt would date before the middle of the thirteenth century; but they are without inscription. The second bell, at Burham, has on it the name of the founder, "Richard de Wymbis," who flourished between 1290 and 1315, and of whom Mr. Stahlschmidt gave an account in his essay on the London bellfounders, already mentioned. But he has also been able to identify a workman at Canterbury of the middle of the fourteenth century. This was William "le Belyetere," who was there in 1325, as appears from one of the "Feet of Fines" of that year. Mr. Stahlschmidt assigns to his foundry eight bells at Bridge and other places in or near the ecclesiastical metropolis. There are many other interesting notices in this first chapter; but we have only indicated the contents of some of the opening paragraphs. Mr. Stahlschmidt spares no pains to find out all he can about the late as well as the early founders, and presents his readers with a mass of well-digested information, the accuracy of which few people will feel inclined to question. He passes on next to "Local Uses" in a chapter which will prove most amusing to the general, as distinguished from the antiquarian, reader. The eight o'clock bell on Sunday morning, so common in Kent and many other counties, is, as Mr. Stahlschmidt points out, a survival of the pre-Reformation period, when matins were said at that hour, with mass at nine. At some villages the time was seven, and the bell continues to be rung at that hour. At Biddenden, Leigh, and Speldhurst both the matins and the mass bells are still rung, and the same usage prevailed until quite recently at Eastry and at Sittingbourne. Mr. Stahlschmidt picks out Edenbridge, and the inhabitants of that pretty parish will probably be surprised to find "they have, of course quite unwittingly, conserved ancient Sunday bell-uses very perfectly. Matins-bell at 7, Mass-bell at 8 A.M., Sanctus peal at 1 P.M., and Ave peal at 6, added to a doubtful survival in the shape of a sermon-bell at 9 A.M., make up a good record." The church, which is of the two-aisled pattern, rather common in Kent, has a peal of six bells, all modern.

Of week-day peals, also, Mr. Stahlschmidt gives a very interesting account. He has only found the "Morning Ave" surviving at Canterbury Cathedral, where it is rung at 5.45 in summer and at 6.45 in winter. At Cowden it has only been given up of late years. "An abnormal, daily, early peal is rung at Smeeth at 8 A.M.—so unusual a custom that it is probably a survival, most likely of the morning Ave peal, changed, perhaps gradually, to suit the convenience of lazy sextons." In this very ancient Norman church there is but one bell, two having been sold in the last century "by a churchwarden for funds to repair the roof, instead of making a rate." The curfew is well represented in Kent. Of special ancient customs Mr. Stahlschmidt notices the Shriving-bell on Shrove Tuesday, which has in quite recent times died out in Kent, though it still flourishes in Surrey; the Gleaning-bell, also extinct; the "Brandgoose-bell," at which markets are opened at Sandwich; and the various usages connected with the "Passing-bell or Death Knell." The normal use in Kent seems to be to ring the "Death Knell as soon as notice reaches the clerk or sexton, unless the sun has set, in which case it is rung at an early hour the following morning." The use of "tellers" to denote the sex of the deceased is found by Mr. Stahlschmidt to be very universal. In most cases "Nine tellers make a man," the well-known rule converted so often into a proverb about tailors. It is not common to give the age denoted by the number of strokes. Mr. Stahlschmidt concludes this chapter with a complaint that change-ringing is so rare in Kent. The cause he believes to be the want of local support, and, since the abolition of church rates, the want of the trifling sum given to the ringers. Now the whole burden of such expenses falls upon the parson, and in these days, when glebes are unlet, parsons who have many calls on their income cease, in Mr. Stahlschmidt's words, "to respond to the less urgent ones."

The rest of the volume consists of an account, arranged alphabetically, of the bells in each parish in the whole county, and the local usages in respect of ringing, chiming, and tolling. At Ash by Sandwich Planché described the ancient custom of tolling the curfew in the evening, and speaks of "the five o'clock bell rung every morning, [which] though it now only summons man 'to go forth to his work and to his labour,' formerly at the same hour called priest and people to Matins." This last statement, as Mr. Stahlschmidt points out, is incorrect. "Matins were not for the laity, unless members of a religious body. The early morning (daily) peal was styled the Ave-bell, or Morning Angelus." Mr. Stahlschmidt is not, however, content with demolishing poor Planché. He pours contempt on Gray. "The quotation from Gray's Elegy, too, is a pretty bit of poetical fiction. A bell which is rung at 8 P.M. in the winter months only (there would be no fire to 'cover' in the summer) can hardly be said to herald the departure of a sun which had set some three or four hours before." This is very shocking, but Mr. Stahlschmidt is no respecter of poets. He goes one by one through all the Kentish churches, and it is hardly possible to turn over a single page without finding something curious. There are large extracts of the usual kind from parochial records, such as "Ffor oyle for the bells when theye were new hanged, viij*d*.," and "Paid Hodges for Beere ye Bell Hangar had willst he was heare, 6*s*." The records relating to the casting of a new bell in 1588 for the church at Bethersden are most amusing, especially where the churchwardens complain that they have no more money, and that the bell-founder "did procure a wrytt," but the whole story is too long to quote. Mr. Stahlschmidt intersperses his notes with criticism, and any one who has spent a few days at Ashford, where there is a very fine peal, will agree with him in his remark: —"The selection of tunes, one for each day of the week, is not very happy."

BARBÉ'S TRAGEDY OF GOWRIE HOUSE.*

TO the end of time, no doubt—unless it should please heaven to bring to light some conclusive piece of evidence—Scotsmen will exercise their wits upon the puzzle of the Gowrie plot. Mr. Barbé, by his name, should trace his descent from France; but the alliance between France and Scotland is of old standing, and he certainly displays a thoroughly Scottish zeal in investigating the details of "the Tragedy of Gowrie House." For ourselves, we confess to feeling somewhat languid on the subject. Perhaps this is tantamount to a confession of not having made a special study of it. To come to any settled conviction on the point, it would be necessary to have examined all the evidence in the case, and to have the qualifications of an expert for judging of the genuineness of the Logan letters. But without taking so much trouble, it is clear that the case is inconclusive either way. It is not in the least antecedently improbable that two Scotsmen of high degree should have conspired to kidnap or murder their King; but neither is it antecedently improbable that a Scottish king, or indeed any king at the close of the sixteenth century, should have plotted the taking off of two inconvenient subjects. When we come to the legal evidence, we are met with the fact that some of those concerned were tortured—one unhappy man is expressly said to have been "extremely booted." Consequently their evidence, and that of all those upon whose minds the fear of torture operated, is for historical purposes worthless. Then, even without torture, no case for the Crown was ever honestly got up in those days. It might be an honest case to begin with, but it was sure to be dishonestly strengthened; and the result, by a righteous retribution, is that in later days people are led to discredit the whole. If the Logan letters should be incontestably proved to be forgeries, it does not follow that the story which they were forged to confirm was a lie from the beginning. According to modern notions, the evidence that Gowrie was a traitor is not strengthened by the use of torture to extort evidence that he was a sorcerer as well; but the absurdity or the irrelevance of the second charge does not prove the falsity of the first. The true conclusion is, that it is impossible to form any judgment upon evidence got up after the fashion of those days. Finally, for our part we confess that our interest in the "Tragedy of Gowrie House" would be warmer if the house itself had not gone the way of nearly everything that one wants to see in Perth—that is to say, it was pulled down early in this century. It appears that its historic value had already been much diminished by alterations made in the previous century; but we do not clearly gather from Mr. Barbé whether these are to be laid to the charge of the Town Council of Perth or to that of the Duke of Cumberland. In consequence of these alterations, the plan of Gowrie House dated 1806 (which is reproduced by Mr. Barbé) does not show the turret in which the most striking scene of the drama was enacted. It would have been better if this had been distinctly stated, as the reader who finds the 1806 plan introduced into the midst of the narrative of the events of 1600 may spend some time in searching vainly for a turret to answer the description. Further on, however, there are two plans, showing the turret, main staircase, and "black turnpike" or dark winding staircase, a knowledge of the position of which is essential to the clear understanding of the details of the story.

The official version of the Gowrie affair is, in brief, thus:—Early on the 5th of August, 1600, when King James was going out hunting in the park of Falkland, Alexander, called the Master of Ruthven, a youth of nineteen, brother to John, Earl of Gowrie, came to the King with a somewhat cock-and-bull story of the arrest of a suspicious stranger carrying a pot of foreign gold coins. After some demur, James rode with the Master, seven or more of the Royal attendants following at intervals, to Gowrie House—the prisoner being understood to be detained somewhere under the control of Ruthven. After a rather makeshift dinner, at which the elder brother, the Earl of Gowrie, waited on the King, the younger Ruthven, with much secresy and mystery, took James upstairs into a remote turret-chamber, where stood, not a prisoner in bonds, but an armed man. Then Ruthven locked the door, and turned upon the King with threats and oaths, taxing him with the death of his, Ruthven's, father (the Earl of Gowrie executed in 1584). A scuffle ensued, in which James managed to get his head out of the window and to cry for help. His attendants ran up by both staircases, breaking open the doors, and, with the usual loyal excess of zeal, despatched first the Master of Ruthven and then the Earl of Gowrie, who had come later upon the scene—according to the official version, with seven or eight followers, or only one, according to another. The two Ruthvens' mouths were thus sealed for ever.

Even at the time there was a widespread belief that the whole thing was a cold-blooded scheme on the King's part for getting rid of the Ruthvens. The beginning of the story—the prisoner and the pot of gold business—rests entirely on King James's word; for no one pretended to be privy to what passed—or, as Mr. Barbé is pleased to say, "transpired"—between the King and Alexander Ruthven in their first conversation in the park. Proof was felt to be wanting, and with some difficulty the armed man of the turret, or a man who was induced to pass for him, was discovered. As during the scuffle he had assisted the King rather than his employer Ruthven, and as he duly gave corroboration to the royal story, he not only escaped prosecution, but was substantially rewarded. Further corroboration was afforded some years later by means of a notary in Eyemouth, George Sprot, who, so far from profiting thereby, got hanged for not sooner revealing his knowledge. After his death, five letters were produced, which were said to have been found among his papers, and which purported to be written by the late Robert Logan of Restalrig, the owner of Fast Castle. Of these letters, three were to an unknown "Right Honourable Sir," one to a Laird Bour, a sort of underling of Logan's, and one to Gowrie himself. They darkly indicate the existence of a conspiracy in which these four men, with the addition of Alexander Ruthven, were concerned. Its exact nature is never allowed to appear, though there thrice occur mysterious intimations of its resemblance to something in an unknown tale of "a nobleman of Padua." The young Earl of Gowrie, it must be observed, had studied at the University of Padua—dabbling in magic there, as his enemies asserted. Vague as are the expressions of the letters, the law officers of the Crown assumed that they implied a plot for the King's murder; the more modern interpretation is that the plot was for kidnapping James and conveying him by sea to the lonely stronghold of Fast Castle.

It is not very difficult to point out many weaknesses and inconsistencies in this story—a strange one enough as thus briefly told, and in its details still more open to criticism. The task of picking it to pieces has several times been undertaken—amongst others by Mr. Bisset in one of his Essays on Historical Truth, published in 1871. Mr. Barbé does not say whether he has read this or any previous advocacy of the Gowries' side of the case; but if he had seen Mr. Bisset's essay, he would hardly, we think, have laid stress on a supposed discrepancy in the official "Discourse" relative to Alexander Ruthven's disposal of his gold-bearing stranger. The difficulty is raised by the use of the word "house," and disappears if we accept Mr. Bisset's explanation that "house" then had the sense of "room." Ruthven said that he had secured his man "in a privy derned house,"—not, we take it, a separate building, as our present author implies, but, as the earlier essayist says, "a private solitary room." Further on in the "Discourse" it is stated that, in order to reach the prisoner, the King was taken by Ruthven "through three or four sundry houses"—i.e. the disused-gallery and "gallery-chamber" on the upper floor of the south side of Gowrie House. Allowing for a little exaggeration on His Majesty's part as to the number of "houses" that he passed through, and the number of doors that Ruthven locked behind him, the story here hangs well enough together.

Mr. Barbé has availed himself of all the light that can be thrown upon the affair by the English and Scots State Papers, the Reports of the Historical MSS. Commission, and the letters of the French Ambassador Boissise. It is noteworthy that, according to this last authority, the Scottish Queen (Anne of Denmark) plainly showed her regret for the Ruthvens' death. This may explain, or be explained by, the rumour that jealousy with regard to his wife was King James's motive for putting young Alexander Ruthven out of the way. But motives of this kind are always easy to impute, and difficult either to prove or to disprove. The Royal jealousy—on political, not conjugal, grounds—of the elder brother is a better ascertained fact. Perhaps the most important part of Mr. Barbé's essay is that in which he shows how strained were the relations—to use the modern political slang—between the young Earl of Gowrie and his King. For one thing, there were pecuniary unpleasantnesses. The Crown was in long-standing debt to the House of Gowrie, to the extent, with accumulated interest, of over 80,000*l.* (in English money), and it had in effect undertaken to see that the claims of the young Earl, who was himself being pressed by his inherited creditors, were satisfied in the space of a year from June 20, 1600. Only a few days later the King was vainly appealing to a Convention of the Estates to grant him 10,000 crowns; and, strangely enough, the Earl of Gowrie came out with a strong speech in opposition. Not two months later Gowrie lay slain in his own house at Perth—his claims on the Treasury being thus effectually cancelled, and his opposition to his Sovereign chastised. This at least is the commentary suggested by Mr. Barbé. But, though he supplies sufficient motives for the King to rid himself of Gowrie, we are not so sure that he has, as he asserts, shown that Gowrie had on his side no motive for laying violent hands on James. Burton has justly observed that "Seizing upon or kidnapping a king had in that day become almost a constitutional method of effecting a change of ministry in Scotland." After Gowrie had placed himself in open opposition, and had marked himself out for the King's personal resentment, is it altogether unlikely that he should have meditated a coup d'État which would make him master of the situation? Nevertheless, we acknowledge that Mr. Barbé, though his arguments are sometimes overstrained, has in the main put forth a strong case against the credibility of the official narrative, and of the received interpretation of the Logan letters. One improbability, however, he does not grapple with. It must be strong evidence indeed which would make us believe that King James would, deliberately and of malice aforethought, imperil his own sacred person in such a touch-and-go undertaking as the murder of the two Ruthvens in their own house, among their own people. There is another theory which Mr. Barbé in one part of his work seems willing to accept—to wit, that all the mischief was brought about by a sudden and unreasonable panic on the part of King James, arising out of some sharp words that passed between him and Alexander Ruthven concerning the execution of the latter's father. This theory we will not discuss further than to remark that it is not easily to be reconciled with the view which the author at other times advocates, of a deep-laid and subtle plot for the destruction of the Ruthvens.

A CONCISE GRAMMAR OF THE DUTCH LANGUAGE.*

GRAMMARS are necessary evils. The new edition of Ahn's Dutch Grammar, being revised by real scholars, may be taken to diminish the evil as far as possible. Among its merits are a very short but clear and useful philological introduction by Dr. Hoogvliet (but we protest, for our part, that we have for some time known that Dutch is a real language), a much more correct account of the pronunciation than we have ever seen in a popular form before (some details, such as the modification of short i in a word like licht, are omitted, and of course an Englishman can realize the difficulties only by hearing native Dutch), a general sweeping away of the cumbrous rubbish still too common in elementary books, the separation of the theoretical part from the introductory practical part, and careful indication of differences between the written and the spoken languages—a point seldom attended to, and almost as important in Dutch as in English. It would be an improvement in the select passages for reading if the dates of the authors were given, and a little more literary information besides purely linguistic matter. It is well to give a specimen of Vosmaer's hexameters, but the reader should not be left to suppose that hexameters are as much naturalized in Dutch as in German. The only errors we have noted in the English are wineyard for vineyard; and "I am afraid we'll [for "we shall"] have rein." Altogether we can strongly commend the book. English readers may be warned, however, that while it is easy for any educated Englishman to learn to read Dutch, especially if he knows German and something of the history of his own language, command of the spoken language is quite another matter. The intonation is much nearer to English than to German, but still not easy to catch; the vowel-system is peculiar and difficult, and colloquial knowledge of German, though it may serve to eke out rudiments of Dutch in making oneself understood somehow, is rather a hindrance than a help both to correct speaking and to understanding the speech of natives.

MR. FROUDE ON THE WEST INDIES.†

MR. FROUDE'S book on the West Indies will be welcomed by West Indians if only because it directs English attention to their most unhappy case and desperate condition. Let us admit at once that its tone is wholesome, and its main conclusion indisputable—that if England neglects to take the case in hand promptly, and to deal with the condition in some energetic and thorough manner, there will shortly be no colonies in the West Indies—meaning communities of white citizens—to trouble about. This conclusion is not the less sound because, like his second title, and many of his historical passages, Mr. Froude has evidently prepared it in his usual manner, before he set out on his travels. The moral comes in when the story is scarce begun. We are introduced to the Bow of Ulysses, with all the appropriate classical furniture, even before Mr. Froude had started on his own Odyssey. The general condition of that renowned weapon, we are told, is unimpaired—which is remarkable, considering the amount of work it has done. "The worms have not eaten into the horn or the moths injured the string; but the owner of the house is away, and the suitors of Penelope-Britannia consume her substance," &c. &c. They cannot string the bow, of course, being degenerate Liberals and Separatists, but in due time the master of the house comes and "the cord is stretched once more upon the notch, singing to the touch of the finger with the sharp note of the swallow, and the arrows fly to their mark in the hearts of the pretenders, while Pallas Athene looks on approving from her coign of vantage." It is a very pretty apologue, though a little the worse for wear, and perhaps too flattering to the maker of the weapon. Mr. Froude, as one who has pulled a bow himself, will never be able to persuade us that any instrument can be left about so long unused without permanent injury. However this may be, it is encouraging to know that, even before he sets sail on his voyage of exploration, Mr. Froude's patriotic fervour had enabled him to solve the West Indian mystery. We have only to give up choosing men for Ministers by the fluency of their tongues, to put down the talkers and exalt the doers, and the empire is saved, together with Barbados (which Mr. Froude insists on spelling with an e in the ancient manner), and Grenada, and Tobago. Meanwhile, after a few preliminary metaphors and complimentary remarks about the present generation of Englishmen—who are said to be just now only sick because of "moulting"—the sea-rover embarks on his adventure. The sight of the Carribean Sea evokes memories of Drake and Morgan, Penn and Venables, and of Rodney's great victory of 1782, which broke our long spell of ill-luck and restored to us the mastery of the ocean. Mr. Froude speaks with a not excessive patriotic fervour. Unfortunately Kingsley had been before him, here and elsewhere, on the rhetorical path. In the description of scenery Mr. Froude was never great. It is in figures that his forte is rather than in landscape. At Barbados (in the derivation of which word Mr. Froude has a theory of his own that it came, not from the bearded trees along the shore, but from a race of hairy aboriginals now extinct—a theory insupportable in the face of the facts; first, that there never were any inhabitants there since the historic period; next, that the Caribs, of whom the primeval settlers must have been a branch, are noted for beardlessness) Mr. Froude, missing what one might suppose to be the characteristic features of that very remarkable spot, occupied himself in noting the extreme gracefulness of the negro women. It is interesting to know (it was after a "cock-tail," locally a "swizzle," a seductive drink compounded of rum and sugar and pounded ice and Angostura bitters) that in Mr. Froude's eyes their figures seemed so good, and they carried themselves so well, that they might serve sculptors for models. There is no accounting for tastes. Let us remember that Mr. Froude had just landed after a sea-voyage, followed by a drink which, as he observes, is "highly agreeable to the taste and effective for its immediate purpose." After a few hours at Barbados, he goes to Trinidad, passing by St. Vincent and Grenada, of which latter island he gives a picture somewhat confused; for in one page he dwells on its wretchedness and ruin—"not Babylon itself, with all its bats and owls, was more dreary and desolate"—and in the next we are told that, though the white settlers had "melted away," there was a flourishing community of free blacks, cultivating the soil they owned and growing coffee, cocoa, and oranges successfully. At Trinidad Mr. Froude is taken as usual to the Government House, and amidst his luxurious surroundings studies much at his ease the West Indian question. What he has to tell us of the actual condition of the island is, from personal observation, very little indeed, and that little cannot be trusted. He had not even enterprise enough to visit the Pitch Lake, the most curious and valuable of all Trinidad's possessions, on the ground that a black lake was not so beautiful as one of the usual colour. But he is profuse of prophecy and of exhortation, referring us for natural scenery to Kingsley, and perhaps wisely refraining from statistics. Returning to Barbados to spend a few days there, and then on, in the usual round, to St. Lucia, Dominica, and Jamaica, stopping for a couple of hours, without landing, at Martinique—two hours occupied in shaping the prediction that in the next war between England and France "Martinique might take possession of the rest of the Antilles with little difficulty"—always supposing that we did not take Martinique, as we have done three or four times already. Of Dominica, which is the fairest of all these island Edens and one of the most hopeless, Mr. Froude has much to say; for he seems to have landed and to have spent a few days there in actual exploration. We had been promised that we should hear of some real Caribs there; but we hear nothing, for the reason that there are none. There are no Caribs now extant in the West Indies, though in St. Vincent there are still to be found some who claim to be of Carib blood, a good deal mixed with African.

Mr. Froude has a running accompaniment through all his journeys—the accompaniment often overrunning and overpowering his theme—which, on the twentieth repetition of the same mournful note of desolation, tempered by the same shrill touch of admonition, and something very like scolding, becomes a little monotonous. The story of his travels is, in fact, being perpetually lost, like a track in the high woods, amid the luxuriance of the surrounding growth of rhetorical foliage. Even West Indians must tire a little of the eternal strain of woe, especially when no sufficient reason is shown why the sorrow should bear that emphasis. Mr. Froude's own observations and his pictures do not justify his very sweeping conclusions. His facts do not fit his theories. To cherish the West Indies is doubtless a national duty. To cherish the West Indies, however, or (taking the low commercial view of the matter) to be prepared to give a fair price for honest English-grown cane-sugar, and to eschew the vile product of foreign bounty and protected beet, because it was in these waters were formed the men who drove the Armada to wreck and ruin, we must feel is bringing the question to too fine a touch. Sometimes it is Mr. Froude himself who furnishes a weapon, quite wantonly, to those who would get rid of the whole question by getting rid of the islands. He does not say all that can be said in favour of their retention from the economical side. He trusts too much to the sentimental argument. The main burden of his song, taken up before he sees the West Indies and sustained after he has left them, is that the white individuals wither, while the nigger is more and more. That, we fear, is a song not wholly of melancholy in the ears of Gladstonian Radicals and English Home Rulers. That Rodney and his captains did not fight to win a paradise for African negroes may be true enough, but not truer than that Cromwell and William did not fight to make the Healys and the O'Briens masters of Ireland. The founders of the Empire, we shall be told, "builded better than they knew." Has not the negro in Jamaica attained to household suffrage? Is not Barbados free? If the West Indies are perishing, it is in strict accordance with the best of principles. Ils meurent guéris. Mr. Froude's own contributions to the burning nigger question would be of more value had he leaned less at starting upon such authorities as the author of Tom Cringle's Log. Disappointed at not meeting with the luxurious planter of fiction, the sybarite who passes his days drinking sangaree in a hammock and meditating practical jokes on his friends in the intervals of flogging his niggers, Mr. Froude seems to have fallen back upon his next resource, of going to live with the Governor. As in New Zealand he studied the problems of local finance and the native policy by spending his time with Sir George Grey in Kawau—which is as though a man were to shut himself up with Mr. Gladstone on Lundy Island to study the condition of Ireland—so in the West Indies Mr. Froude's way was to stay with the Governor or Colonial Secretary at his house. It is a shrewd device, especially in a country where there are no hotels, but one not always calculated to assist the process of honest inquiry. Governors of Crown Colonies are precisely they who think well of the colonies they govern. What is it to them that the West Indies are being abandoned by the whites? White or black, they are something to govern. It is impossible not to see that his hosts have influenced Mr. Froude to a very large extent—making him set down in his book facts which are contrary to his theories, and persuading him of things which, if true, rob his complaints of much of their sting and leave his remedies without point.

As to these remedies, where practicable, they bring no consolation. Before they can be tried—and if that is all the change proposed—it is tolerably certain that the present race of West Indian proprietors will cease to be. Mr. Froude's recommendation is that England should take over the government of the West Indies, to administer it after the East Indian manner, doing away with the farce of local representative assemblies. The change doubtless would be better for both blacks and whites, for England and for the colonies; but by itself it would do little to repair the commercial or even the political mischief which has been done by the last sixty years of misrule. To attempt to fit the machinery of free government upon any community of negroes, apart from the influence, the example, and the direction of white men, would be an experiment equal in wisdom to that of entrusting the inmates of the monkey-house in Regent's Park with the duty of their own control, apart from the keepers. Mr. Froude's testimony to the character of the negro race is precisely the same as that of every other impartial observer. It is even too flattering, through the causes to which we have alluded. Mr. Froude has evidently been taken to see the brightest side of negro life; and he talks about the "peasantry" of Jamaica and their unobtrusive efforts to raise themselves by their industry, as though he had never heard of their incurable vices of laziness, unthrift, and thieving. With what object are these pictures held up to us, if not to tempt us to acquiesce in the conclusion to which, there is reason to believe, British officialism has arrived at in regard to the West Indies—namely, that it is possible to administer these so-called colonies with a purely black population, with white Governors, Secretaries, and the usual administrative staff? From such a delusion as this Mr. Froude himself is free; but not less impracticable is the idea he cherishes of Europeanizing the West Indies. Why cannot we do in Jamaica, he asks, what the Spaniards have done in Cuba—people the island with our own race and colour?—We cannot understand any one who has lived in the Tropics putting such a question. The answer is that the climate forbids. Even if Englishmen were as Spaniards, Jamaica is not as New Zealand or Tasmania. The only European race who seem to be proof against the deteriorating and exterminating influences of climate is the Spanish. Something, indeed, may be done in the mountains and uplands of Jamaica by the planting of English colonies; but such an experiment would only complicate the nearer and more pressing issue, which is, what to do with the West Indies?—an issue which Mr. Froude, with the best intentions, has clouded with superfluous rhetoric. We are entreated not to commit the destinies of the West Indies to a people who will infallibly become even as the Haytians, preserving their good temper and the elegance of their forms, but practising Vaudoux and eating their babies. We are told that the white race is "melting away," while furnished with a very insufficient reason for their doing so, and no scheme at all for their rescue. Upon one subject, that of labour, Mr. Froude is most unsatisfactory. The Coolie question, in which lies, as many believe, the solution of the whole problem, economical as well as political, he entirely neglects or passes by carelessly. One service he has done, however, and for that, we suppose, we should be grateful—he will make people read about the West Indies.

THE FLEET.*

THE title of this book and the name of the compiler sufficiently inform us what we may expect. It is a book by a professional bookmaker, more ingenious at his business doubtless than some other practitioners whom it would be unkind to name, but still a bookmaker who differs from an author much as, to use a homely comparison, a "translator" differs from a shoemaker. The translator is one who fits old uppers to new soles, while the shoemaker creates, with no other material than the leather itself, the new boot complete; in the same way, the bookmaker scrapes together the old materials and dresses them up for the market newly grouped and freshly set. Just as Mr. Ashton's previously published works, Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne and the Dawn of the Nineteenth Century, were essentially "made" books—collocations of scraps, cuttings, and old materials taken from quarries accessible to every one—so The Fleet is similarly compiled and copied from books known to every dabbler in eighteenth-century literature. The extracts are, it is true, cut out and pasted together with considerable industry, some power of connecting things pleasantly, and the "appearance," as wine merchants say in their lists, of research. Now in the Social Life under Queen Anne there were many points of real interest quite new to the ordinary reader, even to one familiar with the Spectator and the Tatler; so that to any who had not studied the time and its manners the book offered many curious contrasts. Unfortunately about the Fleet River, even if we include its prison and its marriages, there seems absolutely nothing to say which has not been said over and over again in the many histories of London, not to speak of the novels and dramas which have used the rich mine of the prison and the marriages for their plots. There had not hitherto, to be sure, been produced any special monogram upon the Fleet River, and the compiler may plead that, in collecting together all that can be gathered concerning this brook, he has filled up a "long-felt" gap. Bookmakers have always a long-felt gap to fill or a long-felt want to supply. This particular gap, however, is one which, if perceived at all, is a gap which we would rather leave open. We mean that, though it is not without interest to trace topographically the course of the Fleet River, or that of the Tyburn, or even that of the Wall Brook, that has been done already and quite recently, and with sufficient fulness, in Mr. Loftie's History of London. The Fleet River, in its five-miles' course, flows past a great many places which belong in one way or the other to the history of this great city. They have, however, little or nothing to do with the Fleet, and have been fully and admirably described in Howitt's Northern Heights of London and a great many other books. It is the curse laid upon the bookmaker that there has always been somebody, and generally a great many people, on his ground before.

The River of Wells, Holebourne, or the Fleet, is formed by the union of two brooks, flowing respectively from the Highgate and the Hampstead Ponds, the former supplying the larger branch. The Highgate Ponds, indeed, make a chain of as pretty little lakelets as need be desired, especially those which lie within Caen Park, whose woods formed part of the old Middlesex Forest. These little streams flow down the valleys on either side of Parliament Hill—that great grassy mound facing the Tumulus, and itself crowned with an ancient earthwork. They unite due west of Primrose Hill, and flow in a single stream through Camden Town, nearly along the line of Great College Street, in front of Old St. Pancras Church between the two great railway-stations, and crossing the Euston Road just where the Metropolitan Railway station of King's Cross stands. The course of the stream then runs a little east of the Gray's Inn Road, through what is now a network of about the most dreary streets in the whole of London. Near its east bank stood Bagnigge Wells, and, lower down, Hockley in the Hole; it flows past the walls of Cold Bath Fields Prison, passes near Clerkenwell Green, and so under what is now the Holborn Viaduct into the Thames at Blackfriars Bridge. All this, from a topographical point of view, is very interesting and valuable. But it is not new. Everybody knows that there was once a stream rising in the Northern Heights, making its way along the valleys between the clay hills, and forming a natural moat to London Wall on its west side. The stream is now completely hidden and covered over; yet it once ran through green meadows, and formed a creek which, like Queenhithe, was a kind of port on the Thames. When these facts have been grasped one's curiosity about the river is satisfied. If one wished to learn more, Hone's books, which are accessible enough, contain drawings of the Fleet at various points, and there are in the eighteenth-century literature allusions in plenty to the disreputable people who used to live near its mouth in Turnmill Street, and to the filthy condition of the Fleet itself.

But so simple a thing as to know enough to understand contemporary allusions will never do. Interest must be created. The Fleet River must be connected with places which happen to have been near its banks when it had any banks; we must have a learned dissertation upon its name—a thing settled in a moment by reference to an Anglo-Saxon Dictionary without Mr. Ashton's imaginary necessity for appealing to Professor Skeat—it is as if, on the faith of Riddell's Latin Dictionary, we were to conclude that homo may be translated by man, and were then to appeal to the great Donaldson, or the great Kennedy, or the great Jebb, in corroboration of this hazardous and tentative conclusion; a quotation on the scouring of the Fleet, from Stow's Survey of London—"Ed. 1603, the last edition, which consequently has his best corrections"—"his best corrections" indicates a scholarly comparison of different editions on this weighty point—shows indeed a careful attention to even the smallest details of the subject. Again, since the Fleet River was also called the River of Wells, we are tempted to quote what FitzStephen—poor FitzStephen can never be left out—hath on the subject of London wells in general, though the connexion with the Fleet River is doubtful. This naturally brings us to the water supply of London and to a quotation in Law Latin, concerning which Mr. Ashton shows the ripeness of his own scholarship by the remark, original and brilliant, that a modern schoolboy would be birched for writing it—of course it is written in the well-known mediæval Law Latin, a language by itself. We then go quite out of our way to trace the course of the Westbourne. The ground thus cleared, we are at last free to follow the course of the Fleet itself from its source to its mouth.

Now from source to mouth there is not a single place which can be connected in any way with this poor little stream. That is to say, a river like the Thames, running past the ancient city of Oxford, the town of Reading, the castle of Windsor, the hanging woods of Cliefden, and a hundred other interesting places, appropriates them; they belong to the Thames; they would not have existed save for the river Thames. The poor little Fleet can appropriate nothing, because nothing exists in consequence of its stream—nothing, not so much as a water-mill; one might as well describe the course of the south gutter in Cheapside, with historical notices of the Standard, the Cross, the Tournaments, the stone gallery put up by Edward III., the Mercer's Hall, and Bow Church, as belonging to the gutter, and conferring lustre, glory, and honour upon that gutter. Mr. Ashton has set himself to glorify the gutter. Therefore, as an honest bookmaker, he follows his gutter from end to end and talks about the places beside its banks. First comes Caen Wood House, remarkable, among other things, for not being destroyed in the Gordon riots. Next, after two or three pictures, showing the stream fifty years ago, we come to Kentish Town, where there is some opportunity for the topographer; thence to St. Pancras Church—who can pass that venerable spot without consulting the pages of Cunningham?—and the Brill—Mr. Ashton seems to have missed a great chance with the Brill, about which there is really a great deal which might be said, bringing much glory to the Fleet River, which ran very near. At Battle Bridge, however, he makes up a little for the lost opportunity; there is the story, for instance, of how the place came to be called King's Cross; St. Chad's Well—it had nothing whatever to do with the Fleet River—but never mind, is good for four or five pages; then, as material is getting scanty, we must go out of our way and notice the White Conduit, Sadler's Wells and Bagnigge Wells. We have followed Mr. Ashton far enough down his river; the reader will by this time understand that our comparison of the bookmaker with the "translator" was not altogether out of place. When we add that even Bridewell Prison and Court are pressed into the service, with the edifying story of Mother Cresswell, it will be perceived that the book is, to use the recently imported Americanism, a collection of "chestnuts."

The Fleet Prison, of course, occupies a considerable portion of this volume. There is much parade of ancient and recondite learning, with references to "Mag. Rot. 9, Ric. 1, Rot. 20, Lond. & Midd." and the admirable and accessible works of Riley and Nicolas have been consulted. The chief result is that, whereas Cunningham says that the "prison was originally used for the reception of prisoners committed by the Council Chamber, then called the Court of the Star Chamber," Mr. Ashton proves that there was a prison here at least as early as the year 1197. The first prisoners of note mentioned by Mr. Ashton are Lord Russell and others in the year 1553. In the same year John Hooper and Miles Coverdale were brought to the prison. In the year 1600 Lord Grey of Wilton was committed to the Fleet for assaulting the Earl of Southampton. And as early as the year 1620 the prisoners began to complain of their Warden. The famous Bambridge had his predecessors, whom he rivalled but did not surpass, in Harris (1620), Tolley (1704), and Huggins (1723). After this the history of the prison is known to every one who has read anything. Mr. Ashton reprints the poem called "Humours of the Fleet," which is, however, well worth reprinting. A ground plan and drawing of the prison are also given.

The Fleet marriages have been so exhaustively treated by Mr. Burn in his History of Fleet Marriages, that the subject, like most of the others in this work, is indeed threadbare. They began, as we all know, with the practice of private marriages, with the view of saving the extravagant expense of public marriages. They were also, of course, very handy in cases of elopement and secret marriage. But the whole scandal seems to have originated in the desire to avoid fuss and expense. Some of the London churches claimed to be Peculiars, and, therefore, outside the law as regards banns and license. Among them were the Savoy, the Chapel of the Tower, and the Chapel of the Holy Trinity, Minories. An Act of William III. prohibited marriage in any prison chapel, and ordered the keeping of an accurate register. But it did not prevent the marriages by the Fleet Chaplains, some of whom achieved great distinction in their profession, especially the notorious Gaynam, or Gainham, "Bishop of Hele." A réchauffé of this old story will be found in Mr. Ashton's book. Enough has been said to show the character of the work. It contains a vast quantity of information, and must have cost the compiler a great deal of labour; those who like such compilations may desire to possess it. On the other hand, it is difficult to find anything in it that has not been told before in the many histories of London; while the connexion of the places touched upon with the Fleet River is in most cases purely imaginary. In no respect is the book to be compared with the author's Social Life under Queen Anne.

Now we have so kindly a feeling towards the author of the last-named work that we wish him a better and more original subject. There is one, for instance, ready to his hand in a stream which, we believe, has never been treated by any historian. We present it to him. It is the river Effra, which, as Mr. Ashton perhaps does not know, rises in the Dulwich Fields, and used to meander pleasantly through the fields of Brixton and Newington, and finally, if it did not lose itself in the marshes of Horselydown, fell into the Thames somewhere near London Bridge. There are many places beside its banks. The Marshalsea on the Effra, for instance, the Queen's Bench on the Effra, St. Saviour's on the Effra, Bermondsey on Effra, Cupid's Gardens—nay, we might go even further afield, and connect Peckham Rye, Goose Green, Champion Hill, the Swan of Stockwell, the Stockwell Ghost, Kennington Common (with three long chapters on the Chartists), Clapham Common and its Evangelical set, the Black Sea of Wandsworth—all with this remarkable and historical stream. There are other London streams which lend themselves as well to this treatment. Does not Wall Brook flow through the City? What more picturesque than a volume called "Wall Brook," containing a full account of all the places within a mile of its banks? Cunningham, Wilkinson, Walford furnish all the materials, from the Tower at one extremity to Baynard's Castle at the other. Is there not the river Lea, beside whose odorous waters the rose of June droops and dies in aromatic pain? The Lea, for instance, passes very near Waltham Abbey. What an opportunity for a chapter or two on King Harold! It does not exactly wash Tottenham, and after leaving Tottenham it greatly stands in need of washing; but it passes that town, and so opens the way to a history of Quakerism. Is there not, again, the Ravensbourne? Is there not the illustrious Wandle? We present these suggestions to Mr. Ashton, congratulating him at the same time on the abundance of subjects which lie waiting for the paste-pot and the scissors and the industrious fingers to stick the scraps together.

GREEN'S SHORT HISTORY REVISED.*

If the late Mr. Green's Short History of the English People was a mere school book, we should have nothing to say against the treatment to which it has been subjected in this revised edition. But it is, as we surely need not point out, very different from a book of that kind; indeed, for more than one reason it is certainly not well adapted for school use. At the same time, it is something far higher than any school book that has ever yet been written, and has fulfilled a nobler purpose than the cramming of boys and girls with historical facts and theories. It is a work of extraordinary originality and genius, it has awakened and gratified a desire among the English people to know its own story, and in spite of some faults in execution, it will have an abiding and not unimportant place in the history of the literature and intellectual development of our nation. Mrs. Green, the editor of the volume before us, ought, therefore, to have refrained from making any changes in the author's text. Unfortunately she has not thought as we do, and has altered it to a very considerable extent. This is beyond question a grave literary error. The duty of the editor of a work by a deceased author, which has any claim to abiding remembrance, is to add such notes and other apparatus as may seem necessary or useful, and at the same time to preserve the original text with religious care. Mrs. Green informs us in a graceful Introduction that she undertook this revision in fulfilment of the author's own wish; and certainly, if, after his death, his text was to be revised at all, he could not have left the task in better hands. No one can doubt her reverence for her late husband's work, or her intense desire to present it in the best form, and to add as far as possible to its value. She has discharged what she conceived to be her duty to the memory of the author and to the public with conscientious industry, and has generally worked in her corrections with considerable skill. At the same time, we cannot allow that all this affects the literary propriety of her undertaking. As it was impossible to know what changes Mr. Green would have wished made in his text, and as, though his life was spared for eight years after the first appearance of his book, he had not revised it, either because he did not think it worth while to do so, or because his publishers were of opinion that the right time for a revision had not come, what he had written should have been left untouched. As it is, many interpolations have been made in Mr. Green's text without any mark to distinguish them from his own work; many of his statements of fact, and even some of the opinions he expressed, have been modified or completely altered, and several alterations have been made in arrangement. In almost every case the book has been improved by this revision; in a very few passages we prefer the original reading. The character of the more important changes made in the text may to some extent be estimated by two examples that we have taken haphazard. In the chapter entitled "The Three Edwards" we find:—

Mr. Green.	Revised Edition.
The youth of Edward I. had given little promise of the high qualities which distinguished him as an English ruler. In his earlier manhood he had won general ill-will by the turbulence and disorder of his knightly train; his intrigues in the earlier part of the Barons' war had aroused the suspicions of the King; his faithlessness in the later time had brought about the fatal conflict between the Crown and Earl Simon which ended in the Earl's terrible overthrow.—P. 161.	The youth of Edward I. had already given promise of the high qualities which distinguished him as an English ruler. The passion for law, the instinct of good government, which were to make his reign so memorable in our history, had declared themselves from the first. He had sided with the Barons at the outset of their struggle with Henry; he had striven to keep his father true to the Provisions of Oxford. It was only when the Crown seemed falling into bondage that Edward passed to the royal side, and when the danger that he dreaded was over he returned to his older attitude.—P. 167.

Now, whatever may be thought of Mr. Green's view, there is not a word in this passage from his book that is not capable of defence. This is more than, in our opinion, can be said of his editor's correction. In our other example, while the liberty taken with the author's text appears to us equally objectionable, an amendment has certainly been made. The subject is the policy of James I. in 1604:—

Mr. Green.	Revised Edition.
The peace which he hastened to conclude with Spain was intended to free the Crown from its dependence on the Parliament; and had he fallen back after the close of the war on Elizabeth's policy of economy, he might yet have succeeded in his aim.—P. 469.	The peace which he hastened to conclude with Spain was necessary to establish the security of his throne by depriving the Catholics, who alone questioned his title, of foreign aid. With the same object of averting a Catholic rising, he relaxed the penal laws against Catholics and released recusants from payment of fines.—P. 491.

Changes like these and many others should certainly not have been made in a book so justly famous as Mr. Green's Short History after the death of the author.

To turn from this matter to the substantive value of this revised edition, there can be no doubt that, as far as accuracy and soundness of judgment are concerned, the Short History has gained considerably. A crowd of small and a few important errors that disfigured Mr. Green's work have been rectified. Some slips possibly may still be detected. We observe, for example, that the passage still stands in which Cuthbert is spoken of as belonging to the Celtic Church at the time of his death, though he had been chosen bishop at a Synod presided over by Archbishop Theodore and had been ordained by him. It is not our purpose, however, to try to pick holes in anything that is to be found in the original text. Mr. Green's Making of England has enabled his editor to modify some rather sweeping statements in the early pages of the volume, and to introduce some additions of which he would undoubtedly have approved. Full advantage has been taken of works that have appeared since the publication of his Short History, and constant reference has been made to his longer History of the English People. Bishop Stubbs, Canon Creighton, Mr. Gardiner, and other historical scholars have also given the editor much direct help; and the effects of their counsel are strongly marked in many passages. In the legitimate sphere of editorial work the book is improved by the addition in the margins of several dates and notes of contents, and by a new and excellent index in place of the remarkably poor one, certainly not of the author's own making, that is appended to the original edition.

a special value. The Descriptio Oxoniensis Academiæ of Nicholas Fitzherbert contains several interesting notices of University life at the end of the sixteenth century. The author, sometime a member of Exeter College, and later a seminary priest attached to the household of Cardinal Allen, dwells on the manifold excellences of his old University, insisting strongly, for example, on the healthfulness of its situation—a point which when he wrote could scarcely have been a more appropriate subject for boasting than it is now. The undergraduates ordered themselves reverently to their betters, and were strictly governed—"his autem solis ne collegio quidem exire, nisi adscito socio, permittitur." Every one rose at five, and went to morning chapel; and, though discipline was somewhat laxer in the Halls than in the Colleges, the gates of all alike were shut at eight in winter and nine in summer, and, if any one was caught in the streets by the Proctors after those hours, no excuse could save him from imprisonment. In all the best Colleges failure in the Disputations for the B.A. degree, which are spoken of as an awful ordeal ("terribile hoc quidem theatrum est respondenti"), entailed expulsion. The students came from the public schools, of which the most famous were Winchester, Eton, Durham, and London, and the training they received at Oxford fitted them for the highest offices in Church and State. Leonard Hutten's Antiquities of Oxford, which hardly appears in its right place in a volume entitled Elizabethan Oxford, seeing that it was written after 1625, gives us, along with a good deal of rubbish, a kind of itinerary of the city. Although Wood avers that Hutten was "not meanly versed in the histories of our own nation," we should not have gathered as much from his Dissertation; for, among other anachronisms, he informs his readers that the Ethelred who is responsible for the Danish massacre of 1002 was the elder brother of Alfred. These tracts are followed by a number of pieces relating to the two visits of Queen Elizabeth. When she came to Oxford in 1566 she was entertained with two Latin plays, one of which was acted on Sunday evening, and with a performance of Palamon and Arcyte, which lasted through two evenings, and was a great success. Besides the plays, the University provided her with abundance of Disputations, which, according to custom, were held in St. Mary's Church. Mr. Leeche, of Merton, ably maintained the thesis that an elective monarchy was to be preferred to hereditary succession, and others in the Divinity Disputations argued that it was lawful to take arms against a wicked prince. In both these cases, however, the pleadings of those who advanced these theories were, of course, understood not to represent the speakers' own opinions, and there was no risk that a decision would be given that would displease the royal visitor. Among the disputants was Edmund Campion, who was Proctor two years later, and was put to death in 1581. After spending four afternoons listening to Disputations, the Queen found herself disinclined to attend a sermon on the Friday morning "by reason of great pains-taking and watching." She seems, however, to have enjoyed the debates; indeed, she was not apt to allow herself to be bored without remonstrance, and when on her second visit she supposed that the Public Orator, who had been making a tedious speech, was being invited to proceed, she interposed with the crushing remark that "he had bene too long already."

The other two volumes of the Society's publications now before us—the ninth volume has yet to appear—continue the Register of the University from 1571, the year to which Mr. Boase brought down his Degree lists, to 1622, when the Matriculation records assume a new and fuller form. In the hands of the present editor, the Rev. Andrew Clark, the Register is no mere transcript. He divides his work on the period he has taken in hand into three parts, giving a volume to each. His first part begins with an account of the various documents on which he bases his lists, the Subscription Books, the Registers of Convocation and Congregation, and the like. Next we have a full exposition of all that was required of a student on entering the University, and of the Degree system, as it was then carried out, illustrated by a large number of extracts from the Archives. All the mysteries of Disputations, Supplication, Determination, Austin and Quodlibet Exercises, Inception, and more besides, are clearly explained, and a great deal of interesting matter bearing on the social life of the period may be gathered from the causes for which Dispensations were granted from the performance of the various ceremonies prescribed by the Statutes. Many observances still, or until lately, in use which have long become meaningless are shown to be relics of more dignified proceedings. The "Circuitus et Visitatio," or the calls formerly paid by each student when about to take his degree on the Vice-Chancellor and the Proctors to request them to summon a Congregation in which he might be presented, itself a survival of the custom which gave the regent-masters a last chance of objecting to the candidate, still survives in the undignified form of entering the student's name in a book at the Vice-Chancellor's house the evening before his Degree-day, a ceremony now sometimes performed through the medium of a college servant. The "Circuitus" of a Grand-compounder, who, in virtue of being able "bona fide expendere quadraginta libras de proprio ad terminum vitæ suæ extra Universitatem," was called upon to pay special fees, was a solemn show; he called on "the Vice-Chancellor, who accompanied him to the Senior Proctor's; the Vice-Chancellor and Senior Proctor then accompanied him to the Junior Proctor's, and lastly all three accompanied him back to his college." The next day all his college escorted him to the Congregation House, a trumpet was blown before him, and he was presented in a red gown. In process of time all these ceremonies by which the University had long shown its deep sense of the dignity of wealth dropped out of use, but not so the extra fees, which were paid until, in 1853, Mr. Salisbury Baxendale, having paid his fees as a Grand-compounder, insisted, greatly to the annoyance of the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors, that they should perform their part of the bargain. He must have scored freely on the occasion. Many supplementary lists are given of University officers and servants, of those following trades controlled by the University, of Incorporations, and of other matters which bring the life and procedure of the place more clearly before the mind than any mere description. Among these the list of Admissions to the Bodleian Library is specially interesting. The second part of Mr. Clark's work begins with a short list of students licensed to beg between 1551 and 1573; nearly half of them have unmistakably Welsh names. Then come lists of students residing in the town in 1562, and of the inmates of the Colleges and Halls at various dates from 1563 to 1583, and lastly the entries of the Matriculation Registers, and of the Subscription Books from 1581, the date at which subscription began to be required. A series of analytical tables at the end of the volume sets out the number of matriculations, degrees, and licences of each year during the period in hand, the matriculations of each college, the social grades of the students, and the counties from which they came. The third part of the Register containing the list of Degrees granted from 1571 to 1625 will be given in Mr. Clark's next volume. Both he and the Oxford Historical Society are to be congratulated on the admirable manner in which he has performed so much of his laborious task.

FIRST NIGHTS.*

A CERTAIN number of the ephemerides which M. Albert Soubies has grouped together in Une Première par Jour have appeared in Le Soir; the rest are altogether new. There are 366 in all, and not one but is either instructive or amusing, or both. M. Soubies writes neatly and with point, is careful to confess his authorities, and has done his best to be novel and exact at once. The result is that everybody who is interested in the story of the French stage will hasten to get his book. His scheme includes the old repertory as well as the new—Molière and Corneille with Offenbach and Léon Laya, Regnard and Voltaire and Marivaux with Dumas and Augier and Sardou, Monsigny and Rameau with Meyerbeer and Clapisson, the Théâtre-Italien as well as the Comédie-Française, the Académie de Musique with the Odéon, the Porte Saint-Martin and the Théâtre-Historique with the Opéra-Comique and the Bouffes-Parisiens, the Hôtel de Bourgogne and the Théâtre du Petit-Bourbon with the Gymnase, the Palais-Royal, and the Variétés; so that he may fairly be said to give us the cream of over two centuries of theatrical history and achievement. The man who should go and do likewise for the stage of Garrick and Macready would command the gratitude, we should think, of a very considerable public.

M. Soubies, as we have said, is not content to repeat stale news; and for an account of such premières as (for example) those of Hernani and Antony we must look elsewhere. Again, his memoranda are of many sorts, and relate to many interests. We open his book at random, and before us, under date of the 28th of May, 1660, is the story of the sub-title of Sganarelle, which, as everybody knows, is a trifle too Molieristic for the ears of soft society. We learn that even under Louis XIV. the word was modestly replaced "par un C suivi de trois étoiles," and that towards the end of the seventeenth century it ceased to be respectable; that in the eighteenth century its reputation was so bad that the original sub-title was replaced by that of Les Fausses Alarmes; that in 1802 Les Fausses Alarmes made way for Le Mari qui se Croit Trompé, and the work itself was purged of "tout ce qui pouvait blesser la délicatesse de nos caillettes"; and that at present, forty years or so after "le dernier de M. Paul de Kock," when La Terre is a popular book, and the more filthily men write the greater artists they are held to be, the piece is simply announced as Sganarelle, without any sub-title at all. Two days later, under date of the 30th of May, 1833, the première at the Opéra of Alfred de Vigny's Quitte pour la Peur, our author transcribes the programme of the performance given that night for the benefit of Mme. Dorval. It comprehended (1) the first act of the Pré aux Clercs, with Jenny Colon as the Isabelle; (2) the second act of the Sylphide, danced by Duvernay; (3) the fourth act of Pradon's Phèdre—"joué en costumes du temps"—with Mirecourt and Dorval in the chief parts; (4) the fourth act of the Phèdre of Racine, with old Duchesnois as the heroine; and (5) the first performance of Quitte pour la Peur, played by Bocage, Provost, Mlle. Dupont, and the bénéficiaire. Some months earlier in the year (6th of January, 1846) occurred the production of Ernani; and M. Soubies seizes the opportunity to tell us all about the several libretti which have been fashioned out of Hugo's plays. Hernani, it appears, has been set to music four times—by Bellini, Gabussi, Verdi, and Mazzucato. There are three settings of Marion Delorme—those of Bottesini, Pedrotti, and Ponchielli, to wit—and of Le Roi s'Amuse but one—the Rigoletto of Giuseppe Verdi. Donizetti's

* Une Première par Jour. Par Albert Soubies. Paris: Dupret. London: Hachette.

Lucrezia Borgia, like Verdi's Rigoletto, has made competition impossible; but no less than thirteen musicians, greatly daring, have tried their hands at Notre-Dame de Paris, from Mlle. Louise Bertin, who got her libretto from Victor Hugo himself, and whose score is said to have been touched up by Berlioz (1836), to Mr. Goring Thomas. There are six settings of Ruy Blas, to say nothing of the one which Mendelssohn began but did not finish; while—for obvious reasons—of Les Burgraves there is only one, the work of Matteo Salvi, produced at Milan in 1845. "Si Victor Hugo," says our author, "n'aimait pas la musique, on ne peut pas dire que les musiciens n'aiment pas Victor Hugo." With regard to Lucrezia Borgia (the 27th of October, 1840), he reminds his readers that in 1845, Hugo having brought and won an action against Donizetti and Romani, it was produced as La Rinegata, on which occasion Lucrezia and Gennaro and Maffio Orsini were attired as Turks! The libretto, he goes on to note, was written for Mercadante; but as that master was ill and could not work, Donizetti took his contract with La Scala off his hands, and the music was begun and finished within a month, just as that of Don Pasquale was produced in nine days.

M. Soubies has the knack of making even his catalogues of interest. Thus, in dealing with Crébillon's Catilina (20th December, 1748), he takes occasion to remark that the heroes of French tragedy, who are reputed talkative to excess, are not nearly so fluent as the heroes of French comedy. In the comic repertory the longest part is that of Ésope in Ésope à la Cour, which is composed of full 1,220 verses; while Crébillon's Catilina, the wordiest creature in all tragedy, utters less than 900. More than that, in the comic repertory, there are eleven parts of more than 700 verses long; while in the tragic that of Catilina is the only one in which there are so many. The Ariane of Thomas Corneille is delivered in the course of five acts of 700 verses all but four; Crébillon's Atrée of 671; Corneille's Pulchérie and the Mithridate of Racine of 643 and 595 respectively; Voltaire's Orosmane of 590, his Catilina (Rome Sauvée) of 558, his Vendôme (Adélaïde Duguesclin) of 550; and Corneille's astonishing Cinna of 532. In the least of these there is a great deal of vocalization. Rotrou is less excessive than his successors; he has accomplished the feat of summing-up and containing a hero in the compass of 92 alexandrines. The part (it is interesting to reflect) is no longer in the repertory. In comedy the noblest hero after Boursault's Ésope is Molière's Mascarille (L'Étourdi), who runs to over 1,030 verses, some 200 of which are disposed of in the famous monologue—the monologue which M. Coquelin alone among living men is able to deliver as it deserves. Molière, who was nothing if not intelligent, was not slow to profit by the experience he acquired in playing Mascarille. His next longest part—the Arnolphe of the École des Femmes—is 135 alexandrines shorter; while he has packed his Alceste into 770, or so, his Sganarelle (Le Festin de Pierre) into 685 lines, and his Sosie (Amphitryon) into as few as 592. It would be interesting to compare his estimate of his own powers with that which Shakspeare had formed of the physical capacity of Burbage, and Lowin, and Taylor—to contrast the volume of Hamlet with that of Alceste, Rosalind's lengths with Sganarelle's, and Mascarille's with King Lear's. If the Shakspeare Society would but cease from troubling itself as to the identity of "Mr. W. H.," and developing the "moral idea" of (say) Joan of Arc and Dromio of Ephesus, here were a task with which its intellectuals might concern themselves not unprofitably.

In his note on the première of Thérèse Raquin, M. Soubies discovers and points out an odd anticipation of M. Zola in a certain passage from the pen of so convinced a romantique as M. Alphonse Karr. With regard to the drama of Alfred de Musset, he is able to assure us, inter alia, that the mortifying and impossible stage dénouement of Fantasio is the work of the poet's brother, and that the most successful of all his essays in playmaking is Il faut qu'une Porte soit Ouverte ou Fermée, which, produced in 1848, had been honoured, at the beginning of 1887, with as many as 342 performances. In dealing with Amy Robsart (13th of February, 1828), he reminds us that the manuscript of that unhappy work—"tout entier de la main du maître"—is in existence, and that in no great while we shall be able to see for ourselves the reasons why it failed of its effect, and the revival of the drama was left to the poet of Henri Trois et sa Cour. Little or nothing is known in these latitudes of Rossini's Le Comte Ory. M. Soubies is able to inform us that the scenery with which it was produced was old, with the exception of "un petit ermitage neuf," which was appraised at a hundred and twenty francs; and that the libretto was passed by the censor on condition that the hermit's attire "n'aurait pas de capuchon ni aucun caractère ecclésiastique," and that four lines should be deleted from a lyric by the hero. The devilish quatrain ran thus:—

Que les Destins prospères
Accueillent vos prières!
Que le bonheur, mes frères,
Soit toujours avec vous!

The date was 1828; the censor's name was Coupart; as to the motives which inspired this tremendous cut, not even M. Soubies can enlighten us. He is more explicit in respect of Campra's Tancrède (7th November, 1702), which kept its place in the repertory for more than half a century, and contains the first part ever written for a contralto, which part was created by the illustrious Mlle. Maupin. His note on the Armide of Gluck is simply disheartening. It was produced in 1777 (23rd September), and the last that was heard of it was sixty years after, when the second act was played for the farewell appearance of Nourrit, who sang Rinaldo to the Armida of Mme. Dorus-Gras. There was some talk of reviving it in 1860; but there were none to sing the parts, and it was put aside in favour of the master's Alceste. In 1863 M. Carvalho was minded to bring it out at the Théâtre Lyrique, with Mme. Charton-Demeur as the heroine; but the project came to nothing. In 1870 M. Émile Perrin made arrangements for its revival at the Académie de Musique; and the Franco-Prussian war came on, and once again there was no more Armide. M. Soubies reminds his public that in Mlle. Gabrielle Krauss the Académie possesses an artist capable of the very greatest work, and wonders that no manager has yet dared to do his duty, and entrust her with the task "de personnifier la sublime héroïne de Gluck." His astonishment is natural enough; but we fear that he is not nearly at the end of it."

THE CHAMELEON.*

MR. DUNPHIE'S latest volume of essays certainly justifies its happily chosen title. The reader is hurried along from an essay on "the duty and delight of being in debt" to disquisitions on many-coloured matters, as they are described in the title-page. Mr. Dunphie delights to discourse in paradoxes which are sometimes highly amusing, and never become tedious, as they are apt to do when misused by unskilful hands. Mr. Marion Crawford, in a recent novel, delivered himself oracularly on this subject, and while giving a receipt for the making of paradox, condemned its use as a vicious practice. Possibly Mr. Crawford will find a number of solemn persons who agree with him; but the happier half of humanity, though they may do well to leave his receipt alone, will probably remain unconverted. However this may be, when Mr. Dunphie assures us in the first of his charming essays that "it is the pleasing extravagance of purchasing what he does not want that distinguishes the man of taste and spirit from the tame dullard," we confess that any lingering doubts that remained in our mind after considering Mr. Crawford's view are entirely dispelled. The remark we have just quoted is only one out of many in the book in which something of the Thackeray ring may be detected—Thackeray at his light moments bien entendu; for Mr. Dunphie, though he can be serious, and very pleasantly serious, never touches the tragic note. What, again, could be better than this?—"Failure has its priceless pleasures as well as its trivial penalties, and among the saddest of human tribulations are the sorrows of success"—a sentence which is the text, so to speak, of one of the most effective essays in the volume. It would, indeed, be easy to fill several columns with extracts from the good things in the book, and yet leave it unexhausted. If the thought be not always new, the expression of it is almost invariably so; and the graceful scholarship and wide reading displayed on almost every page seem to belong to the volume in a very peculiar sense, for they are never by any chance obtruded. Mr. Dunphie writes—or, perhaps, we may say "talks," for in reading it is difficult at times to believe that we are not listening to a good talker—well too, on pictures, the drama, and kindred subjects. His remarks in the essay entitled "Winter by the Sea-side" really sum up everything that need be said on the question of so-called "naturalism" in art. He disposes of the nonsense talked by some of the followers of this school with the remark that "a servile imitator of the merely external forms of things is no true painter." At the same time he has very real admiration for the late Cecil Lawson, who, he thinks, was endowed with gifts kindred to those of Turner. Mr. Dunphie's protest against certain departures from the traditional presentation of "Puss-in-Boots," and other heroes of the nursery, that have been made in the children's illustrated books of late years, will be cordially appreciated by many persons who are not even yet middle-aged. It is almost pleasant to be able to find fault with Mr. Dunphie, for the occasions when he can be caught tripping are rare. We therefore protest against the impression that is conveyed by a statement on p. 211 of this volume—namely, that the so-called "Æsthetes" can be justly compared to the Euphuists, and that Sir Piercie Shafton can be regarded as a fair representative of the latter. Surely it was decided long ago that the great Sir Walter never did a worse piece of work than when he drew Sir Piercie Shafton, and claimed that he had drawn him in historical chalk. We believe Sir Walter himself was the first person to point out the mistake. We must not omit to call attention to the pleasant verses that occur, here and there, throughout the volume; for Mr. Dunphie sings, whenever he is minded to do so, with apparently equal facility in English and Latin. The lines addressed "Ad Frondatorem Insignem," in which Mr. Gladstone is thus adjured—

Læte te mitem, Lapis oh precamur
Arbori præbe; validam bipennem
Siste, Lignator, foliisque parcas, are particularly happy. The end of good books generally seems to come too soon, and we take leave of Mr. Dunphie with a feeling of regret, comparable to that aroused by seeing a friend off from a railway-station.
O Gulielme!—

NO race of men is more interesting to the historical inquirer than the dark people of Australia. Much has been written about them, and in what was written there have been, and will continue to be, many inaccuracies. It is not easy, as Mr. Curr shows in The Australian Race, for white questioners to get the truth out of black—or very dark copper-coloured—companions. The difficulty of understanding the language has, apparently, twice, at least, caused native phrases meaning "I don't know" to be mistaken for proper names. Again, the native mind is easily fatigued, the native humourist loves "a sell," he often does not at all understand the meaning of his own customs; and, finally, if Mr. Curr is right, some Europeans have deliberately suppressed facts which make against a favourite hypothesis. Mr. Fison, one of the authors of Kamilaroi and Kurnai, has this charge brought against him by Mr. Curr (i. 142). About certain tables of words for human relationships Mr. Curr says "that they contain terms so adverse to his argument he has, more suo, kept to himself." About this Mr. Fison will probably have something to reply. On the whole, however, it is plain enough that we can scarcely dogmatize yet about the Australians.

The interest of the race lies in its isolation, its appearance of antiquity, and its extremely backward state of civilization. Chiefless, houseless, without any rudiments of agriculture, without a trace of an art so common as pottery, and without the bow, the Australians display no signs of having ever been in a higher condition. If they are degenerate, it was not in their present home that they fell from culture. The soil, as far as it has been excavated, gives no relics of architecture, metal-work, nor pottery. Mr. Herbert Spencer's theory that the Australians were once more civilized than Europeans found them rests on their amazingly complicated marriage laws. These, as Mr. Gideon Scott Lang said, "might puzzle a mathematician," and they do still puzzle the most careful inquirers. But it does not follow that the Australians were more polite when the laws were first evolved and enforced. The very complexity (as in a machine) proves their antiquity; the marriage laws of African and American races appear like improvements, by simplification, of such laws as existed in Australia. Nor was a centralized police needed to enforce the laws. Mr. Curr very clearly shows the stringent sanction of tribal law in Australia even now. It is not force; it is superstition, and dread of sorcery.

We may then, with some confidence, regard the Australians as a "nature-folk," in the German sense. And, when we speak of the Australians, we mean the people as they were, and in some remote places still are, before rifles, gin, small-pox, and catechism corrupted and ruined their customs, character, and tribal constitution. On the topic of their manners, belief, and religion Mr. Curr writes like a man of clear common sense and natural acuteness, but also like one who has been somewhat serus studiorum. Only of late has he "taken up" ethnology, and we fancy that his philological studies have not been those of a Bleek or a Codrington. As a consequence his arguments on a topic so remote as the origin of the Australians, and their connexion with the negroes of Africa, do not win our assent. Mr. Curr's belief that the Australians, in fact, came from Africa, picking up on the way a strain of non-negro blood, is chiefly based on resemblances of words in African and Australian speech and on resemblances in customs. One need be no philologist to have learned that close resemblances in the words of different languages is not a proof of connexion. Besides, Mr. Curr is obliged to suppose that many sounds in African not found in Australian had not been evolved before the Australian migration. Resemblances in grammar, and in that kind of double duty by which a word may mean e.g. both "wood" and "a spear," are common even in Greek. Grammatical usages, too, are found analogous in languages which hardly the wildest theorist would regard as originally related or connected. As to customs, Africans and Australians have many and disgusting institutions in common; but so have the peoples of America and Asia. Man has sought out many inventions; but the notion that these must have been discovered in one place and transmitted across the whole world will soon be abandoned, though it still informs Gruppe's large new work on Greek Religion. Mr. Curr will probably reply that his proof is cumulative, that such a mass of common institutions, and so many common words, cannot have been separately evolved. As for the words, we leave them to the philologists. As for the customs, unless Mr. Curr thinks that they spread not only to Australia but to America and Polynesia from Africa, we cannot value his argument. Of course we cannot prove a negative.

> We can but say it may be so!
> To every theory presented.

But, where archaic customs are so similar from Terra del Fuego to the New Hebrides, and when they are so exactly what ignorant, and improvident, and fanciful, and cruel men would evolve anywhere, we can hardly be persuaded that, even if they all arose in one original centre, that centre is Africa, or India, or Babylon, or Egypt, as theorists may prefer.

Too much space has been given, perhaps, to Mr. Curr's theory. Facts are what he excels in—ethnological facts; and in the many vocabularies which he has collected, and which certainly seem to demonstrate that all the native tongues of the Australian continent are most closely connected, and probably derived from one original type. As to customs, Mr. Curr has had much acquaintance with the Blacks. He thinks that many of Mr. Brough Smyth's descriptions are erroneous; that Sir George Grey is out in his account of the blood-feud, and its effects within the family; that Mr. Dawson's theory of chiefs among the Blacks is also mistaken. We are inclined to think that he himself underrates the amount of religion among the Blacks. To Mr. Curr's mind the native expressions of what we may call Natural Religion, a sort of moral theism, are adaptations of what they have learned from the whites. "That nothing of the nature of worship, prayer, or sacrifice, has been observed is certain," he writes. On the other hand, the late Mr. G. S. Lang had an anecdote of a party of whites who set out to surprise a Black camp in the small hours. They were just within range when dawn appeared, and, to their surprise, the Blacks came out of their shelters, and chanted a hymn (as it seemed) so impressively that the Europeans, touched by the solemn and pathetic sounds and appearance of adoration, peacefully withdrew. The narrator had no point to make, and no intention of proving anything by this anecdote of a savage Veda, so to speak. In The Aboriginal Natives of New South Wales (1846) a Colonial magistrate credits them with a theism rudely expressed, which we are the more inclined to accept, as it corresponds with other accounts from backward peoples, such as Sproat's description of Aht beliefs. Of course we cannot expect the statements of races so low to be free from a crude mythical element. But, given the belief that a power not merely human made things, that he favours morality, that dead men go to him, and we have the essentials of religion, however much nonsense may be added. Meyer, Taplin, Armstrong, Gason, and others, have found this amount of belief among various tribes, and we are disinclined to believe it to be a native adaptation of European teaching. Indeed, it is rather touching to find that the aborigines known to Mr. Dawson never dreaded Pirnmeheal till they learned to fear him from the missionaries. "They are now afraid of a being who never did any harm to their forefathers." (Australian Aborigines, p. 49. Melbourne: 1881.) Are we to believe that the Blacks got their belief in seeing your own Doppelganger from Europe? (op. cit. p. 51). These ideas, whether "psychical" or religious, do not spread so rapidly. Is the Taru wirring, the path of the spirits of the dead, derived from Odyssey, xxiv. 10:—

There is a deal of human nature in man, which declares itself in savage religion and custom, and proves to resemble greatly the beliefs of cultivated peoples. Moreover, their beliefs are not to be got at by asking questions, but by observing rites and customs and by overhearing chance remarks. Mr. Curr "made inquiries on the subject of their beliefs," and came to the conclusion that the Europeans who think the Blacks have some knowledge of God, prayer, and future rewards and punishments are deceived. That is certainly not the conclusion to which a considerable amount of oral and printed evidence leads us. But, where Mr. Curr only sees a belief in a primæval "strong or gigantic Black fellow," who "in some marvellous way created what we now see," we find a religious belief, anthropomorphic indeed (and there are theriomorphic statements also), but not much more anthropomorphic than Mr. Matthew Arnold's "magnified non-natural man." When it is added that the strong creative Black fellow does not die, and that the dead go to him, and that he "makes for righteousness," as the Blacks understand it, surely we have the elements of religion.

Mr. Curr's version of the Nature Myths of the Blacks, the hasty figments by which they account to themselves for phenomena, is very valuable. So is his thorough and intelligent description of the tribes and their "Amphictyonies," as we may call them (i. 63). That these non-agricultural peoples have personal property in land (i. 64) will astonish and disgust many a modern theorist. That they deliberately limit population, not by abortion and child murder only, but by "The Terrible Rite," may interest Malthusians, especially as in other respects they are so improvident that, though exposed to night attacks, they never post sentinels. Mr. Curr does not believe that exogamy is intended to avoid the evils of breeding in and in—Sir John Lubbock's theory—and we agree with him. Probably, though Mr. Curr does not say so, exogamy is only one feature of the regular Totem-taboo, the origin of which it is vain to guess about. Mr. Curr appears to destroy Mr. Fison's communal marriage theory and the legend of the man "with a thousand miles of wives." But the marriage laws of Australia are now in such a muddle, thanks, partly, to the lack of an accepted terminology, that we dare not approach the subject. Clan, gens, phratry, caste, class, family, tribe, Totem-kin are at present words tossed about without a conscience or an aim. We need a definite terminology before the matter can be elucidated. Mr. Curr's book will prove one of the most useful in the library of the student of humanity. By the way, if Mr. Curr is right, if the Blacks have no chiefs, what humbugs the gentry who signed the conveyance of land to John Batman must have been (Dawson, p. 112). Mr. Curr's account of Queensland savagery may still make an Englishman blush. The Spaniards in the West Indies, the Americans among the Red Men did nothing worse, few things as bad, as what we are doing every day, by Mr. Curr's account, in Queensland:—

> The massacre concluded, the English officer gives over the women to satisfy the lust of his "boys" as he calls the troopers. . . . To prevent

* The Australian Race: its Origin, Languages, Customs, Place of Landing. By Edward M. Curr. Melbourne: Government Press.

Such is English civilization in Queensland.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THERE is always in France (where they do not begin the publication of "Christmas" literature in August) a dropping fire of Christmas books well into the New Year; and one of these is before us in M. Louis Enault's Ville et village (1). The text of Auerbach's well-known book needs no comment, except that M. Enault seems to have rendered it well. M. Rothschild has presented the version in a stately quarto, adorned with red initial letters and abundant engravings, some in the text, more full-page. Books of this kind lend themselves particularly well to such illustration, because there is room for plenty of landscape and genre, which, if not the best, is certainly the easiest, kind of book illustration, and no need for much figure-drawing or representation of action, which, if not the worst kind, is certainly the hardest. The book quite deserves a place among the étrennes of the year, though it reached us too late to be classed with them.

M. Edmond Cotteau (2) is one of the most diligent, and not one of the least deserving, workers of the French system of "missions gratuites," which seems so odd to Englishmen. You want to travel, and you apply to a Minister for a "mission gratuite" to examine and report on the Samoyede system of roasting eggs or the various methods of tying bootlaces among the Yomud Turkomans. It does the Government no harm; but what good it does you is not so clear. Occasionally, no doubt, the gratuitous missionary gets a gratuitous lift in a transport or a frigate, and now and then a foreign Government kindly gives him some extra facilities or assistance; but all this does not seem to "run to much." However, it no doubt suits a Frenchman to represent his nation, just as it suits an Englishman to represent nothing but himself; and the two things are first principles, hardly worth discussion. M. Cotteau's book on the Krakatoa eruption, Java, Australia, Tahiti, and one or two other things and places, is exceedingly readable, if not quite so interesting as his Siberian tour. We had hoped on opening the volume that he was going to take us to the Marquesas, the least visited of all French possessions, but he keeps to a more beaten track. The book is well illustrated, like all M. Hachette's travel-books; but the engraving of Tahitian natives certainly does not justify the views on that subject given by romantic travellers from the days of Cook and Bougainville to those of The Earl and the Doctor and Le Mariage de Loti.

We have given up attempting to count the volumes of Admiral Jurien de la Gravière's naval history (3). Here are two more, the first dealing with the loss of Cyprus, the second with that rather tardy attempt at revenge the capital event of which was the Battle of Lepanto. Perhaps the siege of Famagusta was not less glorious than the victory of Lepanto, but it was less fortunate.

It was perhaps hardly necessary for M. de Moüy, in the preface to the third edition of his Don Carlos (4), to dwell so much on the coincidence of his original work on it with that of M. Gachard; but it was, if not necessary, natural. We do not doubt that the Belgian savant and the French diplomatist worked quite independently five-and-twenty years ago; and the quarter of a century which has passed has not weakened the results at which they both arrived. Those results, it may be just necessary to say, were that not only poetry, but history, had been all wrong about Don Carlos, and that he was simply a dangerous lunatic, whom his father did not murder, and whom he was forced to put under the restraint during which the Prince died. From the excessive view in the new direction, that Carlos was not only a madman but a brutal and disgusting young ruffian, M. de Moüy holds aloof, and indeed there is little proof of it.

The good and great Gyp is as good and as great as ever in Les séducteurs (5). A vein not new in her, but less used than some others, of literary parody is worked here for the benefit of the luckless M. Ohnet, the book opening with a charming new play by him, "quite screeching fun" (as youth would remark), in parts, while at the end there is a ruthless dissection of the knowledge of sport and society shown in Le Maître de Forges. "Sans le Savoir," telling how a very mondaine lady secured a whole department, or at least the functionaries thereof, by means not only honest, but almost unintentional, is also great fun, and might serve as reading exercise for a girls' school. Of the pieces which answer directly to the title not so much can be said, though there is yet another of the innocent class, "Le malin," which is political. But the way in which Mme. de Flirt disappoints both inexperienced youth and professional lady-killing is wholly beautiful. "Celui que la campagne inspire" is a little, very little, rowdy; but for Gyp, "tout entière à sa proie attachée," the reader must go to "Le débutant."

Les Lettres et les Arts, or Art and Letters (Boussod, Valadon, & Co.), still falls to our lot. The February number is a somewhat quieter one than the last, M. Jules Simon's account of his experiences at the Ecole Normale forty years ago being followed by a short purely descriptive piece of M. de Maupassant's, a story by Théophile Gautier—the son, alas! though we do not mean to be rude—a paper on Mr. Whistler, and a "Mme. Judic at Home." The best illustrations are reproductions of some of Mr. Whistler's best portraits, his mother, Lady Archibald Campbell, &c.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IN the essays reprinted from many sources that make up Professor Dowden's Transcripts and Studies (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) there is sufficient kinship of style and subject to render their collection desirable and advantageous. Whether they treat of Elizabethan and modern poetry, or deal with the literary and artistic tendencies of our times, it is the poetic aspects of literature that most engage Mr. Dowden's thoughtful and sympathetic criticism. This is especially prominent in the essay on "Victorian Literature." There are few among the prose writers here discussed who are not poets in the primal sense of the word, and the two or three exceptions want nothing but "the accomplishment of verse." Admitting the essential magnitude of all that is implied by the want, the fact is notable and curious. It suggests, by the way, an excellent theme for an auxiliary discourse upon those who possess the accomplishment, and are yet no poets. Even for so genial a critic as Mr. Dowden, there is abundant illustrative material at hand. Many of the studies in the present volume are complementary to the author's previous writings. Thus the graceful dissertation, with its pleasing and often striking commentary of reflective fancy, "Shakspeare's Portraiture of Women," recalls Mr. Dowden's delightful volume on the mind and art of Shakspeare, while the "Last Words on Shelley," put forth as a postscript to the biography, is even more emphatically a portion of that work. Indeed it arouses sincere regret that it was not incorporated with Mr. Dowden's Life of the poet, and occasioned the rejection of passages which it to some extent modifies. On the other hand, the exclusion of Shelley's Philosophic View of Reform is amply justified by Mr. Dowden's interesting examination of that curious and apparently crude fragment. "Spenser, the Poet and Teacher," is a study of the poet from an ethical standpoint that is sure to command attention, whatever views may be entertained of the nature of Spenser's didactic intention in the Faery Queen. Like Mr. Dowden, we find it impossible to agree with the Dean of St. Paul's in thinking the poet was under any obligation to write as a professed teacher of morality, nor can we find anything in the "teaching" of the Faery Queen that suggests even the slight parallelism with Wordsworth which is touched upon by Mr. Dowden. In spite of the epistle to Raleigh, the happy instincts of the poet prevented the degradation of his noble epic to the pettier limits of a mirrour for true gentlemen. Being an epic, the Faery Queen, though a labyrinth as we now possess it, was not without a plan; but this, apart from the machinery of allegory, is concerned with the action of the poem only, as is common to all epics. Spenser was too little of a preacher to be a teacher, in the Wordsworthian sense, and the Faery Queen is unadulterate poetry, for all the didactic intent of its allegory. At the same time, it is pleasant and profitable to follow Mr. Dowden through the suggestive maze, even while we cannot admit that Spenser "sought to impress the mind of his own age" by any didactic means, or was troubled about the "grand self-culture" of the individual. These are the ingenious glosses of a prying age. The text of Wordsworth's poems is the subject of a capital paper, in which Mr. Dowden contrasts with much sound criticism and in a playful humour the various results of the poet's emendations, the frequency and importance of which are comparable only with Lord Tennyson's.

Of the latter we have the most recent examples in the reissue of Lord Tennyson's works, Early Poems (Macmillan & Co.), the first of a "Library Edition" to be completed in eight neat, well-printed, and handy volumes. The "second-rate sensitive mind" whose "supposed Confessions" seemed prophetic of the "Two Voices" appears no longer as "not in unity with itself." It is perhaps of less moment whether it is the peach or the pear that was knotted to the garden wall in "Mariana," though a moated grange might well possess the former, as every walled garden has its pear-tree.

Gum Boughs and Wattle Bloom (Cassell & Co.) is the appropriate title of a series of papers descriptive of life in Australia, originally contributed by Mr. Donald Macdonald to the Melbourne Argus and other journals. The life and society depicted in this little book are not to be found in the cities and townships. The communities of birds and beasts, of fish and reptiles, studied in their far and wild habitats with the patience and keen interest of a naturalist, are vividly presented in these pages. Mr. Macdonald disclaims the position of a naturalist, though his book shows he is one by instinct. His descriptions of the round of natural life in the wild Bush, the mountains and streams of Gipps Land, the great plains of Riverina, and the southern coast of Victoria, are often notable for unadorned simplicity and remarkable pictorial power. They make a "new chum" of the reader who has never voyaged to Australia, so faithful and realistic are Mr. Macdonald's transcripts. "Village and Farm" and "The Home of the Black-fish" are studies from nature that might have been written by Richard Jefferies, if that gifted writer had visited Gipps Land.

The Lost Dauphin, by A. de Grasse Stevens (Orpington: George Allen), is a fresh attempt to unravel the mystery of the Temple by a writer who believes, as many good authorities have believed, that the unfortunate son of Louis XVI. did not die in prison, but was smuggled to America with the connivance of the Duc de Provence. The speculative [illegible] in this book is not more strange, and perhaps less incredible than that of Naundorff. The writer steers clear of all recent [illegible] the subject, such as Count d'Hérisson's curious contribution in Le Cabinet Noir, and deals solely with the American theory which identified Louis XVII. with Mr. Eleazar Williams, missionary among the Oneida Indians, whose story is certainly remarkable. There is plenty of skill and ingenious pleading in the book, and the author very frankly acknowledges the impossibility of proof, as indeed everybody must who believes there is any mystery at all connected with the fate of the Dauphin.

Mr. Gladstone makes but a thin and colourless contribution to Mr. Andrew Reid's collection of economic panaceas—Bold Retrenchment (Whittingham)—though it is not without a humorous audacity. "There are few things," he writes, "in the Political Sphere that would give me greater pleasure than to see the Liberal Party once more address itself to the promotion of Effective Economy in the Public Expenditure, by which it has gained so much renown and done so much good in bygone days." Not even the pretty notion of Lord George Gordon conferring with his humble follower, Mr. Simon Tappertit, on the virtue of tolerance is more diverting than the spectacle of the man of the hundred millions yearning for retrenchment in the company of Mr. John Page Hopps and Mr. Andrew Reid. For the rest, we have the old quack remedies and the familiar display of muddle-headed fanaticism. Mr. W. S. Shirley, M.P., differs from most of his associates in wishing to keep both army and navy in "a state of thorough efficiency." He only wants to get at the "Civil Service fopps (sic)." Mr. Labouchere accurately gauges the value of his opinion of the army by confessing that he writes as a civilian. Mr. Reid thinks we should never go to war, but await the invader with a "magnificent yeoman and peasant home-guard," at an annual cost of 10*l.* per head; and a short way with "those dreadful estimates" is dimly hinted at in the spluttering rhetoric of the manifesto signed "John Page Hopps." The sad case of the Financial Reform Association is set forth with much piteous whining. "Our motions in the Commons were rejected with crushing majorities." "We were loaded with abuse, branded as liars and fabricators," &c. On the whole, the branding has not been ineffectual, though it may yet be necessary to repeat it.

Hazell's Annual Cyclopædia for 1888 appears to be slightly less in bulk than last year, though the number of separate articles has been increased. The information is varied and useful, but requires a good deal of correction in places. It will probably be news to Mr. Comyns Carr that his real name is "Joseph Williams"; and Augustus Reginald Dunshunner, Esq., of St. Mirrens, would certainly not recognize himself as "Augustus Dunsbunne," though the latter is a very nice name. Of course it is difficult to get so large a mass of particulars exactly right; but they are not much use if they are wrong.

Readers of the second edition of Mr. Vine's Cæsar in Kent (Elliot Stock) will derive great assistance from the two maps now added, one of which indicates the probable positions of Romans and Britons on Barham Down, and the other Cæsar's route through Kent to the Thames and his two Channel passages from Portus Itius.

We have received the Royal Navy List for the current quarter (Witherby & Co.); the Shipping World Year-Book for 1888 ("Shipping World" Office); the Fifth Annual Report of the Metropolitan Public Gardens Association, and the official Reports of the Mining Industries of New Zealand (Wellington, N. Z.: Didsbury).

We have also received the second edition of the Œdipus Tyrannus, with notes, commentary, and translation, by Professor Jebb (Cambridge: University Press); the History of Pedagogy, translated from the French of Gabriel Compayré, by W. H. Payne, M.A., of Michigan University (Sonnenschein & Co.); Highland Day Dreams, by George Mackenzie (Inverness: "Northern Chronicle"); Poems and Translations; Addresses; Uppingham School Songs, by Edward Thring (Fisher Unwin); Geography for Schools, by Alfred Hughes, "Clarendon Press Series" (Oxford: Clarendon Press); Painting in Oil, by M. Louise McLaughlin (Cincinnati: Clarke), and George Frederick Handel, by T. Cuthbert Hadden (Allen & Co.)

NINTH BONUS DIVISION, 1888.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

ESTABLISHED 1810.

EXTRAORDINARY RESULTS.

THE profits now being paid in cash by the Sun Life Office are exceptionally large, surpassing those hitherto given, and for which the Society has been so justly noted, and average 196 per cent. of the annual premium (nearly two premiums) now payable in cash; or 332 per cent. of the annual premium (more than 3½ premiums) added to the sum assured, exemplified more fully, at the average age 35, by the following table :

Years in force	Annual	Cash			Addition
		£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.
5	Premium,	28	2	1	59	11	11
10		51	9	9	101	3	8
15	age 35,	52	13	3	95	0	2
20		52	15	9	86	12	3
25	£1,000,	61	1	6	91	16	0
30		79	15	5	112	3	5
35	£28 6 8	82	15	1	108	8	0
		£408	12	10	£654	15	5

Thus a Policy of £1,000 becomes one of over £1,654, or cash has been returned which, improved at 4 per cent., would equal £709, or the premium is totally extinguished.

Full examples at various ages will be supplied on application, but the above may be considered as representative.

N.B.- Bonus options at each division. No partnership liability. Modern practice. Simple proposal forms. Immediate settlements.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The above extraordinary results prove that a With Profit Policy opened with the SUN LIFE OFFICE can be had at considerably less than COST PRICE. Before assuring obtain and read the Prospectus of the Society.

"NOR'ARD OF THE DOGGER"

Or, Deep-Sea Trials and Gospel Triumphs.

Being the Story of the Initiation, Struggles, and Successes of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen.

By E. J. MATHER, Founder and Director.

And numerous Illustrations by J. R. WELLS and C. J. STANILAND, R.I.

"A very full account of the origin and work of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen, written by its Founder and Director, Mr. E. J. Mather. No time more fitting than the present could have been found for publishing this very interesting volume. No reader will lay down the book after finishing it without feeling that he has learnt much of the life that our fishermen lead when out with the trawling fleets. ....We can strongly recommend this book, and hope that more people than do so at present may be induced to support the Mission after learning its history."
Saturday Review.

"A more thrilling narrative we have seldom met with..........Talk of 'the romance of Missions'! This book is the record of one continuous miracle.......... The telling pictures by Messrs. Wells and Staniland are worthy of the narratives they illustrate, and the whole forms in our judgment the book of the season."

"The impression that this very clever novel creates and leaves upon the reader's mind is that it is drawn from life, that the characters are all familiar figures to the author, and that the incidents it records are real." —Life.

"This is a delightful novel........The tale is well told, in short is no ordinary novel, but exhibits on every page the work of a mature hand, who can touch at once with delicacy and precision." —Newcastle Courant.

"A very clever novel, well worth reading. It is one of great promise, and we shall be much disappointed if it is not followed up by something still better."

John Bull.

WHITEPATCH: a Romance for Quiet People. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"An old-world rambling romance, dealing with the topics of to-day in the style of fifty years ago. The quaint turns of expression, old-fashioned notions, and antiquated way of presenting things fit in well with the background of the piece ....'Whitepatch' calls itself 'A Romance for Quiet People,' but we imagine people of all sorts and ages will find themselves well amused by it."

THE ENGLISH IN THE WEST INDIES; Or, THE BOW OF ULYSSES.

By JAMES A. FROUDE.

With 9 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author.

Daily Telegraph. "An excellent volume, the brightness and life of which loses nothing by contrast with occasional touches of grave speculation and prophetic seriousness."

The Globe.—"Once open this new book of Mr. Froude's and you must needs go on with it. The writer holds you by his glittering style, and you cannot choose but surrender to the spell. The fascination is complete."

Spectator.—"Possesses in a high degree the inestimable gift of being thoroughly readable, and the effect on the reader cannot but be to awaken his interest on a subject of such vast importance as the rule of the English among the negroes of the West Indies."

Land and Water.—"Simply the most fascinating book of its class ever written. Of its class, do we say? It is rather sui generis. In brilliant descriptive, in glowing pictorial beauty it can be compared only to Kingsley's 'At Last.' In its other qualities, it can be compared to nothing."

Standard.—"Since Anthony Trollope wrote his pleasant book on the Antilles, no work half so interesting, or a tithe so authoritative, has appeared on the British West Indies as Mr. Froude's latest contribution to the literature of what were once the pearls of our colonial empire. The 'Bow of Ulysses' is worthy of the author of 'Oceana.'"

The Times.—"Mr. Froude's brilliant book on the West Indies is, perhaps, the most enjoyable he has ever written, and has a wider interest than might be inferred from the title. Never has he thrown himself with more intensity into those broad and burning questions which concern the future of the empire. Never has he found happier opportunity for fervent eloquence or picturesque description, and he has seldom displayed his powers to greater advantage."

CIVILISATION and PROGRESS. By JOHN BEATTIE CROZIER. New and Cheaper Edition. 8vo. 5s.

Spectator.—"The testimony which we are compelled to give to the high ability of this ambitious work is completely impartial........A book far less superficial than Mr. Buckle's."

Scotsman.—"An original thinker, and a clear forcible writer."

READY NEXT WEEK.

THE OFFICIAL YEAR-BOOK OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. FOR 1888.

Demy 8vo. paper boards, 3s.; cloth boards, 4s.

The Sixth Issue of this important Work will be ready next week, and will present an authorised and comprehensive record of the condition and work of the Church of England, and of all Churches in communion with her throughout the world.

Several additions of considerable interest and importance will be found in this volume, giving it a peculiar value of its own.

In the interest of the National Church the circulation of this Book is of immense importance, as the records it furnishes must greatly tend to remove common prejudices and misconceptions with regard to the position of the Church of England and her relation to the spiritual wants of the people.

CONTENTS:

THE INVASION of the CRIMEA. Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By A. W. KINGLAKE.

Vol. VII.—FROM THE MORROW OF INKERMAN TO THE FALL OF CANROBERT.

Vol. VIII.—FROM THE OPENING OF PÉLISSIER'S COMMAND TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

Illustrated with numerous Maps, Plans, and Index to the complete Work. Demy 8vo. 28s.

"Mr. Kinglake's last volumes come as a welcome gift, touching so closely on the very issues of the day that it seems to us for the moment that hardly in any year since 1855 could they have been more valuable. There are not a few of his words that will seem as if they had been written of design to enlighten Englishmen as to the part which it most behoves their country to play at the present hour; still more there are, both in these concluding volumes and in those earlier ones to which one may hope that these will again direct attention, lessons of the most profound interest as to the perennial dangers, the perennial strength, and the perennial weakness of England." Macmillan's Magazine.

"Not only is it the close of a great historical work, but of what, from the picturesque point of view, is a sensational romance rich in dramatic events as in profound studies of character. ......Mr Kinglake has patiently concentrated his attention on the work, which will be a worthy memorial of one of the most dramatic of modern campaigns ....Nor has he confined himself to a mere chronicle of the camp ruling and the councils of war—of siege, sap, and storm, and heroic endurance under suffering. His is the most lucid and comprehensive picture of European politics and politicians at an eminently critical time."—Blackwood's Magazine.

SCOTLAND and SCOTSMEN in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Edited from the MSS. of JOHN RAMSAY, Esq., of Ochtertyre, by ALEXANDER ALLARDYCE, Author of "Memoir of Admiral Lord Keith, K.B." &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d.

"The contents of these two volumes are of unquestionable value. They show us, through the eyes of a shrewd observer, many of the men, and not a little of the manners of Scotland when, chiefly by reason of more intimate contact with England, the country was awakening or had just awakened to a new and more progressive life........Mr. Ramsay was a liberal-minded man, but without sympathy with rash innovations; and his judgments on contemporary men and manners are generally as shrewd as they are kindly, and are often as entertaining as they are instructive........Altogether these volumes form the most interesting addition that has for some time been made to Scottish social, personal, and anecdotal history."—Scotsman.

"Lauterdale and Caterina." 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"The girl who gives the title to the book, and the development of whose character forms the main issue of the plot, is a figure drawn with marked ability........The interest of the work, however, lies not so much in its incidents, though these are well conceived, as in the character drawing, and the many pleasant pictures of Austrian life and manners which enliven the progress of the tale."—Scotsman.

BY THE EARL OF SELBORNE.

CHURCHES and TITHES, ANCIENT

FACTS and FICTIONS CONCERNING. By ROUNDELL, EARL OF SELBORNE, Author of "A Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment" &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

The Times says:—"Such is the nature and character of this little volume: unpretending, learned, accurate, painstaking, impartial. It is a valuable, almost necessary supplement to Lord Selborne's previous work. It will be an aid to the ecclesiastical historian; and, not its least merit, it shows how a scrupulous mind prepares itself for engaging in a momentous controversy."

NEW AND POPULAR EDITION. Crown 8vo. 6s.

JAMES FRASER, Second Bishop of Manchester:

a Memoir, 1818–1885. By THOMAS HUGHES, Q.C. With a Portrait.

THE MAKERS of VENICE; Doges,

Conquerors, Painters, and Men of Letters. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Makers of Florence" &c. With numerous Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 21s.

Blackwood's Magazine says:—"Mrs. Oliphant's hand has not lost its cunning. 'The Makers of Venice' is even more delightful than 'The Makers of Florence.' The writing is bright and animated, the research thorough, the presentation of old Venetian life brilliantly vivid. It is an entirely workmanlike piece of work by an artist who knows how to mix the colours on her palette to the best advantage, and by a story-teller who can translate the lay figures of the past into real men and women........We are grateful to Mrs. Oliphant for this very charming and instructive volume."

PERSONAL REMEMBRANCES of SIR

FREDERICK POLLOCK, Second Baronet, sometime Queen's Remembrancer. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s.

The Athenæum says: "Sir Frederick Pollock has enjoyed much good fortune in his life, and has much that is pleasant to remember. Born in 1815......He was at Trinity with Helps, Venables, and Creasy, and had Peacock for his tutor......There is much of interest in the volumes. Sir Frederick has a fine taste in literature."

The Literary World says: "We have quoted enough to show that the book is teeming with interesting matter."

THE SECOND SON. By Mrs. OLIPHANT,

Author of "The Curate in Charge," "A Country Gentleman," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

FOUR GHOST STORIES. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.

PAUL PATOFF. By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "A Roman Singer," "Mr. Isaacs," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Times says:—"There is much to fascinate us in 'Paul Patoff.' We are given a vivid picture of Modern Constantinople; and the author's instinct has told him in what dark corners of Stamboul the Western mind finds the deepest fascination."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"The action of the story never flags. Movement is one of the principal charms of this very entertaining book......Those who neglect to read 'Paul Patoff' will throw away a very pleasurable opportunity."

THE NEW ANTIGONE. A Romance. 3 vols.

Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Times says: "A daring outline and fine workmanship give this novel a claim to more than ordinary attention........We have spoken of fine workmanship; and the 'New Antigone' is full of evidence that we stand in the presence of a finished author........He has a command of elegant metaphor, a brilliant imagination, and a genius for subjective analysis."

The Spectator says: "This is in truth a romance, and not a novel, and a romance of considerable power. It is a story which steadily increases in interest......and leaves in the mind an impression of artistic power."

THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

IT would be too much to say that Mr. GLADSTONE deliberately goes about to place his party in supremely ridiculous positions. We do not think, indeed, that his sense of humour is strong enough to recommend to him any such diversion. Other explanations must be sought for the fact that he so frequently allows his followers to involve themselves up to the eyes in all sorts of Parliamentary undertakings, and then at the last moment leaves them in the lurch. It cannot be solely out of mere love of surprising the public—though Mr. GLADSTONE is not superior to that passion—nor out of mere wanton desire to indulge the sense of absolute power—though this also has unquestionably charms for him—and it is quite possible that both motives may appreciably influence his conduct in this respect. We are disposed to attribute it mainly and in most cases to the fact that the great Parliamentary strategist often postpones the settlement of his strategic plans to the very eve of the battle, and that his intense self-absorption prevents his troubling himself to inquire what may be his army's expectations on the subject. In the present instance, however, it is difficult to believe that Mr. GLADSTONE's surprising speech on the Address—a speech which has left his followers in a condition of the most ludicrous discomfiture—could have been the response to a sudden inspiration. No doubt he might allege that this was, in fact, its precise character, and that, since he was in duty bound to await the Speech from the Throne before deciding on his attitude towards the Government, it could not be otherwise. This, however, would be the merest conventionalism of excuse. The general tenor of the Royal Speech was, as it always is, substantially matter of public knowledge at least a month ago; and, further, the demand of the situation, as the militant Gladstonians regard it, is that the Government should be dragged to justice for their past administrative misdeeds, and not be for a moment permitted to purge themselves by promises of good legislative conduct in the future. Moreover, Mr. GLADSTONE had, barely twenty-four hours before rising in his place in the House, afforded what appeared to be the clearest intimation of his agreement with his party on this point. The sight of "the white cliffs "of Old England" had produced the reverse of what is supposed to be its customary effect on the returning traveller; and, if Mr. GLADSTONE murmured "This is my "own, my native land," he followed it up by something like a declaration that he is very sorry it is. Almost his first words of greeting to his country after his stepping ashore at Dover consisted of an unfavourable comparison between her government and that of the only surviving despotism in Europe. She was, he said, holding down Ireland by force, as Russia is not doing to Finland—nor, we suppose, to Poland—and the "painful spectacle" thus presented by her was a "fact of terrible solemnity," a "grave question before "us," a state of things to which it "depends on you, the "people of England, to put an end."

Who would have supposed that this same patriot would, before he was another day older, address the authors of this state of things, the men responsible for this fact of terrible solemnity, the wielders of this more than Russian tyranny, in honied words? that he would speak of his former struggles with those criminals as "painful discussions which "exhausted our time and strength," which were "unfavour-"able to the growth of Christian charity," and which there "was no disposition on that side of the House to renew"? No disposition on that side of the House to renew those discussions? Why, we had all understood that, so far from this, there was a disposition, amounting to a determination, to do nothing else. It was like COLERIDGE and his lay sermons. Yet here was the leader of the party of Liberalism, the apostle of clemency and justice, who had only the day before denounced the shameful oppression of Ireland as utterly disgraceful to the country—here was this extraordinary man hobnobbing, so to speak, with the oppressors, and turning away from their bound and bleeding victim in order to assist them to ingratiate themselves with the English public by holding "a useful, and even a distin-"guished, Session" of Parliament. No wonder the army looked in mute amazement at their incalculable commander. No wonder Lieutenant-General Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, who had conceived a special plan of attack on the Government all out of his own head, was a little disconcerted—though, of course, he was far too well trained an officer to show it—at learning, not only that his strategic scheme had been materially modified by his chief, but that in that chief's opinion the attack should be delivered under entirely different circumstances and even on a different night. Such things cannot "over-"come Gladstonians like a summer cloud without their "special wonder." But our point is, as we have said, that the suddenness must have been merely in the announcement of Mr. GLADSTONE's resolve, and not in its conception. He must have made up his mind even before he went abroad that this should be his declared line of tactics for the Session. It is probable, indeed, that he made up his mind to it as long ago as before Mr. PARNELL's well-remembered conversation with his interviewer on the Irish press; and that Mr. GLADSTONE's colleague in the command was, on that occasion, merely stating a plan of action already concocted between the two. If that was the case, Mr. GLADSTONE's English lieutenants have some ground of complaint. No doubt it is necessary that the leader of the Irish division should be quite in the English commander's confidence, if, indeed, he has not a determining voice at the joint council of war. But the leader's contempt for the distinguished members of his highest staff need hardly have been shown so cruelly as by the keeping them in total ignorance of his plans, and thus allowing them to make themselves ridiculous by threatening all sorts of valorous Parliamentary enterprises which he had not the least intention of permitting them to execute.

No doubt, however, they will console themselves by concluding that, if Mr. GLADSTONE has deceived them, it was only that he might hereafter deceive his adversaries. They may bethink themselves, too, that the line of action which he has marked out for them is, after all, not only the most promising of advantage—though that, indeed, is not saying much—but also the only conventionally decent course to pursue. The Speech from the Throne they must perceive to have thoroughly well deserved the praises, sincere or not, which their leader bestowed upon it. Its programme is not an ambitious, but it is an eminently useful and serviceable, and in no sense whatever a partisan one. "I admit," said Mr. GLADSTONE, "that your legislation begins well; indeed, "manifestly in the selection of the subjects as far as they "go you have contemplated wider interests than the inte-"rests of party. We shall desire to second your efforts "in that direction." It is impossible not to sympathize with right honourable occupants of the front Opposition bench who were compelled to listen to such language as this from the lips of their revered leader. Yet, painful as it must be to them, we still invite them to consider whether it was practically open to him to employ language of any other kind. We are persuaded that when the first pangs of disappointed factiousness have subsided, they will acknowledge that Mr. GLADSTONE has exercised a sound discretion—if he has been rather slow in revealing it. When a Government, of whatever political complexion, undertakes to deal with the question of local government, to cheapen the transfer of land, to settle the embittered dispute about tithes, to promote technical education, and to render half a dozen other useful, if unpretentious, services to the public, it is, on the whole, the wiser course for a leader of the Opposition not to announce to the public that he will use his utmost efforts to prevent any of these things being done until the Government of the day has consented to break up the United Kingdom. It is, on the whole, the wiser course for a leader of the Opposition so situated to say that he warmly welcomes the political programme of his opponents, and that he will do his best to enable them to carry it out—always with the proviso—and is there any proviso of greater importance?—that their attempt be made in a judicious manner. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT understands this, we are sure, if more eager spirits like Mr. JOHN MORLEY do not. Sir WILLIAM quite perceives that the proper course for an Opposition in such a case is not to present the point of the sword to the adversary, but to take him cordially by the hand, and afterwards, though sorrowfully and under a deep sense of public duty, trip up his heels. And, if all Mr. GLADSTONE'S followers are not equally alive to this at first, we are quite sure that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT will not only be willing to explain it to them, but will cheerfully endeavour to enforce his teaching by practical illustrations.

SIR HENRY MAINE.

THE admirable biographical notice of Sir HENRY MAINE which appeared in the Times on Monday last would dispense us from saying anything more if he had not stood in a peculiar relation to the Saturday Review, and to most of its original contributors, of whom he was one of the most distinguished. This article is written by one of them who knew him for more than forty years; lived with him during nearly the whole of that long period upon terms of brotherly intimacy and affection, never interrupted by the smallest passing cloud, and was for upwards of thirty years connected in the closest way with all his undertakings, literary, legal, and political.

> His saltem accumulem donis et fungar inani is a perfect expression of the two sentiments which his death rouses—the moral impossibility of keeping silence on the occasion, and the emptiness of all that can be said. The biographical part of the article in the Times supersedes the necessity for any narrative of the events of Sir HENRY MAINE'S life, but it leaves something to be said on his character.

The whole colour of his career, the nature of his successive undertakings, and the way in which he carried them out depended upon his physical constitution. The writer in the Times correctly states his physical advantages as a lecturer. He had a striking face, a remarkably powerful voice, and a rather tall and well-proportioned figure; but he was from boyhood essentially delicate, and he overtaxed such strength as he had at the beginning of his career. Till he was forty years old he hovered on the verge of being an invalid, and had several most trying and tedious illnesses. He was forced by one of them to refuse the first offer made to him of the office of Legal Member of Council in India, and it was only the accident of Mr. RITCHIE'S death, after holding the office for six months, that enabled the country to obtain Sir HENRY'S services. The Indian climate suited him, and he returned to England a healthier man than he left it, but he was never robust. He suffered of late years from various ailments, which gave his friends much uneasiness; and his death was preceded by many months of ill health of a distressing kind.

One effect of this was that he never, after he took his degree, was physically capable of severe continuous drudgery. In no one of the three professions which he followed, and in each of which he excelled nearly all his competitors, did he go through the elaborate processes of detail which in nearly every case are requisite to success. He was not one of the journalists who can sit in court pleading cases all day and write articles all night. He was not one of the Indian administrators who are as much at home in the saddle as at the desk. No man of our time did so much for the revival of the study of Roman law; but it is greatly to be doubted whether he had any special familiarity with the Pandects or the Code.

Sir HENRY MAINE'S great peculiarity, his unique distinction, was that, by extraordinary care and skill in the use of mental gifts equally extraordinary, he was able to pursue with triumphant success three several professions of the most arduous kind, without the assistance which great physical strength and energy would have given him, and without treading in the routine to which each of them, as a rule, confines those who follow it successfully.

The most obvious of these qualities were an almost preternatural quickness of understanding and facility of expression. Sir HENRY MAINE could read a thick volume, and that in such a way as to appropriate what concerned him in it, whilst an ordinary man read a hundred pages. One would have said that his brain and nerves were on the very verge of morbid excitability if his temper had not been remarkably sweet, gentle, and even patient. His quickness showed itself as much in his power of applying as in his power of grasping principles, and as much in expression as in conception. These qualities were invaluable to him as a journalist. They enabled him, whatever might be the subject on which he wrote, to see at once with intuitive quickness exactly what he had to say, and to say it in language almost mathematically accurate.

These qualities were remarkable enough to secure a considerable success in life. But in him they were combined with others rarer and more remarkable—qualities for which journalism gives comparatively little scope, but which are essential to the more permanent forms of literature. These Sir HENRY MAINE possessed in the highest degree, and employed upon a branch of knowledge which he may almost be said to have called into existence, at least in this country. As a lecturer and as an author on subjects connected with the origin of laws and the history of the early forms of political institutions he was as successful as he was in journalism. His powers as a lecturer were remarkable; but, of course, his, like all other lectures carefully prepared beforehand and not illustrated by experiments, were open to the remark that, when all was said and done, they were like, and indeed actually were to a great extent, chapters of a book read aloud. Their importance is shown in the books which give their results in a condensed form. This is not the place for the discussion of their contents; but it may be said in general that their great distinguishing characteristic is that they were written as if by inspiration. Their author had a power of seeing the general in the particular which we do not think has been equalled in literary history. His works are full of generalizations, which are as remarkable for their clearness and their sobriety as for their intrinsic probability, and which were reached, not by any very elaborate study of detailed evidence, but by a kind of intuition. He seemed to see things "in their quiddity," and to reconstitute them from fragments with the genius of OWEN or CUVIER. In his Asiatic Studies Sir ALFRED LYALL gives striking instances of this from his speculations on the origin of clans. Sir ALFRED found in Rajputana the precise practices which Sir HENRY MAINE had suggested as a possible explanation of some scattered facts which he had noticed in his reading.

This quickness of apprehension, power of expression, and luminous intuition would perhaps lead an uninformed observer to the conclusion that their possessor had the temperament of a poetical enthusiast. No greater mistake could have been made. They were associated with a temperament which was liable to err on the side of caution, regard to actual circumstances, and to immediate practical consequences, and a total absence of any sort of enthusiasm or illusion. In his third profession, that of a statesman, these qualities were conspicuously displayed. Sir HENRY MAINE never made a mistake in his duties as an adviser of the Government of India. He was wise, calm, cautious, and reasonable to a degree of which it is difficult to give any adequate notion. He was sometimes charged with idleness in India, and it is no wonder that the charge was made in a country where the standard of industry is so high as to be apt to demand unremitting drudgery, and where more valuable and rarer qualities are apt to be regarded with cynical suspicion and ignorant contempt. Sir HENRY MAINE undoubtedly did not work so hard as many of his colleagues; but there was probably not one of them who could have done at all what he, whenever called upon, did supremely well.

It is difficult to speak of his moral and personal qualities. He was not a man of wide popular sympathies, nor was he ever called upon to enter into any of the conflicts which attract much public attention; but to the few who knew him really well he endeared himself to an extent which it is impossible to describe without entering upon matters with which the public has no concern. There are persons to whom the world can never have the same aspect again as it had when he lived in it.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S SPEECH.

THAT Prince BISMARCK would carry his Army Bill was so entirely a foregone conclusion that hardly a thought can be said to have been spent on it even by the most determined quidnunc. But the PRINCE was gracious to the quidnuncs for all that, and provided them with two genuine sensations in one week, or at least in one period of less than seven days. The first of these can indeed only be called genuine from the point of view of the recipient. The publication of the Austro-German treaty was the publication only of a secret de Polichinelle. It had existed for nearly ten years, and every one who cared to inform himself at all about foreign politics was practically acquainted with its general provisions, if not with its actual terms and details. The formal utterance of those terms, therefore, might be thought, if it had any dread significance at all, to be somewhat alike in dreadfulness to the practice, once so redoubted—recently, alas! so much vulgarized—of "naming" a member of the House of Commons. Everyone knew the erring member's name, yet the pronunciation of it for the first time by a reluctantly comminatory Speaker sounded like the crack of doom. Everybody knew the contents of the Austro-German treaty, but the formal declaration of them sounded like an immediate prelude to a declaration of war. Of course the publication was asserted to be made merely for the purpose of convincing the world of the absolute peacefulness of the arrangement. But this of itself frightened the alarmists more than it calmed them, while those who are by no means inclined to alarm had to admit that, though the thing might be quite insignificant in itself, it certainly was surrounded with many significant circumstances.

As to the PRINCE's own speech, it would be rude to cry "Known!" Yet perhaps any tolerably skilful publicist in any country of Europe might have produced a sealed sketch of it, which on opening would not have been found to go very far wrong in point of matter. The PRINCE-CHANCELLOR in one way at least may be said to have amply earned the eighteen modest quenchers which, according to a historian mindful of the taste of the day, cheered him on his oratorical way. Even he has never carried further the audaciously calculated frankness which, as it has often been observed, is as good for concealment of thought as Mr. GLADSTONE's laborious ambiguity. It is easy to conceive and not easy to exaggerate the relish with which the PRINCE must have explained that he only spoke because he knew his silence would cause greater anxiety—well knowing all the while that what he was going to say would not calm or satisfy anxiety one whit. There was, of course, "no change" since he had last spoken in the Reichstag—though, by the way, the distinguished orator did not explain how this was consistent with the supernatural state of tension of which he had just spoken. At any rate, things were much better in France—it being well known that the present apprehensions are not turned to France at all. People were more afraid about Russia, but he could see nothing more threatening in the Russian direction. Pressmen might see it; but pressmen were not of the slightest importance, only slingers of ink on paper. In Russia particularly nobody was of any importance but the EMPEROR; and, if anything can exceed the warm, yet pacific, disposition of Prince BISMARCK towards the CZAR and Russia, it is the warm, yet pacific, disposition of the CZAR towards Prince BISMARCK and Germany. Then people talked about massing of troops on frontiers—that meant nothing at all except that Russia wanted to have her troops massed, perhaps in expectation of an Eastern crisis. It might be so; but he, the PRINCE, rather thought there would not be a crisis for twenty years. Even if there were, it would not matter to Germany. Now nothing, of course, could be rosier than all this; but, as more than one intelligent critic has remarked already, the speaker probably by the time he had got so far recollected that he was proving a little too much, and that even his foregone conclusion—his Army Bill—might slip through his fingers if he proved any more. If everybody all round Germany is animated with such wholly excellent sentiments at the moment, what a very odd moment to choose for making up your total of five or six million troops by a fresh levy of seven hundred thousand men and for running into debt to the amount of fourteen millions sterling! The PRINCE, a country gentleman of the best, probably reflected that one does not hire an army of extra keepers at the very time when it is quite certain that nobody thinks of poaching or trespassing, or invest half a year's income in man-traps and spring-guns when it is clearly proven that there is not a dangerous character in the neighbourhood. So he went off on the other tack. Experience had shown that it was always well to have plenty of keepers, that sudden orders for man-traps were always liable to find manufacturers unable to supply the demand. There was a great deal of poaching and trespassing forty, thirty, twenty years ago, though of course not now, and there might be again. Other people were putting themselves in a posture of defence; you must be "as strong as possible." There might be complications, there might be coalitions; though he himself had always loved Russia, and had been quite a "fourth Russian "plenipotentiary" at that Berlin Congress which deprived Russia of nearly all the fruits of her labours—so that it may be feared the fourth Plenipotentiary was rather a fifth wheel. And he loved Russia still, and he would be quite loyal to her and to the Berlin Treaty as to Bulgaria. But—but "a State like Austria does not "vanish, and a State like Austria, if not loyally supported, "will be estranged."

Practically these words make by far the most important summary of the speech; they constitute the text on which all the rest is mere gloss, and it is not to be wondered at that the agents, hired or volunteer, of Russia have been provoked by them into relieving their feelings in splenetic outbursts against Austria herself. The real drift of them, and with them of the whole speech, is plain enough. Prince BISMARCK is quite ready to say the most amiable things about all, or nearly all, Europe. He has not the remotest idea that anybody is going to attack him, and as for attacking anybody, that is quite out of the question. Of Russia, in particular, except in so far as concerns a few irresponsible and unimportant Teutophobe pressmen, he is the firm friend. He will, if she likes, be rude to Prince FERDINAND for her; he will be as "correct" as she likes in all his attitude. He will even admit, though he confesses that his friends and allies will not admit, her pretensions to some entirely indefinite "sway" in Bulgaria—a "sway" conditioned by the suzerainty of the Porte and the conditions of the Berlin Treaty. But he takes leave to observe that Austria is not a quantity to be neglected, and that for his part he is not going to neglect her, come what may. Now everybody knows that the question of Austria v. Russia is sometimes very much more than a question of correct attitudes; that the "race for Salonica" is to Austria a question of life and death—to Russia a question of the final accomplishment or the almost certain disappointment for ever of the one dream of her rulers since (as some distinguished historians would say) "the fire-tubes "of the Greek galleys triumphed over the monoxyla of "IGOR." Prince BISMARCK, of course, says nothing of this. But he first prepares the way for his speech by ostentatiously publishing a treaty in which he engages in the closest connexions with Austria, and then he observes, in one of those half-parentheses which often contain the most important parts of such speeches, that the one definite thing that he will not do is to estrange Austria. Nor, perhaps, is the significance of the declaration thus made and thus prepared lessened by the little fact that its formal occasion is the demand for seven hundred thousand men, and for fourteen millions of money. It would be totally idle, especially after Lord SALISBURY's comment on it, to attempt to see anything pacific in Prince BISMARCK's speech. It shows—what all men knew before—that he does not want to provoke a fight; it shows also, and more clearly than ever, though with no absolute novelty, that he has not the slightest intention of refusing a fight if it is forced on him by a certain course of conduct. And that course of conduct is the exact course of conduct in which, unless her proceedings are at once unintelligent and unintelligible, Russia is engaged.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

THE Local Government Bill, if it has been skilfully and judiciously framed, will probably be passed. At present it is scarcely introduced under brilliant auspices. Its well-wishers have satisfied themselves that, as THIERS said of the Republic, it will cause the least possible division among followers and friends. The prophecy of the French Minister has not been confirmed by experience; and Mr. PARNELL apparently thinks it possible that the Parliamentary majority may break up on the issue which has been deliberately selected by its leaders. On the other side may be cited Mr. RITCHIE'S statement that the Cabinet is unanimous in approving the provisions of the Bill, and the expression of his confident belief that it will command the support of the Liberal-Unionists. An eminent member of that party is reported to have said, in answer to a question whether in his judgment the expected measure would render local administration better and cheaper, that it would, on the contrary, make it dearer and worse, but that the Bill nevertheless ought to be passed. There is no doubt that it is a part of the duty of a statesman to consult public opinion in many cases in which he may himself not share its conclusions. If a political change is inevitable, a Conservative Minister may sometimes act wisely in undertaking the conduct of a measure which might in other hands be connected with dangerous innovations. In the present case there is no immediate demand for a novel system of local administration; but a refusal to deprive the county justices of their ancient powers might furnish an excuse for agitation and for consequent excitement. By far the greater part of the taxation nominally imposed by Courts of Quarter Session is determined by Acts of Parliament. The remainder of the county rate is comparatively insignificant in amount, and it is universally admitted that it has been economically assessed and prudently employed. The theoretical objection to the severance of taxation from representation is applicable to the case, because the magistrates are appointed by the Crown. The whole course of modern legislation tends to diminish the control of the larger ratepayers and taxpayers over local and national finance; but the anomaly of taxation by justices is simpler and less open to dispute. The gentry who occupy the bench of magistrates are undoubtedly an aristocratic body, and no popular argument can now be urged in defence of any kind of privilege. The Conservative Government of thirteen or fourteen years ago committed itself to the expediency of a measure of Local Government, and the present Ministers were perhaps glad to discover a project of reform which is not inconsistent with their party traditions.

Mr. PARNELL'S authoritative discouragement of Obstruction by his squadron of Nationalists indicates his hope that the Government may be defeated on some of the clauses of the Bill. He rightly holds that the rude violence of his followers tends to cement the alliance against which it is mainly directed. The policy of obstruction failed in the last Session, and consequently Mr. PARNELL, followed, as the debate on the Address shows, by Mr. GLADSTONE, now professes a disinterested zeal for the progress of English and Scotch legislation. They will, indeed, protest against the exclusion of Ireland from the supposed benefits which are to be conferred on Great Britain, or perhaps only on England; but they will probably content themselves with one or two divisions, in which they will certainly be defeated. The present House of Commons will not be persuaded to establish anarchy and robbery in Ireland by conferring on branches of the National League powers of taxation and of coercion which would become lawful. The Separatists must renounce for the present the hope of effecting part of their objects by consent of a Parliament which has emphatically rejected Home Rule. The English Local Government Bill will confer on County Boards or Councils the control of the rural police. Only a very small section of the House of Commons will have the audacity to propose the extension of such an arrangement to Ireland. The controversy will not be extravagantly prolonged, if Mr. PARNELL'S intentions have been correctly interpreted. His present policy is to keep Irish affairs in the background, and to trust to internal dissensions for the dissolution of the Unionist alliance. The Government will probably be allowed to carry the second reading of the Bill without direct opposition; but its supporters may differ widely on the details. It will be difficult to judge of the prospects of the measure until the proposed constitution of the governing bodies has been announced. The boldest plan will also be the safest; and, if the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act is followed, the Government will have little reason to anticipate defeat.

Some members of the Government may perhaps attach serious importance to the Bill which their colleagues have accepted for political reasons. Mr. RITCHIE seems to be excusably enthusiastic for the measure, which, if it is successfully conducted through the House of Commons, will justify his promotion to the Cabinet. Mr. GOSCHEN has, since his entrance into public life, consistently affirmed his belief in the beneficial tendency of municipal institutions. In spite of experience, he seems to think that County Chairmen will, after their local training is completed, emerge into the class of statesmen. Long since, when he was a member of a Liberal Cabinet, he prepared a Bill to give effect to his opinions, which in those days was considered bold, if not revolutionary. He has probably taken an active part in preparing the Ministerial Bill, and he will be one of its most powerful advocates. Some members of the Cabinet, though they will dissemble their indifference, may perhaps agree with Sir M. HICKS-BEACH in deprecating both the urgency and the probable utility of the Bill. If Lord SALISBURY could be required to explain fully his opinions and his motives, he would probably say that he could not afford to incur the reproach of absolute legislative inaction. It was desirable to find some measure for which plausible reasons could be given, and Local Government had the advantage of being unconnected with Ireland, with Fair trade, and with other dangerous topics. If Mr. GOSCHEN was impressed with the educational advantages of practice in local administration, Lord SALISBURY could have no wish to contradict him. It is true that in more than fifty years municipal government has produced only one politician of the first Parliamentary rank, whose position as a statesman has yet to be established. Chairmen of Quarter Sessions have contributed larger reinforcements to the class of political leaders. The discussion is, in any case, of minor importance. Public functionaries ought to be appointed because they are qualified to perform the duties of their respective offices, and not that they may afterwards become capable of filling higher positions. Household suffrage has but a doubtful tendency to bring into prominence the ablest members of the local community. The County Boards will probably resemble in character the existing Corporations.

The definition of the powers to be conferred on the Boards which are to be created is next in importance to the qualification of the constituencies. There are grave doubts as to the expediency of transferring the administration of the Poor-law from the Guardians to the new county councillors. The administration of the Unions has, of course, not been faultless; but it has been, on the whole, both meritorious and successful. Within a very recent period a more vigilant control has been exercised over the grant of outdoor relief. The proportion of paupers to the whole population is smaller than in the earlier times of the new Poor-law; and many Guardians, and more especially the Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen of the Unions, have acquired wide and valuable experience. It may be hoped that the Government intends, not to supersede the Boards of Guardians, but to place them under the control of a higher local authority. To this scheme also there are obvious, though not conclusive, objections. If the object of the framers of the Bill is to relieve the central Local Government Board of a portion of its present duties, there will be a less stringent guarantee than at present for absolute impartiality. It may also be difficult to reconcile the Guardians to the proposed subordination to a local authority which they may perhaps regard as not superior to themselves. As it is not proposed to interfere by the present Bill with urban Corporations, there will be an anomaly in the administration of the Poor-law in the towns and in the country. It is, of course, possible that when the Bill is introduced sufficient reasons may be assigned for its provisions.

The authors of the Local Government Bill have perhaps left for future consideration practical questions which will necessarily arise in the operation of a novel system. The members of the governing body will reside at long distances from one another, and sometimes from the county town. County magistrates have repaired to the local seat of government half a dozen times in the year, and, for the most part, their time has been at their own disposal. The County Boards will probably be chosen among farmers, tradesmen, and other men of business; and, if they are to exercise any practical authority, their meetings must be weekly, if not more frequent. In the great towns an active member of the municipality has often to attend the sittings of two or three Committees as well as the full meetings of Council. Residents in country districts can scarcely attend to their duties with equal assiduity. The consequence may be that the municipal representation of the county will be entrusted to persons who will make an occupation of local business, and it will probably be found necessary to provide for travelling expenses. The next step will be to attach salaries to the office, with the result of making the employment into a profession. Sanguine advocates of municipal government have assumed that many members of County Boards will be selected from the ranks of the present magistracy. There would be no better security for careful and upright administration; but social jealousies and political prejudices will tend in the opposite direction. If membership of the Council at any time becomes a paid office, it will become the object of such organizations as those which distribute party patronage in the United States.

SEVEN HUNDRED A YEAR.

A GENTLEMAN connected, as he says, with a large retail house has been asking the world and the St. James's Gazette whether he can marry on 700*l.* a year. To be sure, he is a sarcastic young man, and his purpose is, no doubt, just the reverse of what appears. The whole question is a little impertinent. Of course a man may marry and have a large family, and be happy, on 700*l.* a year, if he gets it "regular," as Sir GEORGE DASENT'S butler liked his meals. It is all a question, as a philosopher once famous would have put it, of the who, and the where, and the how. What kind of man is to marry what sort of woman, in what social rank, with what tastes, ambitions, and desires. In Tahiti a man might be delightfully contented with climate and the affections alone. Society he would never lack; 'tis an eternal Trouville, the costumes as graceful as inexpensive, amusements healthy and endless, no taxes, plenty of bread-fruit, all the world unemployed, and no politics. But Mr. LAYARD, who started the thrilling topic in the Nineteenth Century, was thinking of persons in the middle class, the polite, or refined, or educated professional middle class; it is difficult to find a name for this section of the bourgeoisie. They have rich friends and relations, and know a few Lords, and have perhaps been at Eton, or Rugby, and at the Universities. Can men of this kind live in London, with wives their social equals, on 700*l.* a year? As a rule, they had better not try the experiment. It requires pluck, originality, industry, and a share of good fortune. Nobody can make sure of the latter gift; most people credit themselves with the others. But the young people will need to know each other better than lovers use before they can be sure of each other. If they like to live only for themselves and their small families, all is plain sailing. We are presuming that the 700*l.* is as much a certainty as any interest in these revolutionary times can be. This is not saying very much; but it applies equally to all fortunes, little or great. If the man is only making 700*l.* a year, we recommend to the lady's father the conduct of the cruel parent in the song. The lover speaks:—

> Once I loved you,
> Loved you blindly;
> But your Pa
> Behaved unkindly, > Gave poor Reg> inald his congé
> One day in
> The salle-à-manger.

REGINALD should have his congé—that is, if his 700*l.* be made in the perilous paths of literature or the Bar. If he has a definite salary, a pretty sure thing, and certain to rise, that may be different.

The seven-hundred-pounders will find it difficult either to go out or to entertain their friends. Cabs are costly. Going out to dinner in omnibuses and railways is not easy, though it is attempted by some. If the young persons do dine out, they cannot ask their friends to the stereotyped kind of entertainment to which GORDON justly preferred life in the less salubrious districts of Central Africa. It must be an affair of the Thackerayan leg of mutton and of very few guests. Theatres will be impossible expenses; for the happy pair will live remote from the Strand. Occasionally they may go to some high-perched and low-priced seats. But a vast multitude of men and women are only wearied by the theatre. Wines worthy of the name will be remote luxuries; but to many a little whisky and water is very much more truly agreeable than all the crûs of the Widow of Eastern France. As to rent, there are places within easy reach where a nice old house and garden can be got for 50*l.* a year, and where only your friends that are friends indeed, will come to visit you. Tobacco is not a necessary, but a moderate man that makes his own cigarettes will not be ruined by tobacco. For travelling, it is a positive fact that ladies will gallantly journey by third class and never complain. Indeed, women of the right sort are infinitely less fond than most men of "comfort, the mother of "slavery." We are presuming that the young people are in good health, for your languid invalid had better not marry on 700*l.* a year. It is clear that if the husband has a morally safe 700*l* a year and brains, he can very soon add immensely to the sum, and may speedily be able to see his friends and enjoy himself like other members of the class in which he is born. If he is incapable of such exertions, the young lady had better not marry him. It is certainly not worth her while to practise strict economy, and to flee the world, for the sake of loafing in or near London with an idle man on 700*l.* a year. If the money is safe, and the love is strong, why do they not go and enjoy each other's company in some land where the climate is on a level with the affections? In Corfu you can dwell among the gardens of ALCINOUS, and be rich on 700*l.* a year. What is the attraction, to people who can live out of it, of this dirty rowdy town, where you see millionaires and mendicants everywhere, everywhere starvation and opulence, everywhere hear the ominous cries of the latest and worst news? We mortals are like sheep in our gregariousness, and yearly become worse and more sheep-like. Common sense and comfort and τὸ εὖ ζῆν dictate a migration of the sturdy middle classes. An insane and imitative and pleasureless expensiveness is inherent in the present condition of our life in London. We pine for each other's company so much that many even go to "At Homes" of every melancholy description. We must have champagne where our grandfathers drank quite as agreeable but less expensive liquids. Everybody tries to do what everybody else does. Any young lovers who like can turn their backs on all this, if they have 700*l.* to be happy upon, and if they have a proper contempt for their Aunts. Only they must be quite sure of each other, and of their purpose; and human nature is never quite sure. They must at once make a break with their old habits; with clubs, parties, first-class carriages, flowers, wine, cigars, and all but the very humblest kind of book-collecting. They must get their books from circulating libraries; a painful, all but a degrading, necessity. However, it is believed that this is one of the last aspects of comparative poverty to frighten the youthful and passionate. That is a profane and Americanized version of the poem which runs thus:—

> All lovers young, all lovers must
> Upon Seven Hundred come to bust.

The problem, like others, is quite relative. Many members of the polite middle class can marry on 700*l.* a year. Many others cannot. It is not easy to bring the men and the women who have this art of economy and this contempt of a very stupid kind of world together in matrimony. The man may be of the right sort, the woman may be conventional, or vice versâ. They may have friendly rich uncles, who practically "see them through," or they may be kinless loons. Not every pair who have the pluck to try have the pluck to succeed, and their latter end is much worse than a mere blighted affection, of which everybody is like to have had plenty.

MR. GLADSTONE'S RETURN.

MR. GLADSTONE succeeded in returning to his native country with a little less fuss than was apparently thought necessary when he left it, but still in a sufficiently Gladstonian manner. To reach home quietly and hold the ordinary gathering of Opposition leaders before the meeting of Parliament in the ordinary manner would, of course, have been unworthy of a pillar of the people's hopes. On the whole, however, the reception on arriving at Folkestone, where Mr. GLADSTONE did not, in the proper sense, "arrive" at all—the reception by Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR and Señor ALBERTO NIN at Charing Cross, and the other proceedings, may be regarded with some gratitude as a minimum of ostentation. But an amiable writer in the Times has surely been over-generous in congratulating Mr. GLADSTONE on the unusual directness of his reply to the usual Custom-House demand—a reply faithfully chronicled by the admiring Jeames. The regular answer of ordinary folk in such a case is confined to one word—"No" or "Nothing"; Mr. GLADSTONE'S disclaimer of smuggling appears to have taken seventeen, and must so far be admitted to have been highly characteristic. This remark must not be mistaken for minute criticism of the ungenerous sort; it is rather an acknowledgment of the fact that when great men provide matter for discussion it is both impolite and wrong not to discuss it.

The words which the leader of the Fifth Party addressed to those who congratulated him, in terms somewhat more suggestive of successful jockeyship than of the achievements of a statesman, on his "bold and skilful" leadership were not so very many more than those in which Mr. GLADSTONE disclaimed the possession of "a single article "liable to duty, even a bottle of Eau-de-Cologne." They exhibit, however, the wisdom of the ancients as to the small influence of foreign travel. Mr. GLADSTONE went to find admirers of his Home Rule policy, and he has found them. It was hardly to be supposed that Italian admirers of Mr. GLADSTONE, to say nothing of Parisian Communists, would come to see him with a special mission to impress his mistake upon him. It is, indeed, well known that the wisest Italians, smarting under the effect of centuries of "Home Rule," and the foreign rule which "Home "Rule" always brings after it, thoroughly sympathize with England's uncompromising defence of the Union. But Italy has an amiable sentiment for Mr. GLADSTONE, who long ago did her the honour to make her one of his numerous steps to popularity, and who has never, as in most other cases, had any inducement to kick this particular ladder. If there are fewer enemies of England there than in almost any other Continental country, there is nowhere greater ignorance of English politics. Nor can it be regarded as surprising that Mr. GLADSTONE, who contrives to find support for Home Rule at home, where ninety per cent. of educated and intelligent persons are against Home Rule, should find it abroad. It would also appear that Mr. GLADSTONE has wisely not attempted to injure the beneficial effect of his holiday by any historical or political studies. He left England after proving at Dover that he had constructed for himself a history somewhat like the legendary French school-books, where the French won the battle of Waterloo, and he comes back to Folkestone with a political geography to match, in which Finland is an example of the conduct which England ought to pursue towards Ireland. As it has been frequently pointed out that Finland is a very strong argument against Home Rule, and has only a few years ago illustrated the dangers of that arrangement, Mr. GLADSTONE, if he had been any one else, might have been asked to take his choice of pleading guilty to one of three charges—ignorance, forgetfulness, or disingenuousness. But as it is, he need only plead guilty to being Mr. GLADSTONE.

The state of things to which he returns is of more interest than the stale and ready-made platitudes or fallacies with which he returns to it. It is announced, with what truth we know not, that two more Unionist sheep, Sir THOMAS GROVE and Mr. BENJAMIN HINGLEY, have sought the Gladstonian fold. We were under the impression that both had broken Unionist bounds some time ago; but if their conversion is recent, it is probably due to the Lixnaw murder. Sir THOMAS GROVE and Mr. HINGLEY must have been convinced that the National League is by so much to be preferred to Mr. BALFOUR as the penalty of death, which it can and does enforce, exceeds the penalty of imprisonment. Or perhaps the methods of Canon O'MAHONY and not those of the League executioners have had effect on these legislators. Mr. GLADSTONE'S eyes may also have been rejoiced by the announcement that an address to him in favour of Home Rule, and signed by the clergy, is in process of being drawn up. If so his pleasure is certainly shared by his opponents. All careful readers of their newspapers must have observed the awkward phrase "ministers of religion," which is usually employed in reference to such addresses. The reproach is now to be wiped off by a genuine clerical document in which the enemy shall have no ground to ask whether the signatures are those of Happy Joe and the Converted Cabman. Unluckily, the names of the first signatories and organizers, which have been published, supply the most remarkable comment upon and exemplification of the mental and moral calibre of the Gladstonian party that has yet been provided, frequent and remarkable as such exemplifications have been. The Church of England to-day may not include among her functionaries so large a proportion of the brain of the country as in the days of HOOKER and DONNE, or in the days of BUTLER and BERKELEY. But it was surely unwise of Gladstonians to expose the nakedness of their clerical land by putting forward such a list as this. A second or third rate academic office-holder and schoolbook-compiler like Dr. KITCHIN; the husband of Mrs. JOSEPHINE BUTLER, of whom all that is publicly known is that he is Mrs. JOSEPHINE BUTLER'S husband; and Canon WILBERFORCE, of whom it is known that he is the son of a man of genius, and that he himself is the hare-brained supporter of every crack-brained fad that presents itself—these are three of the most generally known names. And the rest are like unto them, including a popular preacher or two, a member of a distinguished family of cricketers, an ex-colonial Bishop (no collection of this sort, even if it be the committee of a proprietary club, is complete without an ex-colonial Bishop), and two or three of that peculiar class of High Churchmen, if we may sully that most honourable name, whose motto is apparently "high dressing and low thinking." We miss, indeed, some names which ought to be, and we hope soon will be, on the list. The Rev. STEWART HEADLAM has been most unjustly deprived of his proper place of vantage, and those Great Twin Brethren of the Religion of Truth, Messrs. KENNEDY and TUCKWELL, ought not to be left in the lurch. But still the catalogue is very fairly representative, and it tells exactly the same story as the catalogue of supporters of Mr. GLADSTONE in every class, profession, and other division of mankind. Take whatever such division may be preferred, range the Unionists and the Separatists in it against each other, and, with the usual exception here and there, the same result will be found. For Unionism, scholarship, learning, practical experience and ability, weight and consistency of character, professional distinction. For Separatism, popularity-hunting, frothy talk, fadmongering, sciolism, charlatanry. We own that exceptions, if anywhere, might be expected in the Church and the Law, for the attractions of the "better benefice" are strong in each, and Mr. GLADSTONE is still quite a possible Providence. It is, at least, creditable to Divinity that there is to be found among clerical Gladstonians no Sir CHARLES RUSSELL and no Sir HORACE DAVEY—at most a Dr. PANKHURST or a Mr. R. T. REID. Now Mr. GLADSTONE, though his precious balms to the Church have been of a somewhat head-breaking character of late, is believed to be still attached, in his own very peculiar way, to that institution. It must be a little annoying to find that the Church responds to his affection in the persons of Canon BUTLER and Canon WILBERFORCE. He might forgive the opposition as a Christian; it must be terribly hard to pardon the support.

LORD DURHAM AND SIR GEORGE CHETWYND.

We cannot concur in the approval so freely and hastily expressed of the course which the Jockey Club on Tuesday unanimously decided to take. We do not think "it is desirable that the matter in dispute between Sir "GEORGE CHETWYND and Lord DURHAM should be taken "to a court of law," either "with a view to the whole "matter being referred to arbitration" or otherwise. If Sir GEORGE CHETWYND, when he read a report of Lord DURHAM'S speech at the Gimcrack Club, had thought fit to commence legal proceedings, it would, no doubt, have been proper for the Jockey Club to await the result of those proceedings before taking any action of its own. But the question whether a particular owner of racehorses and a particular jockey have "pulled" horses—that is, prevented them from winning in order that they might have an unfair advantage in future handicaps—is one which the Jockey Club must be peculiarly qualified to decide. Indeed, if it cannot deal satisfactorily with such a point as this, the value of the institution is not very easy to see. The appropriate penalty for the offences charged against Sir GEORGE CHETWYND and WOOD is exclusion from the Turf, unless, indeed, there should be material on which to ground a prosecution for conspiracy to defraud. Lord AYLESBURY, as everybody knows, was warned off Newmarket Heath some months ago, and no court of law was troubled with the matter. The reasons for preferring a judicial tribunal to the Club were stated with great clearness by Lord DURHAM, who has shown from the beginning a most praiseworthy readiness to prove the truth of all the accusations he made. Lord DURHAM says that the Stewards of the Jockey Club are not accustomed to the formalities of a trial, that they have no power to take evidence upon oath or to compel the attendance of witnesses and documents—that, in short, they would never get to the bottom of the thing. But the Jockey Club has surely power over its own members and over men whose livelihood depends upon its support. Lord DURHAM must be presumed to have his facts in a presentable shape, and to be capable of establishing affirmatively the truth of his case. He cannot be merely relying upon the hope that certain persons will in the witness-box tell what he believes to be the truth. He must have gone further than that. He must know approximately what his own witnesses will say. There is a good deal of superstition about oaths and the compulsory power of tribunals. Perjury is exceedingly common, and among a hundred people who commit it ninety-nine escape with impunity. You may bring a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink; we do not envy the position of a man who has to justify libel out of the mouths of evasive and reluctant witnesses. It is the duty of the Jockey Club to purify the Turf, as Mr. CHAPLIN maintained in his very forcible speech; and, as a matter of fact, Lord DURHAM at York went far beyond specific imputations upon individuals. He attacked, as Mr. CHAPLIN showed, the morality of the racing world; and far be it from us to say that he was wrong. A judge and jury, or an arbitrator, would be bound to confine themselves to the particular misconduct alleged against Sir GEORGE CHETWYND. The result of the trial could not possibly remove the need for further and more general inquiry.

The motion to which the Jockey Club agreed was naturally and properly recommended by the character of the mover. The Duke of RICHMOND's name is almost a synonym for respectability, and the high political offices which he has filled give him in his old age a sort of proconsular rank. Nevertheless, we cannot follow him in his train of argument. He wants two incompatible things—a legal tribunal and a committee of experts. He suggests that the action to be brought by Sir GEORGE CHETWYND should be, "with the "consent of the parties," referred by a Master to arbitration. Everything in this singular litigation is to be by consent of the parties. Mr. FINLAY, than whom there could be no higher authority, told Sir GEORGE CHETWYND that the speech at the Gimcrack Club gave him no cause of action. Slander, it must be remembered, is not actionable, however defamatory, unless it imputes crime or unprofessional conduct, and Sir GEORGE CHETWYND can hardly be said, in the ordinary sense of the words, to have a profession. Thereupon Lord DURHAM obligingly offers the Stewards copies of his speech, so as to turn the slander into libel, and further undertakes not to raise any question of privilege. He also writes a letter to the Stewards accusing Sir GEORGE CHETWYND of "having connived at serious malpractices "which are contrary to the Rules of racing." What view a court of law may take of all this we do not know. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, who was consulted by Mr. LOWTHER as "a lawyer and an athlete," seems to think it is all right. So does Mr. Justice HAWKINS, who allows himself to be described, somewhat oddly, as the "legal adviser" of the Jockey Club. Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, it will be observed, is curiously guarded in his opinion. "If," he says, "Lord "DURHAM publishes any statement defamatory of Sir G. "CHETWYND or any other persons, the Court would not "decline to entertain an action at the suit of Sir G. CHETWYND "or any other persons libelled; but any such publication "should be made by Lord DURHAM independently and of his "own responsibility, and should not be made under any "circumstances which would be held to be privileged." A more strictly oracular deliverance never proceeded from the Temple. Unfortunately Lord DURHAM, by writing to the Stewards, has made the publication in circumstances which might be held to be privileged, though he has agreed to waive the privilege. If a case presented to the Court in such a manner as we have described be not collusive, then that word must be restricted to mean corrupt and dishonourable collusion, or it will cease to have any intelligible significance whatever. If Sir GEORGE CHETWYND brings an action against Lord DURHAM, as we understand he means to do, he will not have brought it of his own accord to clear his character, or even to recover damages, but under pressure from a voluntary Association, which is anxious to relieve itself of its own proper duties. This seems to us an abuse of legal process. The Queen's Courts, so far as they are civil tribunals, sit to redress the grievances of individuals, not to investigate the purity of the Turf. Sir GEORGE CHETWYND does not wish to resort to them. He demands to be heard by the body to which he and Lord DURHAM both belong. It might have been wiser for Sir GEORGE CHETWYND to have acted otherwise, though in the face of Mr. FINLAY's opinion we do not quite see what else he could have done. But, as he asked for an inquiry by the Jockey Club, he should have got it directly, and not by the circuitous method of a reference to arbitration by consent.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH.

HAVING, to the regret of his friends and his party, resigned his seat in the Cabinet, Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, like many predecessors in similar circumstances, is exulting in his recovered freedom. There is no season at which a zealous but independent supporter is more troublesome to his recent colleagues. The members of a Government are incessantly required, not only to acquiesce in unpalatable decisions, but to conceal in the strictest secrecy their own disapproval of measures for which they are officially responsible. Convictions which have been overruled by external authority become stronger as they find no vent in speech or action; and, when the pressure is removed, the temptation to seek publicity is apparently irresistible. Sir M. HICKS-BEACH has caused some embarrassment to the Government by recent disclosures on Irish questions. It was unnecessary to give the irreconcilable opponents of his party an excuse for claiming an ex-Minister as a dissentient from the policy of the Cabinet. It was easy to foresee that ambiguous language would be misrepresented by suppression and by exaggeration. In his latest speech at Bristol Sir M. HICKS-BEACH once more assumed the character of a candid friend in discussing the measures of general legislation which ought, in his judgment, to be introduced by the Government. Even if his opinions on policy were sound, he must have been aware that they would certainly not be adopted by the Government. According to a well-known dogma, that a thing is true is no reason for saying it. It may be a reason for doing it, if it can conveniently be done. In drawing up a programme for the Session Sir M. HICKS-BEACH by anticipation reflects a censure on the Government for its certain refusal to follow his advice. The consequence is that the party may be weakened and the majority divided, without possibility of advantage to any section of the House of Commons except to the followers of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL. Even wise counsels may in this manner do practical mischief, and Sir M. HICKS-BEACH's recommendations are much the reverse of wise.

Three or four years ago he was regarded as an orthodox Conservative, who might perhaps, in case of need, be employed to counteract the supposed laxity of the actual leader of the party. Eventually, for some reason which has never been explained, except as a result of personal jealousy, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE was deposed, or sent upstairs; and Sir M. HICKS-BEACH took his place, to be in turn superseded by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. By this time the relations among the leaders of the party had become simpler, steadier, and more intelligible; and there is no reason to suspect Sir M. HICKS-BEACH of personally ambitious designs. He may probably, as he becomes accustomed to a voluntary exclusion from office, be less impulsive and restless. The party is not in a condition to dispense with obedience to discipline. The supporters of the Government will have enough to do in defending it against factious attacks from the apologists of disorder in London and of rebellion in Ireland. It will also be necessary to assist in the construction of a sound measure of Local Government; and it is possible that there may be important discussions on finance. Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, passing lightly over inevitable duties and difficulties, proposes that the Conservative party should plunge into an abyss of revolutionary legislation. Many amateur politicians have made similar suggestions, in the hope of competing with the Liberal party for popular favour. Their general policy corresponds to the Western operation of burning the prairie in front for the purpose of extinguishing the conflagration behind. If the Conservatives could be induced to set fire to Church and State, there would be so much less for the Radicals to destroy when they succeeded to power. That bookish theorists should approve a suicidal enterprise is less surprising than that a veteran of long Parliamentary and official experience should ever take these projects into consideration. Sir M. HICKS-BEACH might be entitled to understand that Conservatism is worthless except for the conservation of established institutions. Meddling and tampering with their characteristic traditions facilitates incendiary projects. If additional arguments against destructive Conservatism were required, it might be worth while to remember that the proposed change of front must be executed in the presence of the most skilful of Parliamentary managers. Mr. GLADSTONE is not the man to sacrifice his own opportunities of popularity for the benefit of his detested antagonists. As soon as Sir M. HICKS-BEACH put his hand to the constitutional fabric in the way of so-called reform, Mr. GLADSTONE would make his puny efforts ridiculous by a violent overthrow of half the edifice. He has on former occasions showed his skill in baffling half-hearted competitors. In 1867 he swept away Mr. DISRAELI'S fancy franchises and lateral extensions of the suffrage, and created the uniform constituencies which in the next year restored him to office. His mysterious offer to Lord SALISBURY of support in a Home Rule measure would have enabled him to repeat the tactics which had simplified the Reform Bill. If the Conservatives had accepted his overture, Mr. GLADSTONE would have used them to pull the chestnuts out of the fire, and it would then have been easy to exclude them from any share in the proceeds of the operation.

According to Sir M. HICKS-BEACH'S plan, the Conservatives are to strengthen their hold on the confidence of the country by undertaking in the present Session the reconstruction of the Established Church and the House of Lords. It may be admitted that the proposal is so comprehensive that the disruption of the party which would certainly follow would be the least important of its consequences. The revolutionary section of the Liberal party would naturally take the opportunity to move amendments which would be fatal if they were carried, and dangerous when they were discussed. The reform of the House of Lords has often been talked of, but no practical scheme has ever been devised, and Sir M. HICKS-BEACH'S selection of one among many possible changes shows that he has an inadequate conception of the importance of the policy which he would introduce. He thinks it worth while to return to the obsolete and trivial contrivance of creating a certain number of life-peers. Such a measure, if it stood by itself, would have no serious result, and, indeed, it is doubtful whether there would be any considerable number of qualified candidates for such promotion. A much more important consequence of interference with the constitution of the House of Lords would be that the abolition of two estates of the realm would at once become, and would remain, an open question. The Government would by the proposed measure justly alienate the confidence of many of its supporters; and, when it was consequently driven from office, there would be no longer an insuperable obstacle to the establishment of Irish Home Rule. Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, and any allies whom he might enlist, would have the satisfaction of knowing that they had established their claim to the character of subversive Liberals. His appetite for change would, nevertheless, not be fully satisfied. Not content with disturbing the foundations of the Constitution, Sir M. HICKS-BEACH thinks that the Government would do well to remodel the Church. In both cases the title which is derived from prescription and usage would be invalidated; and there is not the remotest reason to believe that in return the Establishment would be made more popular, as it would assuredly be deteriorated in character. The enemies of the Church have, for some time past, suspended general attacks on the Church, perhaps because they think it more advisable to begin with the abolition of four of the existing dioceses. It is from a Conservative quarter that the present agitation is to proceed. It is true that two or three injudicious prelates have proposed mischievous innovations for the purpose of making the clergy more clerical, and of severing the intimate connexion between the Church and general society. But speeches and motions in the House of Lords are comparatively innocuous; and the Ministers have not been so foolish as to compromise their position by wanton ecclesiastical innovations.

No want is less urgent than additional security against the admission of unfit persons to orders. The temptations of a clerical life are by no means excessive; and it is notorious that professional and general opinion enforces on the clergy, if they require such compulsion, morality, decorum, and parochial activity. Many of the best of them are appointed to their benefices by private patrons, and the system of lay patronage has done much to prevent the Anglican priesthood from degenerating into a caste. It is, of course, intolerable to bigots and fanatics that the clergy should be Englishmen and gentlemen, taking a legitimate interest in the ordinary affairs of the world. Private, and in a less degree episcopal, patronage has done much to counteract the evil tendencies of professional isolation. It is true that livings are not always bestowed on the most popular preachers, or even on the most laborious of curates; but the general result is satisfactory, and it is well known that, in the few benefices which are liable to popular election, scandals are exceptionally prevalent. Not satisfied with the other methods which he has unconsciously devised for the overthrow of his party, Sir M. HICKS-BEACH would advise the Ministers, if they escape from the catastrophe of their attack on the House of Lords, to bring in a Bill for turning the Church upside down by giving the parishioners, according to the common formula, a voice in the appointment of incumbents. It is evident that a veto on nominations would be rapidly converted into direct patronage. The bishop has already the power and the duty of rejecting an unfit candidate. The parishioners would rather consider his appearance, his more or less polished manners, and perhaps his political opinions. It might almost be a question whether a Church Establishment would be worth preserving under conditions so degrading; yet the main objection to Sir M. HICKS-BEACH'S proposal is, not that it is utterly bad in itself, but that it would inevitably lead to Disestablishment, having, in the first instance, destroyed the present Ministry and perhaps effected Home Rule. It may be hoped that Sir M. HICKS-BEACH will, in his place in Parliament, be more cautious than on provincial platforms.

THE CARDINAL'S DILEMMA.

IT is never easy for any man, even for a Cardinal Archbishop, to know when he has said enough, and it is particularly difficult when he has talked himself into a logical fix, and has to prove that he has neither committed himself to the support of something mischievous nor yet been talking nonsense. Dr. MANNING has been sitting and writing between the horns of this dilemma for the whole of the past week. He has wriggled manfully, but it is needless to say in vain, and he must finally be left on one of those two horns. The CARDINAL has had a great deal to say of the kind usually said by gentlemen in his unfortunate position. He has given little bits of autobiography with superfluous apologetic introductions. He has been profuse in declarations that he never meant to hurt the feelings of a critic who never complained that his feelings were hurt. He has answered charges never brought against him. He has launched into ingenious disquisitions on the nature and use of capital. All of this is very pretty and very proper for the purpose of confusing the point at issue, but it does not get the CARDINAL out of hearing of the horns of the dilemma which are blowing at his door, as the Irish-American orator put it. Dr. MANNING is accused by Lord SALISBURY and by a Correspondent of the Times signing himself "G." of having proposed to do a given mischievous thing. He has only to prove either that the thing is not mischievous or that he did not suggest it. Apparently neither of these courses is open to him. Instead of one demonstration or the other, Dr. MANNING gives a good deal of discursive talk, and tries to prove that something undistinguishable to the naked eye from the mischief aforesaid is really quite different. In the course of his letters he has started some side-issues which might lead to pretty arguments. One of the most fruitful was his obiter dictum that every criminal was once an innocent child, whom Society has corrupted. It is by no means clear to us that the CARDINAL has not committed himself here to the Pelagian heresy and come smartly into conflict with St. AUGUSTINE, whom the Church reveres. But he must be left to fight that out with the POPE.

It is always well to take an observation, as DANIEL WEBSTER sensibly insisted, in order to find out your longitude and latitude after a storm of talk, to discover what the matter to be proved or disproved originally was. The CARDINAL gave it as his opinion that at such a time as this there ought to be work for "unemployed, honest, deserving "men." Lord SALISBURY called this the advocacy of "national workshops," and gave his reasons for using that phrase. "G.," who had already drawn the CARDINAL'S fire under another signature, came forward with a series of practical questions. He wanted—and many others of us want—to know how this work is to be provided and what it is to be. Is it to be remunerative work undertaken on business terms and at the market rate of wages? If so, how does the CARDINAL propose to create it? Dr. MANNING has been forced to confess that he cannot make remunerative work out of nothing, and that what he wishes to do is to give the "unemployed, honest, deserving men" something to labour at for something less than the market rate of wages. But, then, he only sets himself another list of questions to answer. How does he propose to supply this without imposing a burden on the community which in the long run will augment the very evil he wishes to cure by wasting a part of the national capital on useless work, and so diminishing the fund from which all labour is paid? This is a thoroughly practical question, and is not answered in the least by quotations which prove that Mr. MILL had a slightly sentimental leaning towards Socialism—which we knew—that he was skilful in scoring off disputants on the other side—which is a matter of common knowledge—and that he was sometimes, for so very able a man, strangely deficient in a sense of the ridiculous—a fact of which we were well aware. Dr. MANNING has certainly shown "G." that an eminent economist can be quoted on his side, and that is a warning to people who enter into discussions with trained disputants to be careful of what they say. But the CARDINAL's own argument looks no stronger than before. Dr. MANNING continually quotes the Poor-law of ELIZABETH as a proof that his wish to find paid work for the unemployed is practical. We should prefer to say that the law of ELIZABETH is a proof that Government once tried to do what the CARDINAL recommends, and that its history affords a convincing demonstration of the truth of "G.'s" contention—that all such efforts must in the long run do more harm than good. The old Poor-law was quite as efficient in keeping down the general rate of wages—and thereby harming the whole labouring class—as in helping the unemployed. Its indirect influence in the perpetuation of a pauper population, in the encouragement of bastardy, and the discouragement of thrift is too notorious to need pointing out again. The CARDINAL's critics insist that he wishes to revert to a bad system which we have given up long ago. He does not in the least prove that his proposal is not bad by asserting that it has been tried before. Nobody accuses him of asking for something entirely new, but of asking for something mischievous. No amount of demonstration that it has been tried before will alter its character.

The CARDINAL endeavours to avoid the charge of Socialism by defining the word in his own way. There is little profit in arguing whether certain measures should be called Social legislation or Socialism, but whatever name is preferred, nobody can be in any doubt as to the tendency of such words as these:—"The poor possess nothing but their inheritance "of natural right. If the Poor-law of ELIZABETH had "not been passed, the English land laws would scarcely "have survived until this day. From HENRY VIII. till "CHARLES II. the possession of land had been passing from "the many to the few. In proportion to the population it "was never held in so few hands as at this day. The "yeomen and statesmen and the forty-shilling freeholders "are gone. It is a grave danger to treat the natural right of "the poor as a popular delusion. If the rich should be taught "to deny this natural right, a habit of mind full of misconception and unnatural would be formed in them, and if "the poor were to know that this last natural right in "themselves and their children were denied, a dangerous "resentment would inevitably arise." Natural right to what? To be preserved from death by starvation? That is secured him by the Poor-laws already. Or is his natural right to include the right to a part of the land and to paid work? If it is this last, then the CARDINAL, let him wriggle and chop logic as much as he pleases, is talking Socialism. We will concede to him the Socialistic tendency of the Elizabethan Poor-law if he likes, and are quite content to take its influence as proof of the mischievous working of all such legislation. Fine phrases, declamation, and appeals to sentiment will not alter the fact that when population increases faster than the means of subsistence the result must be poverty. This is no reason why any community should do so cruel and so unchristian a thing as to leave people already born into the world to die of want of food; and the law, as Cardinal MANNING knows, provides that they need not so die. But it is a very good reason why we should not adopt a course which would infallibly tend to increase the pressure of population on means of subsistence, and thereby perpetuate and extend the evil. If the CARDINAL thinks this view headless and heartless, he can try to show by argument how a better course can be taken. Frothy declamation will not do, nor vague talk about natural rights, nor yet threatenings of dangerous resentments. This sort of chatter is no proof that the speaker, whoever he is, has a livelier sympathy with the unemployed than others who use less rhetoric. It may be a proof of looseness of soul, or even that he who uses it is of opinion that it would be a good thing to dish the Social Democratic Federation. Is it possible that some notion of the sort has been floating in the air of the ARCHBISHOP'S House, Westminster, S.W.?

THE LAST SPEECHES OF THE RECESS.

THE oratorical campaign of the recess has been not unfitly closed by speeches from Mr. GOSCHEN, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH. It is, of course, desired by the leaders on either side that the last words addressed to their armies before entering upon the real battle of the Session should be as inspiriting as possible; and while Mr. GOSCHEN'S power of animating the fight is well known and highly valued by Unionists, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT is for the Gladstonians—well, "the best they can do." The speeches of the two differ as the language of the victorious military commander of real life differs from that of the theatrical variety of the same; but those who cannot get the real thing must, of course, put up with the best attainable counterfeit. If Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S rhetoric does not, like Mr. GOSCHEN'S, breathe the very spirit of confidence, it is amply filled out—as amply, indeed, as that of a Biblical hero, whose style and bearing generally is not unlike his own—with all the phrases in which confidence would naturally express itself. He is always inviting his enemy to come to him, that he may give his flesh to the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field; and, though this sort of thing is rated at its true value in the House of Commons—where, indeed, GOLIATH shows a good-humoured consciousness of and acquiescence in the fact that no one takes him seriously—we suppose that there are people in the provinces, some, perhaps, even in Sir WILLIAM'S own constituency, with whom it "goes down." Considered solely from the histrionic point of view, his last performance before the good people of Derby was quite among his more successful efforts. It was not so conspicuous, perhaps, for what, in the scanty vocabulary of his earlier admirers, used once to be called "epigram"; but the BOBADIL note of bluster was better maintained throughout than it sometimes is, and one felt that the simpler and less experienced of the orator's hearers might really have been enabled by it to enjoy for a brief hour the illusion that their side is winning.

Realities, however, should take precedence of theatric display, and Mr. GOSCHEN'S speech at the Fishmongers' Hall, after his presentation with the freedom of their Company, claims the first attention. Both the place of his entertainment and the persons of his entertainers were of auspicious association. It was through the City of London that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER first entered public life, nearly a quarter of a century since, and it is from one of the not too numerous Liberal guilds of that City that he has now received an honour which implies that, in the opinion of its donors at all events, he is as good a Liberal to-day as he was four-and-twenty years ago. Anyhow, the list of Liberal statesmen, from GREY to RUSSELL, to which Mr. GOSCHEN'S name as a freeman of the Company has now been added, contains names which posterity is perhaps likely to remember somewhat longer, and to connect more closely with the famous political achievements of the party, than those of Mr. GLADSTONE'S present associates. The guest of the evening, however, had naturally only an incidental reference to make to the party creed held in common by his hosts and himself. He spoke chiefly as a Unionist and of the cause of the Union; and his report of that cause and its prospects was as all of us, not even excluding (in their secret hearts) the Gladstonians themselves, were well aware that it must and would be, of a highly encouraging nature. It was full of that best sort of encouragement which reports convey to those who consider not merely the tone which pervades them but the facts which they contain. If, said Mr. GOSCHEN, our friends the Gladstonians are content with the results of the political conflict thus far, "so in all humility are we; and there "are few Unionists, Conservative or Liberal" (we ourselves venture to add that there are, in reality, few Separatists, English or Irish), "who are not disposed to think that, at "the moment, we are stronger than we were a year ago. "We had an arduous Parliamentary session; we have had "an equally arduous Parliamentary recess." Ministers are satisfied with the session because "it taught them that they "could rely upon the alliance which is at the bottom of the "present strength of HER MAJESTY'S Government," and they have equally good reason to be satisfied with the results of the recess. The Gladstonians, as Mr. GOSCHEN reminds us, intended in the course of the last six months to sweep the Unionist party away. They intended, he said, to "raise "the country against us"; "to create an agitation so strong "and so certain to be successful that when Parliament "met we should bow our diminished heads, and should in "all humility ask Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. PARNELL, and his "friends to relieve us of the responsibility which we were "no longer able to bear." It was unnecessary to add that that is not the spirit in which Ministers are about to meet Parliament. The contrary is evident enough from the note of cheerful confidence which rings through every speech they have delivered. It is quite clear—it must be admitted even by the enemy—that, whether the cause of the Union is or is not winning everywhere, it is the strong and ever-strengthening conviction of Unionists themselves, from the chief Ministers down to the obscurest of their followers, that such is the case.

What facts has Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT got to oppose to this conviction? Words to assail it with we know he has—in abundance—but what facts? When he has done cracking jokes on Lord SALISBURY'S "tobogganing" metaphor a metaphor which implicitly contains all the witticisms, such as they are, which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT seemed to regard as additions of his own—when this and similar diversions come to an end, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S speech, for all practical purposes, is at an end also. Occasionally, indeed, the speaker threw out some casual and conventional party taunt, or rehearsed the "regulation" article of faith about "the country being on the side of" whatever retrogression it may suit Mr. GLADSTONE'S satellites to represent as progress; but no jot or tittle of positive evidence was offered in proof of this latter assertion, nor did Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT even venture to explain away the negative evidence which makes, as Mr. GOSCHEN has insisted so strongly, for the opposite conclusion. It is true we are treated to the thrice-told tale of Catholic Emancipation, Parliamentary Reform, and all the rest of it, with the supposed inductive inference therefrom that whatever policy the Liberals support and the Conservatives oppose must ultimately be adopted by the country. At this time of day it would be disrespectful to the public intelligence to labour the two severally complete replies to this; first, that the question whether it is the Liberal party which is supporting Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy is the very question in dispute; and secondly, that the political ancestors—not of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: he has none, unless it be RIGBY or BUBB DODINGTON—but of those with whom Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT is now acting (a word appropriate in any meaning), can hardly be allowed to reckon their hits without their misses. Until they have explained away the awkward fact that they have been for more than two centuries opposed continuously to the existence of the Church of England, and, intermittently, to that of the monarchy, their success in winning over the country to their views has been scarcely uniform enough to form the basis of a safe induction. Let us invite Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT to drop history, and, descending to contemporary fact, to state what grounds he has for thinking that Mr. GLADSTONE has made good his lieutenant's singular boast, and proved himself so much wiser than the "Roman fool" in his choice between the victrix and the victa causa. "I "was going," said Sir WILLIAM proudly, "to apply to the "two statesmen a saying which was applied in ancient "times to two great opponents" (CATO and the Gods?), "and I would say that the conquering cause commended "itself to Mr. GLADSTONE and the vanquished to Lord "SALISBURY." No doubt the conquering cause has always commended itself to Mr. GLADSTONE—or, rather, he has commended himself to it whenever he has correctly discerned it, which, we admit, he has pretty frequently done. But where is the evidence that he has correctly discerned it here in this case? Where, we ask with Mr. GOSCHEN, are the indignant crowds which were to have risen against the Crimes Act and swept the Government from office? Et responsum est ab omnibus, &c. They are not to be found. The country is perfectly calm under all the froth and fury of the Gladstonian stump-orators; and upon them lies the burden of showing that its calmness is other than the tranquillity of content.

The interest of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH'S address to the Constitutional Union on Procedure Reform has been rather impaired since it was delivered by the references to the question in the House of Commons. From these it is to be gathered that the Government do not contemplate any very considerable changes or extensions of the present Rules, and it is therefore unnecessary to follow Sir MICHAEL through the five divisions of his subject. He did, however, refer at the commencement of his remarks to the particular question to which Ministers, we imagine, are directing their chief attention—that, namely, of providing some more effective means of repressing disorderly behaviour and disgraceful language in the House of Commons—and here he is to be congratulated on having been the first to recognize the right and duty of the House to push its disciplinary action, if necessary, in these cases beyond the limits of a mere suspension of the offenders. The spirit displayed by those members who "take a pride in defying the "House," and perhaps "even desire to bring it into "contempt and disgrace," cannot, as he justly says, be adequately dealt with by any change in the Rules of Procedure, which can do no more than check its manifestation. It must be punished, not through the offending member, but through his constituency. If a member disgrace himself by continual conduct of that sort, the House of Commons, if it chooses, may expel that member. If the constituency persists in returning similar offenders, the House may decline to allow the issue of a fresh writ for that constituency, even, if necessary, for the whole duration of a Parliament. "And I must say I feel," added Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, "that one instance of an exercise of "the power of the House in that way would do very much "indeed to make insolence and obstruction less popular "with Irish constituencies than they are at the present "time." We think so too; and, as it seems more than probable that, in the case of one notorious member, at any rate, the House will soon be confronted with the necessity of such action, it would do well to familiarize itself therewith by antecedent discussion.

NAVAL ADMINISTRATION.

THE quarrel over the navy started by Lord CHARLES BERESFORD'S resignation has died at an unexpectedly early age. It suffered from a congenital want of stamina, and turned out, after all, not to have vivacity enough to preserve it from extinction. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON had the easy task of slaying the slain when he made his promised answer to his late subordinate last week. Lord CHARLES and his friends had done the First Lord's work for him already when they had once acknowledged that the Civil Head of the Admiralty must in the long run be master in the office. Since on their own showing the First Lord was not bound to take the advice of experts, simply because it was their advice, they, for their part, were bound to show that he differed from them on some point of vital importance. They have conspicuously failed to do anything of the kind. It turns out that the ostensible cause of quarrel was, whether certain naval officers were to be paid on what Lord CHARLES himself considers an extravagant scale. The cause of dispute was the more unhappily chosen that it had already been disposed of in the office, and was revived by Lord CHARLES himself, in what he calls "Saxon," and what we are inclined to guess was the style of Mr. CHUCKS. Let us hope the correspondence will be laid before Parliament.

We have still to learn what it is exactly that the naval officers wish to have done to improve the Admiralty. Admiral Sir G. HORNBY, Admiral Sir G. ELLIOT, Admiral Sir R. SPENCER ROBINSON, and admirals not a few have written to explain; but, after all, we remain in as much doubt as before. These officers agree that the First Lord must be captain of the ship, and yet they wish to keep him, in some way or another, under check, if not under control, by a council of experts. The two wishes are hardly compatible. Sir R. SPENCER ROBINSON expressly declares that "nothing would be allowed in them [i.e. the experts] "resembling petulance, fault-finding, or insubordination." But who is to be judge? Sir R. SPENCER ROBINSON must surely know that a resolute First Lord—a man of PALMERSTON'S self-will or Lord DALHOUSIE'S—would very soon make his Sea Lords understand that any action of theirs which in any way hampered him would be considered as petulance, fault-finding, and insubordination. The only alternative to the absolute authority of the First Lord would be some entire change of system which would put the government of the navy into other hands. It does not appear, however, that the Admirals ask for this. No doubt a wise First Lord will be largely guided by the opinions of naval officers; but it is not pretended that Lord GEORGE HAMILTON has neglected the advice of his experts. Sir R. SPENCER ROBINSON complains that we have no security that his successors will be equally competent. But what guarantee can we have? The Admiral must know that the value of every system depends on the men who administer it. Government by experts is no security for good administration. The French army has always been under the control of generals, and yet all the world knows that before 1870 it was allowed to fall into the most disgraceful state, and was found, like the Spanish forces described by the Duke of WELLINGTON, to be wanting in everything at the critical moment. The French navy is administered by experts, and yet it is certain that it suffers from some of the worst defects of our own administration. Money is wasted in the dockyards, ships take an inordinate time to build, torpedo-boats fastened with lead rivets are supplied. The Chamber cuts down the Estimates without mercy. Under the same system the same things might happen here. The only security against them is the existence of a high standard of honour and of faculty for doing good work in the Admiralty. These things may be found, and, by general consent, are found at present in our own administration. There is only one security for their permanence, and it is the firmly expressed resolution of the country to have a good navy. As long as politicians have to count with that, every Cabinet will take care not to incur unpopularity by neglect. Parliament will vote the money the country is willing to spend. Naval officers can do their share of the work by settling in their own minds what a good navy ought to be and explaining the same publicly. They are ready enough to write letters to the papers. As for schemes of reorganization, enough money and time has been wasted on them already.

A SUGGESTION TO THE ABLE EDITOR.

IT may be taken as acknowledged on all hands that Prince BISMARCK has made a very interesting speech. We all waited for it, and a great many of us have been commenting on it. That being so, why were we not allowed to have it as delivered? We do not assert, as Cardinal MANNIN might, that the reader of the daily papers has a "natural right" to the very words used by Unser REICHSKANZLER, but only that since so much was given on the subject, the space might have been occupied with the PRINCE's own words. It cannot be any dearer to telegraph a speech than to telegraph general comment and report.

Still, if several columns of close print full of the PRINCE's eloquence are more than the public can be expected to face, we might at least be spared columns of vague reports of the hazy remarks of insignificant third persons. It is useless to say that nobody need read these things. The gentleman who is looking for facts in his penny paper must read them, if only to be sure that there really is nothing in them. The able editor would surely give up publishing mere gabble if he only knew what emotions of rage and fury fill the bosom of his best customers when they find they have paid for this sort of thing:—

Madrid: Tuesday night.

Commenting upon the speech of Prince Bismarck, the Madrid papers echo the impressions in political and diplomatic circles that a conflict between Russia and Germany cannot long be averted. The majority of Spaniards would prefer to remain neutral in European complications.

It may be very right in the Madrid papers to "echo the "impressions" of diplomatic circles. In the fine dry air of Madrid they are probably audible, though here the description suggests nothing so much as unpaid attachés playing quoits. But why should we have to listen to the echo of an echo? A journalist who was fit for anything could make up volumes of such foreign correspondence while his editor with moderate haste might tell a hundred. What does it matter whether they want to remain neutral in European complications at Madrid? Is the Republic of San Marino convulsed? Are they disturbed in the Valley of Andorra? The opinion of the Continent may be important, and it is well to know it; but it is not vague talk reported in a condensed form from outlying places, neither is it the opinion of M. A. or M. B. who signs his articles in one or the other French paper. We never have understood why the man on the knifeboard did not arise and address the editor on the subject of these quotations. "I pay my money," he might say, "and make "your paper a good advertising medium, in order to know "what is going on—not because I want to hear what quite "ordinary French journalists are saying, and in translations "too. If it were RIVAROL or the Chevalier VON GENTZ "there would be some advantage in getting their opinion; "but they are dead, and as for these persons you bore me "withal, who are they? In ordinary times one must "put up with them. You may use them to fill up space, "as HORACE GREELEY telegraphed the Old Testament to "keep control of the wire from Niagara; but, when Prince "BISMARCK is speaking, it is really too much to be interrupted by French journalists. They are nobody, and re"present nothing. They have nothing to say which a "hundred gentlemen in Fleet Street could not say. As for "their manner of saying it, the merit of that disappears in "translation. When I want news, do not give me un"digested lumps of French leading article. If you do, I "will ——." What the man on the knifeboard could do we do not very well know; but, if what he means is that he would transfer his subscription to the first daily which would confine its foreign correspondence to news only, report the news in proportion to its importance, remember that politics are not everything, and that the talk of journalists is not politics, he has our entire sympathy.

THE SEA-URCHIN.

MAN is, no doubt, the happier and better for most things that come out of the sea, but unfortunately in the British islands prejudice cuts us off from more than half the joy and comfort which we might have. On the Mediterranean coasts, however, the people are wiser, and all manner of assorted sea creatures are eaten under the name of fruits de mer, coquillages, and frutte di mare; they are almost all good, but our present object is to sing the praises of the type of the Echinodermata. The sea-urchin—sea-hedgehog, or sea-egg, as he is called on our coasts—most people who have been to the sea-side know him by sight, either in the form of a sort of dark but vividly coloured horse-chestnut, or, when the spines are nibbled off, in the form of a misshapen, beautifully carved egg. But few who have not been on the Mediterranean shore know this creature at table, and perhaps he there shines more brilliantly than elsewhere. The flattened side of this animal's shell having been cut out with a pair of scissors, and the rest having been given a sluice out with sea-water, there is revealed to our sight a delicate enamel saucer, with radiating leaves of orange-coloured—shall we call it jelly, or what?—sticking to the sides. This must be carefully scraped out with a teaspoon, or wiped out with a piece of crumb of bread and eaten. There are always bold persons who, in attempting to describe unknown food, will cheerfully say that it tastes like something else, as if anything tasted like anything else. Such a one would probably say that sea-urchins tasted like oysters, or like periwinkles, or tasted of the sea—and perhaps he would not be wrong. We prefer to say that they taste like sea-urchins. On the French coast they have the advantage of costing from one penny to twopence the dozen, and a dozen with bread and butter make a very good lunch. This is a merit, that the urchin is very good to eat; but that is not an end of him. You save one sea-urchin from your meal, and put him in a pot of sea-water; soon he begins to put out a number of fine threads, each ending in a tiny sucker about the size of a pin's head, and lays hold of the sides of the pot and hauls himself about. Then, too, when there is an end of him, you can puzzle over the beautiful and complicated bony framework of his jaws, which naturalists choose for some occult reason to call the lantern of Aristotle. Plain folk only know of the lantern of Diogenes. Again, the enjoyer of the sea-urchin, if fortunate enough to possess a good magnifying glass, can look for the madreporiform tubercle, and whilst shuddering at the name can admire the beauty of this filter by which the water is cleared from grit. The water passing through this has to be perfectly limpid, for it is used in the complicated hydraulic machinery by which the thread-like sucker-ended mooring and warping lines are worked—we regret to say that this beautiful apparatus is called the Ambulacral system. Again, in the morning when it is warm, but the sun not too high, if it is a calm day let the student consider the subject of his study from the point of view of the sportsman—let him take a boat and say that he wishes to faire quelques oursins (if he be in France). He will be provided with the necessary instrument, which consists of a long pole, at the end of which are a series of strong iron prongs, forming what would probably be called in a neighbouring island "a fork in the shape of a spoon." The fishing-ground is some spot in from three to five feet of water, with a rocky and slightly weedy bottom. On reaching the ground a sharp look-out must be kept, and if the water be at all ruffled with the wind, a few drops of oil must be sprinkled on it from time to time from a feather to ensure a transparent surface. When the game is sighted the fork part of the instrument comes into play to scrape the urchin out from his lair under the rocks, for he seldom is weak enough to walk about on a smooth surface; when the quarry is perfectly loosened, the fork assumes the function of a spoon, and the game is raised to the surface, and deposited in the bottom of the boat. The sport sounds tame, but in reality, owing to the difficulty of excavating some particularly fine specimen from his rock cranny, the movement of the boat, and the occasional spilling of a sea-urchin out of the spoon just as the surface is reached, is most exciting. Perhaps the excitement is mild, but it is quite enough on a fine warm day, floating on a violet sea, with a sapphire sky overhead, and a letter in the pocket dated two days ago from London saying, "We are having very fine weather here now; no frost, and since yesterday but little fog; indeed, I have been able to go out several times last week, &c." Nor must it be imagined that the sea-urchin forms the only game to be met with in these happy hunting-grounds, and to be taken by the simple instrument we have described. Sometimes, in trying to dig out a sea-urchin, a whole patch of weed will be seen to move and develop legs. A pang of joy passes through the heart of the experienced fisher, and he uses his utmost skill to spoon up what he knows to be a spider crab. If he succeeds, he knows that he will have an excellent delicacy to add to his meal. We may also take sea-anemones, good for Bouillabaisse; Venus's ears, known in these waters as Oreilles de St. Pierre, good to stew; varicoloured weed and quaint star-fish; and occasionally a large octopus may be partly coaxed, partly wrenched from the rocks, and may be stewed, fried, or added to Bouillabaisse. But, above all, the sport is pursued in fine, calm weather only, in a boat, and there is no need to hurry or to strike quickly, or generally put oneself out.

DE MORTUIS.

We should be very sorry to find that, by mere unwittingness, we killed that excellent and veteran dramatist Mr. Maddison Morton last week if the accident had not brought out the eminent and beneficent powers of Mr. Punch, who has promptly made Mr. Morton alive again. In one sense, neither his nor our exertions were required, for the author of Box and Cox is immortal already. But it may be a warning to evildoers to show how easily we can kill; and it cannot but be good for morals to show Mr. Punch in an attitude which was not exactly that of his earlier and pre-literary days. He used, if perambulating comedians do not malign him, to be rather addicted to—let us say to the other proceeding. But Moral Progress has turned him from a man- or at least child- and wife-slayer, much in danger of the hangman, and even of worse avengers, into a resuscitator (by which Heaven forbid that we should mean a resurrection-man). And, to drop metaphor, we are very much obliged to Mr. Punch for correcting our mistake, very glad that it was a mistake, and very ready to apologize to Mr. Morton for anticipating his immortality. We only wish that all men of his age could look back on such unblemished services to the public as he can.

But this little unintentional homicide, which the magic wand of Mr. Punch has happily set right, makes us think of certain other things where homicide has also been committed, and where resuscitation seems more difficult, though the things and persons in question still walk abroad after a fashion and simulate a ghastly life. What shall we say, for instance, of the knowingness of Mr. Labouchere, who is nothing if not knowing? Here is Mr. Labouchere, in his periodical of this week, asking why colleges which are hard up, and St. John's College, Oxford, in particular, do not economize by curtailing their ridiculous expense in wine? Mr. Labouchere, we think, was a University man, which makes this utterance more surprising. Does he really think that, if the lamented Alderman Falkiner, who never went to bed without six bottles of claret under his belt, were a fellow of a college, and pursued that practice, the cost of six bottles per diem of '64 Lafite, bought dogmatically, and interest charged at five per cent., would come upon the college funds? Is he unaware that the sole expense which comes upon those funds is the first cost, which is repaid as the wine is drunk? If he is unaware of all this, what becomes of the knowingness of Mr. Labouchere? If he is aware of it, what becomes of his—let us say trustworthiness? But, perhaps, when colleges and crowned heads are in question these things do not matter; and so Mr. Labouchere's knowingness, in a sense, still survives.

There are other entities of which we cannot take quite so cheerful a view. What poppy or mandragora, or rather—for these are not the right things—what treacle or mithridate shall ever antidote the poison which has been self-administered to the reputations of divers politicians in these last months? We do not speak of Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and their likes—the bubble reputation has burst long ago there, and nobody but a lunatic would seek to mend it. But who shall revivify Sir George Trevelyan's consistency, Sir William Harcourt's wit, Mr. Blunt's Arab chivalry, and many other snows of yester year? Will Mr. Punch touch them with his wand? Although Mr. Punch has sometimes lately shown an inscrutable tendency to favour that same Irish blackguardism which once he represented as kicked across the Ocean, and more recently as lurking in its proper form behind a curtain—we don't think he would or could do it. And if he cannot, who shall?

"Now, what can they mean by denying these things?" said an innocent person the other day in reference to the attempts of the Separatists and their leaders to deny that within less than half as many months as there were votes to gain by the denial the said Separatist leaders and organs were accusing the Parnellites of exactly those crimes of which they now declare them totally guiltless. That is a question which can only be answered by some such theory of stone-deadness as that which we have hinted at. Sir William Harcourt thinks that his own utterances when he spoke not six years ago on a certain Crimes Bill are as dead as the shivers which he underwent in consequence of certain consequences of that Bill. Mr. Gladstone thinks that his imprisonment of Mr. Parnell is dead, that his remarks on that imprisonment are dead, that his legislation against the Land League is dead, and that there is no danger of anybody making it alive again. As for Sir George Trevelyan, the charitable have another theory for him. Mere boredom is, no doubt, the secret of Sir George's apparently eccentric behaviour on the Home Rule question. At the beginning thereof who so attentive, who so heroic as Sir George? But time goes on, and the same old question continues. "I say," says Sir George, "let's have something else." And he determines that, as far as he is concerned, he will. Still it appears to be the general impression, and not merely, as Mr. Gladstone would like to have it, the impression in "the South of England," that all these sayings and doings of the distinguished persons referred to are not dead and may possibly go on rising in judgment against them—a most improper and ungentlemanly thing, doubtless, of bygone words and things to do, and yet somehow it is done. On Thursday last, for instance, men saw a Parliament meeting with Mr. Gladstone, who ruthlessly crushed twenty years ago the Fenianism which was an almost respectable thing compared with the League of Murder, who imprisoned Irish leaders by dozens only the other day, and who received with modest smiles and heartfelt sense of rectitude the cheers of Englishmen when he announced their incarceration;—with Sir William Harcourt, who by turns thundered at Irishmen and shivered in his shoes at them about the same very recent time, who talked about "Parnellite juice" but a few months ago;—with Sir George Trevelyan, who has come to Mr. Gladstone's heel like a whipped hound after a slight truancy, and who but a short time since was, like the same hound unwhipped, chasing at Mr. Gladstone's order Irish Nationalists to gaols and plank-beds;—with all these and others alive, hearty, and ready for business. When they see such men hobnobbing with their former victims and convicts, what do they think? That is a very interesting question, and the answers are various. The cynic of course says that they don't think anything at all; first of all because the operation of thinking is one with which they are unfamiliar, and, secondly, because they have not the necessary knowledge. They may have begun the study of Irish affairs at about the same time as Mr. Gladstone; who, by his own account, carried out Lydford law in that matter, and only began to inquire whether Irishmen were not by chance innocent at the moment when he left off punishing them, or rather was deprived of the power of punishing them, as guilty. With these persons it would seem that we must borrow Mr. Punch's wand, or at least the exercise of it in the case of the venerable and excellent author of Box and Cox, and try to make the dead alive again. In the Session which is beginning it will constantly, we fear, be necessary to repeat old stories. It is Mr. John Morley—we think, a good authority to cite, surely, in this matter—who has said that the political person must never be afraid of repetition. Perhaps repetition in this case will hardly conduce to the welfare of Mr. Morley's party, though it will do himself no harm. And, for our part, we can assure the whole batch of Gladstonians, from Mr. Gladstone at their head to Mr. Anybody at the tail, that they will certainly, dead as they may be to honour, not be allowed to bury their dead words spoken in the days when they were honourable. How it could be right to imprison Mr. Parnell a few years ago and wrong to imprison Mr. O'Brien now; how it was virtuous of Sir George Trevelyan to send this man to gaol and wicked of Mr. Balfour to send that man for rather worse offences; how it happened that the Land League, which incited to murder and rent-stealing, was steeped in crime, and the National League, which incites to rent-stealing and murder, is steeped in innocence—these and other questions are not going to be left to moulder quietly away, as doubtless Gladstonians would like them to be allowed to moulder. It is difficult to imagine anything more foolish than the conduct of those estimable Conservatives who say, "Oh! let us forget the Irish question and go to business." The Irish question is the business, and till it is—not shelved, but well and thoroughly knocked on the head by good hard strokes for many weeks and months—there will be no peace, nor anything like peace. And among those good hard strokes none can be better and harder than the constant repetition that the record of every Gladstonian of eminence, with two or three exceptions, is fatal to his competence and his honesty in this matter. He may have been a reckless or a thoughtless tyrant three short years ago; he may be a reckless or a thoughtless revolutionary now. But he must take his choice of one or the other category. And, whichever he elects to figure in, it will hardly be thought that he is a fit and proper person to be entrusted with the government and, what is more, with the reconstruction of the government of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

THE POPE AND THE PILGRIMS.

THAT "there is nothing so misleading as facts except figures" is an axiomatic or epigrammatic paradox which has only too often been illustrated from the apparently endless wrangle alike over the minutest details and the gravest problems of history. But we may well cease to marvel at the startling historical divergences which were satirized by Thucydides two thousand years ago when we find no closer agreement attainable about events which are happening under our own eyes. It is barely ten days ago that the Pope gave audience to a body of 300 Irish pilgrims, headed by Archbishop Walsh and seven bishops, and already the most diametrically opposite versions are circulated and credited in various quarters of what he said to them. To be sure one of these versions rests mainly on the authority of Archbishop Walsh, and on such matters Irish Nationalists, and especially Nationalist ecclesiastics, can hardly be considered very trustworthy witnesses. According to what appear to be authentic reports of the address, both French and Latin, his Holiness inculcated on his hearers in distinct, if not very incisive, terms the paramount duty of obedience to the law. After some general remarks on his paternal solicitude for Ireland and regard for the integrity of her faith, we find a reference to the mission of Mgr. Persico and to the papal missive addressed to Cardinal MacCabe, then Archbishop of Dublin, four or five years ago, which, it will be remembered, sternly denounced the Land League. We give the passage as reported, the italics being our own:—

And you are right in remaining firmly trustful in our good will, for we shall not cease to treat the Irish with that love which justice claims; and we shall also persevere in watching over their tranquillity and prosperity, so that it may be acknowledged that we have always responded to the hope placed in us by you. Of that bent of our mind you have at this very moment a striking testimony in the fact that in connexion with the present state of affairs we sent on a definite mission our venerable brother, the Archbishop of Damietta, in order that it might be possible for us to know further from his report what is the condition of things and what is best suited to you. But the difficulty is pressing. What we have indicated in the letter which we addressed in former years to the Archbishop of Dublin must be taken as a sure and firm rule of conduct. This is required not only by religion that religion which is the principal praise of the Irish nation—but by the common advantage, because at no time can it be useful to society to violate justice, the foundation of order and all well-being.

The Irish are next reminded of his Holiness's recent policy in Germany, where "the Catholics escaped the dangers which threatened them by their moderation and respect for law. Why should not the result of similar conduct be the same in Ireland?" The injunction might be clothed in stronger language, but its drift at least seems unmistakable, and it must be remembered that Mgr. Persico's report has not yet been presented, on which Leo XIII. may intend to base a more decisive verdict. Whether the accuracy of the text of the discourse we have quoted is called in question does not clearly appear, but at all events it is wholly evacuated of its obvious and natural sense, if the statement of Archbishop Walsh may be trusted, who declares, according to the Roman Correspondent of the Times, "that in a private audience granted to the Irish bishops the Pope delivered another version of his mind, whereby 'the interests of Ireland'"—as Dr. Walsh understands them—"were to be protected from the influence which was expected to be exercised by the public address of his Holiness to the Irish pilgrims, among whom there may have been some loyal or indiscreet persons." Leo XIII. is thus represented by Dr. Walsh, if we may be pardoned the use of plain language, as a very artless dodger indeed. He first makes a diplomatic address to the Irish pilgrims studiously framed to bamboozle such "loyal or indiscreet persons" as might be present—the Duke of Norfolk was one of them—and through them the British public generally, and the same evening in a private interview with the Irish bishops—whom he has more than once pretty sharply reprimanded before, and some of whom have not obscurely threatened to foment a schism if their wishes are disregarded—assures them that his public address was only meant to throw dust in the eyes of the public, and that he really sided with them and their Parnellite friends all the time. And finally he permits, or does not forbid, Dr. Walsh to blurt out this nice little secret a few days afterwards, for the edification of the Separatist party. The Times' Correspondent—who is "as far as possible from a Catholic"—entirely refuses to believe that the Pontiff thus "palters in a double sense," and, judging from everything that is known of Leo XIII., both before and after his accession to the Papacy, we fully agree with him. We too feel no doubt that the Pope "is as incapable of the haggling for a price, of which his enemies suspect him, as of the evasion"—not to add stupidity—"of which this report (of Dr. Walsh's) would accuse him." It may be added that a later telegram of February 8 cites a message from his Holiness conveyed to the bishops through the Prefect of Propaganda, on their departure from Rome, directing them "to preach to the Irish people respect for the law and a calm and prudent line of conduct;" i.e. bidding them do the precise contrary of what they have been doing hitherto.

The real difficulty of the situation at Rome is indicated by the same Correspondent, as we have more than once indicated it ourselves, in a passage which has also an important bearing, as he himself points out, on the question of restoring diplomatic relations with the Vatican. It is certainly true that the Pope is surrounded by advisers of different policies, to whom he is obliged from their position to pay some show of deference, and that, owing to the want of any official intercourse with England, "his nearest and most numerous advisers (on this question) are the Catholic bishops of Ireland, who, with Cardinal Manning, are the most determined and dangerous enemies of the preservation of the Union, and whose whole influence is exerted in support of the Separatist agitation." On the other side indeed are the loyal English (Roman Catholic) bishops—with one or two exceptions—and the loyal nobility and gentry, at the head of whom stands the Duke of Norfolk; but, adds the writer, "under the disadvantage that their primate"—he is, by the way, giving Cardinal Manning a title to which he can lay no claim—"is doing everything in his power to destroy the influence which they might exert in favour of the Government." A Pope who was weak or narrow-minded, or who really sympathized with Parnellism, could hardly have failed long before now to be drawn over by so strong and persistent a pressure to the Separatist side. It speaks much for the firmness of Leo XIII., and his genuine sympathy with the cause of law and order, that during this long contest he has shown no sign of yielding to the urgent pressure put upon him, and that he has now seized the occasion of receiving a numerous deputation of Parnellite pilgrims, who came before him with their mouths full of national blarney and in the undisguised hope of securing his sanction for their continuance in a course of shameless defiance of the laws of God and man, to put on record a firm and dignified, if temperate, assertion of the indefeasible obligations of justice and civil obedience. And it is a very instructive circumstance, to which the same Correspondent calls attention, that the most strenuous opponents of the scheme for reopening diplomatic relations between England and the Vatican are precisely those prelates who are the keenest advocates of Home Rule—Cardinal Manning and the Irish archbishops and bishops as well in Ireland as in the Colonies. They know well enough—none better than the Cardinal Archbishop—that the residence of a papal nuncio in England would deprive them of the virtually absolute authority in all matters relating to their Church which they now exercise, including inter alia the selection of Colonial bishops. The Cardinal is said to be in the habit of despatching to Rome at brief intervals an elaborate report of the state of things ecclesiastical and political in England, and his activity in this respect would of course be curtailed or superseded by the presence of a nuncio.

In this connexion the appointment of Colonial bishops is not so trivial a matter as may at first sight appear. The Irish are much the same in the Colonies as they are at home, and are always ready to "boycott" any bishop or priest who is not to their liking, notably if he is an Englishman. Thus e.g. the late Catholic metropolitan of Australia, Archbishop Vaughan, was a man of popular gifts and with a strong wrist, and was able, albeit an Englishman, to hold his own with the universal respect of his Protestant fellow-citizens as well as of his own flock. His successor, Cardinal Moran, whom the Pope had designed to translate to Dublin in place of Dr. Walsh and who had the reputation of a loyalist, is said to have fallen helplessly into the hands of the Irish priesthood, while one of his suffragans—Bishop Torregiani of Armidale, an Italian monk who during twenty-five years of parochial work in this country thoroughly naturalized himself as an Englishman, and who was appointed bishop at Archbishop Vaughan's request—narrowly escaped being murdered three or four years ago by an Irish fanatic, whom his judges, with questionable leniency, consigned to a lunatic asylum instead of to penal servitude. He had felt bound to suspend three Irish priests, who were dragged away from the altar trying to say mass when drunk, and it came out on the trial that this miscreant, who fired at the bishop, while celebrating High Mass in his Cathedral on Christmas Day, had been for several weeks in close personal intercourse with one of these three clerical worthies. We merely recall the incident—which found its way at the time from the Australian into the English newspapers—in order to show that the Ethiopian does not change his skin by transplantation to another clime. It is much to be desired that the Pope may see his way to formulating some authoritative decision on the burning question at issue between Bishop O'Dwyer and Bishop Healy and all or nearly all their episcopal colleagues, backed by the great bulk of the Irish priesthood, as to the relative obligations of obedience to the behests of the National (Theft and Murder) League, and obedience to the second table of the Decalogue. To obey both is of course impossible. No man can serve two masters. And in this purely moral question, whatever may be thought of Home Rule in the abstract, the Pope is obviously entitled to speak with full authority to his spiritual subjects. Nor can he entertain any doubt that the English Government is just as much bound forcibly to suppress the Plan of Campaign as it was bound to suppress, and did suppress, Indian Thuggee, with which indeed the Plan has much in common. In one respect indeed the comparison is a libel—on the Thugs; for they were content to murder, as part of their religion, without—so far as we are aware—undertaking to canonize murderers. And we are taught on very high authority that to take delight in those who commit criminal acts, including "murder," betrays a yet lower depth of moral degradation than to commit them oneself. But Archbishop Croke, the Freeman's Journal, et id genus omne, have done their best to canonize "the Manchester martyrs," while they more than condone the saintly exploits of the heroes of Phœnix Park notoriety—possibly agreeing with Mgr. O'Reilly that they "were suborned by the Dublin Castle officials." But this by the way. In directing the attention of the Irish pilgrims to his letter to the late Cardinal MacCabe, which "must be taken as a firm and sure rule of conduct," and reminding them that the religion on which their nation prides itself, no less than the well being of the community, forbids all violation of justice and social order, the Pope has already by necessary implication condemned the National League and the Plan of Campaign. That he should defer any final pronouncement till he has received the fuller information which is being collected for him in Ireland by his appointed delegate is intelligible enough and needs no defence. But that he is meanwhile preaching to the Irish faithful in public, in presence of "loyal" Englishmen, the duty of peaceful law-abiding citizens, and preaching violence and sedition in private to their spiritual leaders—that, pace Dr. Walsh, is neither intelligible nor fairly credible. It has been left for this Parnellite archprelate to insinuate against the supreme head of his Church an infamy which the bitterest Protestant would have shrunk from suggesting, and which none but Irish Catholics are likely for a moment to believe.

HARES.

THE past shooting-season has been one of the best ever known for grouse, partridges, and pheasants; but it has been about the worst within living memory for hares. Without doubt, if they had had a chance, hares would have been proportionately as plentiful as winged game; the spring and summer were all in their favour, and this very fact makes their decrease the more remarkable. So evident is this decrease that many things are more improbable than that hares should become extinct in England if things go on as they are at present.

The Ground Game Act has affected hares far more than rabbits. The latter are so prolific that it is next to impossible to exterminate them where they have once established a firm footing under favourable conditions. Hares, on the contrary, are not great breeders, and, as they rear their families above ground, the dangers to which they are exposed are infinitely greater. Moreover, hares are prodigious fools; they seem to do all in their power to get into snares, and they proverbially offer the easiest of shots to gunners. A farmer, who wishes to be rid of them, has only to enlist the services of one of the so-called vermin-destroyers (arrant poachers would be a better name for them), and his hares will vanish in a wonderfully short space of time. Under these conditions it is scarcely to be wondered at that hares should be rapidly disappearing: but, besides all this, they labour under another serious disadvantage. It is illegal to kill owls, goatsuckers, stonechatches, larks, lapwings, or sandpipers at certain seasons of the year; we protect our coulterneibs, our hoopoes, our phalaropes, and our thicknees; yet there is not a day between the 1st of January and the 31st of December on which the poor wretched hare may not be destroyed. If the vermin-catcher can but kill a hare who is on the point of having a family, he feels as virtuous as a lady who has killed what she fondly believes to be a queen-wasp in the spring.

Last Session, Colonel Dawnay's Bill to make the interval between March 12 and August 12 a close time for hares fell through; but, when we consider the many dangers to which they are exposed in these days, it may be a question whether, if it is worth while to legislate on the subject at all, it would not be well to extend the close season still further. Indeed, we should not be far wrong in saying that the second half of August is one of the most fatal times for hares, as they are ruthlessly killed during that period by farmers' men in the cornfields. When the reaping is in progress, as the patch of corn still uncut becomes smaller and smaller, the surrounding crowd of labourers, boys, loafers, and dogs keeps closing round it and becoming more and more excited. Under similar circumstances in years gone by a few rabbits were perhaps killed in the presence of the keeper, while hares were allowed to escape. Now, not only is every available rabbit worried, shot, or knocked on the head, but, whenever an unlucky hare bolts from the rapidly-diminishing cover, it has to run the gauntlet of half the mongrels of the parish, of a horde of men and lads armed with sticks and stones, as well as of the fire of every rusty single-barrelled gun that can be pressed into the service. Still, it would be a great thing if a close time were appointed even for the five months from March 12, and it is said that more than three hundred petitions, bearing some forty thousand signatures, have been prepared in favour of such a measure. If hares are not to become as rare as badgers and wild cats, something must be done, and that quickly.

SAMSON AT THE PEOPLE'S PALACE.

A SECOND praiseworthy performance was given at the People's Palace on Saturday last by the Handel Society. The work chosen was Handel's Oratorio of Samson. This, one of his finest compositions, is unfortunately seldom heard in its entirety, although written in the zenith of his power. It was begun and completed within a month after the production of the "Messiah" in 1741. Handel himself thought it one of his greatest works, and is said (after he was blind) always to have wept at the air "Total eclipse." This was sung with great pathos by Mr. John Probert, for whom we venture to predict an important career. His rendering of the duet "Go, baffled coward, go," with Mr. H. Pope was given with much dramatic force and vigour. The Society altogether was very fortunate in the choice of soloists. Miss Philippine Siedle has a clear and very true soprano with a good upper register, and Mme. Julia Lennox a sympathetic and fine-toned contralto, but we wish she would control the almost continual "tremolo" which is too often the snare of otherwise excellent singers. These two ladies were sisters, and evidently very popular. Mr. H. Pope, who took the bass part at short notice, has a fine, well-trained voice, but with an occasional thickness of articulation; and Mr. Williams kindly undertook the part of the Messenger when Mr. Probert was called away. "Let the Bright Seraphim" of course was encored, and the trumpet obbligato (Mr. Morrow) was all that could be wished. Both chorus and orchestra showed marked improvement under Mr. Docker's conductorship, but still we wish the voices were rather stronger, as they are overweighted by the instruments. This is so especially with the tenors, a gallant little band of twelve who did wonders, considering their number. Out of the 260 members of the Society there were only about 135 performing on Saturday. The slow, massive choruses were excellently rendered, especially "Round about the starry throne," "Great Dagon," and the Chorus of Virgins; but both chorus and orchestra get flurried in the fast movements, and are inclined to hurry. In spite of this fault, the orchestra played the fugue (allegro) in the overture far better than the first slow movement. All the parts warmed up to their work and improved as they went on, helped greatly by Mr. Croager's fine bursts of "organ."

The Handel Society has the distinction of being entirely amateur, both as to chorus and orchestra, and although it would be unfair to expect the complete accuracy and finish of a professional rendering, or even of those musical Societies which are supported by professional orchestras, it was a most creditable performance. The managers of the Society show a very wise judgment in having most of their public concerts in parts of London where they give the greatest pleasure, and away from the critical competition of "West End" performances. We only wish the "West End" audiences were as sympathetic and enthusiastic as the audience of last Saturday. The hall was crammed, notwithstanding the many rival attractions in the neighbourhood; even another oratorio, Spohr's Last Judgment, was given close by the same evening at the Toynbee Hall. We are indebted to the Handel Society for the reproduction of many of Handel's works—Saul, Belshazzar, Jephtha, &c.; nor does it confine itself entirely to his compositions; Gluck, Cherubini, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Raff, and many others are to be found on its list. It was started in November 1882, and we hope has a long and prosperous career before it.

THE STATE OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

THE publication of the Austro-German Treaty on Saturday morning created a very anxious feeling upon the Stock Exchange. For several weeks previously there had been a stoppage of speculation, and the smaller speculators more particularly had recognized that the condition of the Continent was too dangerous to permit of any considerable rise in prices. Consequently there was a gradual lessening of the account open by them. There were exceptions in the cases of mining shares and of copper and tin; but, speaking broadly, speculative business upon the Stock Exchange had been declining for some considerable time past. On the other hand, there had of late sprung up, as we pointed out last week, a very considerable investment business. Hopes were beginning to revive that peace would be preserved, that the unwillingness of the saving classes to allow their savings to remain any longer idle would cause a rise in investment stocks which would gradually extend to the more speculative stocks, and that thus once more speculative business would begin. And the hope was strengthened by the extreme lowness of the rates of interest and discount. In the early part of last week these hopes were growing very strong; but the publication of the Treaty completely dispelled the hope and caused, on the contrary, grave anxiety. There was nevertheless no serious fall; but this was due solely to the unwillingness of holders to sell. As our readers are aware, the members of the Stock Exchange consist of two classes—brokers, who act as agents for the public, buying or selling, as the case may be, for a commission; and jobbers, who are somewhat in the position of wholesale houses in the markets for commodities. It is the business of a jobber to either hold himself or to know where he can find at a moment's notice the stocks in which he deals, and to sell them to any broker who wishes to buy. It is also his business to buy the stocks in which he deals from brokers. His profit is derived from the difference between the price at which he buys and the price at which he sells. In ordinary times where there is a free market for a stock a jobber is willing to deal at very close prices; in other words, he will buy from a broker at about an eighth or a quarter, or, at the outside, a half per cent. under the price at which he is willing to sell. But when times become anxious, jobbers become unwilling to deal at close prices, and sometimes even are unwilling to deal at all. The object of every jobber who understands his business is at the close of each day to have as nearly as possible what, in the language of the Stock Exchange, is called an "even book"; in other words, his object is that his purchases and sales shall as nearly as possible balance each other. Now, when the public becomes anxious there is little probability that there will be much buying, and the jobber foresees that if he goes on buying he will be unable to sell. He will in consequence, as the phrase goes, be "loaded" with stocks which he cannot get rid of. If he is wealthy his capital will gradually be all locked up, and he will practically be compelled to suspend operations; if he is not wealthy he will be obliged to borrow in order to pay for the stocks he has bought, and, should times grow worse, bankers may refuse to lend the money he requires. The result is that in times of political or financial anxiety jobbers become unwilling to buy. The offer of a very small amount of stock induces them to lower prices, and if offer succeeds offer prices fall with extraordinary rapidity, and yet the amount of business done may be exceedingly small. It will be seen that the only way, in fact, in which the jobber can protect himself when there is an eagerness on the part of the public to sell is by constantly lowering his quotations, in the hope that he may thus stop the rush of sales. On Saturday and Monday last jobbers adopted this attitude, and had holders pressed sales the fall would have been serious indeed. Luckily holders did not press sales. They were expecting Prince Bismarck's speech, and trusted that it might contain something reassuring. Consequently, they refrained from throwing their stocks on the market, and both on Saturday and on Monday, while there was extreme anxiety and even alarm, there was no material fall in prices. Prince Bismarck's speech has been regarded by the market generally as reassuring, and for the moment there has been a partial recovery in prices; but the position is very critical even yet, and any accident may cause a return of the alarm.

The course of prices depends largely upon the view which bankers may take of the political future. Of late years bankers have been increasing very rapidly the loans they make to the Stock Exchange. Formerly lending upon the Stock Exchange was left either to special houses or only engaged in to a very small extent by ordinary bankers; but of late the resources have grown so large, while the discount business has shrunk so considerably, that bankers, almost without exception, have turned to the Stock Exchange as one of the most profitable ways of employing their deposits. Unfortunately, the system they adopt is calculated to cause great fluctuations in prices and sometimes grave disaster. There are twenty-four settling-days in the year upon the Stock Exchange, the interval between one settling-day and another varying from 14 to 19 days; and the usual practice of bankers is to lend only from one settling-day to the following settling-day. They are thus able to call in their loans in a fortnight or a little more if they should require to do so. Of course there are numerous occasions on which they lend to houses in very good credit for longer periods, but we are speaking of the more usual mode of business. And, further, the bankers ordinarily lend at what is called a "10 per cent. margin." Suppose, for instance, the stock stands exactly at par, the banker will lend 90 per cent. of the money upon it, provided the borrowing broker lodges with him what is called "cover" to the extent of 10 per cent., the "cover" being either in cash or in assured securities. And it is a condition of the transaction that the borrower shall always keep up this "10 per cent. margin." If there is a fall in the price of the stock, the borrower is at once called upon by the banker to make good his "cover"; if he is unable to do so, then the stock upon which the money is lent is sold; and, if many borrowers should be unable to make up their "cover," and consequently the sales should be numerous, these large sales cause a further fall in prices. Then other borrowers are called upon to make good their "cover," and in this way a multitude of sales may be forced on, and a heavy fall may result. No doubt the borrowers are largely to blame; but borrowers are proverbially sanguine, and of all borrowers speculators are the most so. As a matter of course they would not buy stocks did they not believe that prices were about to rise, and, consequently, they borrow with a light heart upon the conditions imposed by bankers. But the bankers are professional dealers in money, and as they lend only for a moderate rate of interest, they ought to think, not only for themselves, but for the borrowers, and more particularly for the general public. They should so frame their mode of doing business that it would inflict a minimum amount of suffering. A much more prudent and satisfactory course would be to insist upon a larger margin of cover being deposited in the beginning, say, 25 or 30 per cent. A fall of 25 or 30 per cent. is most unusual, and therefore it is rarely that forced sales of any amount would occur under this system. Further, the banker being fairly well protected under the suggested arrangement, should agree with the borrower that he would not insist upon the full 25 or 30 per cent. margin being kept up, but that a very much smaller margin would suffice. A reform of this kind would protect the banker better than the present system, would avoid the violent fluctuations in prices that now so often occur and the heavy losses inflicted upon borrowers, and, lastly, it would give a salutary check to reckless and wild speculation.

Even, however, if bankers here at home preserve their heads, and avoid, as far as they reasonably can, inflicting losses upon their customers, the markets may be disturbed by the action of the Continental Bourses. In Berlin more particularly there has been a very large and a very reckless speculation for the past four years. The speculation has been most rash in the securities of the Russian Government, but it has been wild in various other departments. If the bankers and speculators of Berlin should become alarmed, they may begin to sell on a vast scale. They are not likely to do so, it is true, unless the outbreak of war appears to them imminent; for it is certain that large sales by them would prevent all the other Bourses and Stock Exchanges from buying. There would, in consequence, be a very heavy fall, and the bankers and speculators of Berlin in consequence would suffer grievous loss. But, if the belief should become general in Berlin that war cannot be avoided and will come soon, they may face even this serious loss rather than be caught by the outbreak of war in the midst of the reckless speculation they have so long been carrying on. It is also possible that there may be a breakdown of the speculation in Paris. In Paris the speculation has chiefly been in copper and copper-mining shares, but it is understood that there has also been a considerable speculation in Russian bonds; and, if alarm should grow up in Paris, selling might begin there, and this might cause a great disturbance on the London Stock Exchange. The probability appears to be, indeed, that there will not be a very heavy fall unless the political situation becomes much worse than it is at present; but that there will be intermittent scares is extremely likely. Prince Bismarck's speech has somewhat reassured the Bourses and the Stock Exchange, but it has not dispelled anxiety. Too much is obscure and uncertain to allow of a revival of confidence, and while alarm exists every accident will induce some few speculators in their own defence to put down prices. On the other hand, everything reassuring that occurs will induce speculators for the fall to buy back what they have sold without possessing, and thus will cause a recovery in prices. Until, then, the political situation is cleared up in one way or another, the probability seems to be that we shall have every now and then a fall more or less material in prices, and that this will be followed at a short interval by a recovery more or less complete. Should war actually break out there can hardly fail to be a great fall in prices. The prices of some securities may indeed fall from 20 to 40 per cent., notably Russian bonds. Even if war is avoided, should the Austrian Government considerably increase its armaments, or ask for a very large vote, the likelihood seems to be that the fall will be considerable. On the other hand, there is this favourable circumstance, that the amount of speculation, here in London, at all events, has been greatly reduced during the past few months, and that consequently a great crash upon the London Stock Exchange is not probable. The disaster will mainly fall upon the Berlin and the Paris Bourses, if there should be a war. The crisis, should it come, will be rendered more serious if there is a financial crash either in Berlin or Paris, leading to a large drain of gold from London. But if, on the other hand, the world having now had such ample warning, there should be an export of gold from the Continent to this country, keeping the rates of interest and discount here moderately low, the crisis here would be greatly diminished. Then bankers would be more disposed to lend than if there was a financial alarm added to a political and Stock Exchange scare. But in any case the outbreak of war could hardly fail to be accompanied by a very serious crisis.

EXHIBITIONS.

THE Fine Art Society have opened another exhibition of the water-colour drawings of Mr. A. N. Roussoff. In the show of last year most of the sketches were Venetian, and this year it is again Venice that Mr. Roussoff illustrates. The manifest improvement of the artist in some way justifies the rapid succession of these exhibitions. Mr. Roussoff's tone was rather shaky last year, and his composition was too frequently cut up into patches of bright colour. Though his composition is now good, facile elegance of workmanship still remains his foremost quality. His colour tends to be a little hard and metallic at times, and this is especially noticeable in his rendering of pure landscape. Such a defect is less pardonable here than in the flat, firm surfaces of buildings. "In the Pinetta, Ravenna" (31), a close study of pine-trees, is an example of his want of the texture and rich accidental colour suitable to landscape treatment. Nor is he conspicuously successful in large figure-work. "For Whom?" (14), to take an extreme instance, displeases one by the commonness of the idea and the cold hard banality of the execution. His graceful, "chic," facility tells best in small corners of buildings, streets, bridges, canals, &c., where the figure plays the smallest part, and architecture, bright walls, and costumes make up the main interest. "The Frari; a Grey Day" (9), "Waiting" (16), "Baiting Boats" (26), "Venetian Chimney-pots" (38), are some of this sort. "Fishing Boats" (30), a view of a pearly grey sea, is one of the best of the more maritime sketches. Perhaps we should call "Before Dawn" (28), and "Off S. Giorgio" (19), the best of the open-air work. Though a trifle hard, these are true and carefully observed renderings of a picturesque hour in the day. "The Confessional" (39) is certainly one of the softest and most luminous of the studies of interiors. As a whole, the show would make a better appearance had its aspect of uniform, tight finish, been varied with some looser, freer, and more accidental-looking sketches, such as "The Limekilns," which made so good an effect in Mr. Roussoff's former exhibition.

As may be guessed, there are also a great many views of Venice in Miss Clara Montalba's collection of water-colour drawings at Mr. McLean's Gallery. Unlike Mr. Roussoff, however, Miss Montalba treats many and divers scenes with an admirable variety of colouring. Her work bears being seen in quantities, for she is a real colourist, and not a person who cooks up one palatable scheme of tone. She can play her tune in many keys of colour, and she obtains a broad and harmonious beauty in them all. Although we have enjoyed her work in galleries, and especially amidst the niggling of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colour, we had not formed so high an opinion of her as she deserved. Her work is not always without faults, and it is only when one can appreciate the variety and the genuineness of her imagination in colour that one perceives that she is a true and original artist. She has, in fact, what is called "a game of her own," and a Montalba is a definite and recognizable style of picture. Varied as is her choice of subject, embracing Venice, London, the English coast, Holland, and the Riviera, different as her schemes of colour are, whether in cool grey and blue or in warm brown and orange, the principles of her method and the sentiment of her art remain the same. There may be a suspicion of mannerism about one or two among the less observed and more decorative of her works, but a person must be without any sense of nature or of art who fails to appreciate the broad and vivid effect of such gems of colour as "After Sunset—Ramsgate" (9), "A December Day—Venice" (51), "Antibes, Riviera" (67), "Sunset—Venice" (71), "The Salute" (94), and "Pappendrecht" (47). These represent several kinds of observation, and a wide range of decorative effect. It would be no more easy to beat the luminousness and warm depth of the green and brown "Sunset Venice" than the robust dignity of the blue and brown "Antibes," or the cool fresh atmospheric qualities of "A December Day," "The Salute," and "On the Grand Canal" (37). These and similar drawings are perhaps the best in the show; for their high decorative quality reposes on a solid basis of natural fact. Miss Montalba is one of the few artists of the day who have stumbled neither into the pitfall of symbolism, literary painting, or unsupported "chic" on the one hand, nor, on the other, into that of brutal, unreasoning, or photographic realism. Besides the drawings we have spoken of, the show contains many large flourishes of rich colour, composed with more or less reference to nature, and some representations of crowds cleverly spotted in, such as "Regatta—Venice" (3), "Arrival of the King and Queen of Italy in Venice for the Festivities, May 1887" (11), "Waiting for Queen Margherita's Gala Escort" (15), and "Ramsgate Sands" (33). Fault-finding in an artist of such marked gifts would be an ungracious as well as a very difficult task, especially as regards her best work; but it may be said with some truth that Miss Montalba in weak moments tends to rely entirely on the quality of her colour. Sometimes she blots without subtlety of suggestion, or even conveys a hint of incorrect and clumsy form. The lovely blot of colour "Galeots Dort" (17) might surely have been finely and nervously drawn as to the main lines of the long spits and banks. We do not want harder delineation or more detail. A picture need not, and should not, be fully explanatory; but, when a form is given, it should be given right. We do not say that Miss Montalba is much of a sinner in this way, or that her manifest beauties do not amply condone her shortcomings; but that it is a dangerous plan to begin to get colour cheaply, as may be seen in some of Monticelli's work.

Last week Miss Donald Smith held an exhibition in her studio of work in oil and water, entitled "Sketches in Town and Country." In oils she is as yet timid in technique, and, though pleasing in arrangement, her pictures appear somewhat small and hard. Several of her water-colours, however, show that she has studied this medium to some purpose. Her wash is pure and limpid, and with this she combines a good deal of precision. Many of her sketches of landscape have been made on the Thames; but, on the whole, we prefer her treatment of architectural subjects, and we would especially praise the firm drawing and pure sky of "Notre Dame—Evening" (53), and the fine tone and suggestion of architectural detail in "Canale San Maurizio, Venice" (54).

"In and Out of Doors" is the title of a collection of water-colour drawings at the Goupil Galleries, by past and present students of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water-Colour. The drawings make a pretty exhibition, full of proofs of technical skill and cultivated appreciation of art; but one rather misses evidence of the student's zeal for nature, and conscientious regard for the logic of effect. Signs may be noticed of a tendency to substitute manual for intellectual labour, and of ambition directed to pretty picture-making rather than to pushing forward a personal conquest of nature. So, looking round the walls, one becomes aware of holes in the tone, so to speak, of elaboration on a false basis, of feeble values, and of gaps in the continuity of the aërial effect. These faults are perhaps not extremely pronounced, and they are certainly not universal, but they are the last defects that should be encouraged in students. Imagination should be nursed on the study of reality, and should not be weaned till sincerity becomes a second nature. We have at times expressed impatience that such artists as Messrs. John Collier, J. M. Swan, and Arthur Lemon should carry the restraints of education too far and should hold the imagination too long in check. Unquestionably, however, theirs is a safe fear; it places a man to start with upon a height from which it takes him a long time to slide down to the position of a played-out Academician and from which he is at an advantage for reaching the summits of mastery. In this exhibition Mr. Nelson Dawson shows great technical accomplishment; but his elegance, based on flimsy unrealities of tone, is somewhat ineffective and unconvincing. Mr. A. C. Wyatt, also strong in manipulation, sees narrowly and builds up rather than conceives an arrangement of his elements. The results are seen in the hardness of his work and the vicious inkiness of some of his shadows. Other and worse sinners do not possess the force of these men and so may be passed over. Very conspicuous amongst the best and most promising work are Mr. A. E. Bower's fine and natural study of the dark grey of late evening, "The Haunted Mill" (40); Mr. F. Althaus's spirited dark blue sketch in excellent unity of tone, "The Coming Gale" (70); Mr. Falconer Clark's robust piece of colour, "An Old Smuggling Post" (50); and Mr. W. Luker's conscientiously observed study of an interior with figures, "Home: a Wet Day" (76). Further good work comes from Messrs. Angell Brindley, MacIver Grierson, W. J. Carpenter, C. J. Fox, Honeywood Waller, and F. Short.

RECENT CONCERTS.

Mr. Henschel may be warmly congratulated upon his last concert, which took place on Tuesday, the 7th. With the exception of the "Eroica" Symphony, the programme was devoted to Wagner, who, it will be remembered, died on the 13th of this month, 1883. Mr. Henschel showed a distinct advance upon his former conducting of symphonies in his manner of dealing with the "Eroica": but it must still be admitted that the majesty of Beethoven occasionally escapes him. The abrupt jerk with which Mr. Henschel indicates forte passages is hopelessly destructive of largeness of effect, and this shortcoming was painfully apparent in the last movement of the symphony, which was undignified, hurried, and curiously monotonous in effect, somewhat marring an otherwise excellent interpretation of this great work. The first movement and the Scherzo were especially well played; the Funeral March was, on the other hand, taken in perilously slow time, and was not a little wanting in light and shade. The symphony was followed by a surprisingly good rendering of the Prelude and Finale from Tristan and Isolde, in which Mr. Henschel showed more of the genuine qualities of a conductor than he has hitherto betrayed. The orchestra played admirably throughout, and a broad, intelligent, and dramatic, if not passionate, interpretation was obtained. We cannot bestow quite such high praise on Mr. Henschel' manner of dealing with either the "Siegfried Idyll" or the Prelude to Parsifal, in which the brass was painfully coarse and uncertain, and the general effect somewhat colourless. In the "Siegfried Idyll" there was an occasional tendency to confusion, and some want of delicacy of perception and finish. But it is only just to add that it may now be said that, setting Dr. Richter aside, Mr. Henschel has given the most intelligent interpretation of the works of Wagner, above mentioned, which we have heard in this country. The "Kaisermarch" brought this, the most successful and best-attended of the London Symphony Concerts, to a close. Of the performance of Berlioz's La Damnation de Faust, under Mr. Barnby, at the Albert Hall on the 19th of last month we cannot speak with much patience. Berlioz presumably knew what he was about when he wrote down the indications of his score; but Mr. Barnby now, as on former occasions, persists in setting them at naught. The result is that the work drags throughout. The Hungarian March especially suffers under Mr. Barnby's slow, heavy, and monotonous treatment; and it was, moreover, played with a great want of crispness by the orchestra. The Easter Hymn, one of the finest numbers to be found among the works of Berlioz, completely loses its significance under this treatment, and becomes suggestive rather of Scotch Presbyterians on a wet Sunday than of the triumphant joy and passionate gratitude of happy souls. The sepulchral solemnity of the Amen Fugue is simply astounding when one remembers what Berlioz has himself left on record concerning this chef-d'œuvre of musical irony. The Women's Chorus was distinctly unsatisfactory, and the whole performance lacking in point and vigour. Mme. Nordica's singing of the part of Margaret was careful and mechanical. She entirely missed the sentiment of the wonderful ballad of the King of Thule, of which the conclusion was most infelicitous. Mr. Banks was obviously suffering too much from cold to do full justice to himself in the music of Faust. Mr. Henschel's Mephistopheles was not a performance of unmixed merit, and we may in particular mention that he sang the Serenade with a laboured good-nature that might well have made the attendant devils weep.

ARIANE.

Those who can remember the events of thirty years ago will doubtless have a distinct recollection of the excitement created over the announcement that Mlle. Piccolomini was about to appear in La Traviata. Society was shaken to its very foundations at the prospect of that engaging young lady venturing to challenge Mrs. Grundy by, to quote a contemporary of the period, "flaunting herself before the intelligent and respectable British public as the heroine of a vicious French drama." As to Alexandre Dumas fils's drama La Dame aux Camélias, there was not the remotest chance at that epoch of its being licensed, and it is only within the past ten years that it has been played in England, very slightly altered, indeed, but under various aliases, such as Heartsease and Camille. We have changed all this, to judge from the example set on Wednesday evening, when its able director placed upon the boards of the Opera Comique a new play by Mrs.

Campbell Praed, entitled Ariane, of such a dubious character that, unless a reaction does not speedily set in, our stage will eventually fall even to the same low level as that of Paris. And it must, moreover, be admitted that, however vicious a French play may be, it is usually acted with great discretion and delicacy, and its naughtiness gilded by the wit and sparkle of the language in which one can say things that would be detestably coarse in any other. Ariane is a vicious piece, and its dialogue is throughout the reverse of witty. The plot is so disagreeable that it can only be related in the briefest possible manner. It deals with the evil ways of a certain Chevalier de Valence, an old French adventurer, who, having—to use his own expression —"sold" his beautiful daughter, Ariane, to a rich but foolish young man named Harvey Lomax, in order that he may himself live an idle and comfortable existence at their expense, suddenly discovers that his child is not happy, and, what is far more important, that his son-in-law is rapidly losing his fortune. He therefore selfishly concludes that, should Mr. Lomax eventually come to financial grief, he, the Chevalier, will be in a very disagreeable plight indeed, with old age and poverty staring him in the face, and perhaps his extravagant daughter and her child left upon his hands again into the bargain. This state of affairs must be prevented at all costs. Chance favours him, and he soon finds out that his darling Ariane's husband ill-treats her, and that she has platonically placed her affections in the dangerous keeping of a fascinating millionaire. He now determines to bring about a divorce between Ariane and the impoverished Lomax, and thus enable her to marry her lover, and himself to share their fortune and bask in their luxury. All this mischief he carries out on strictly ready-cash terms, previously arranged upon between himself and the millionaire, Sir Leopold d'Acosta. Lomax, who, by the way, is a drunkard, is tempted into an elopement with a very questionable young woman, who is bribed for this disgraceful purpose. The pair are next tracked to a cottage in the country by the Chevalier and his detectives, and a divorce suit sets Ariane free to marry Sir Leopold, which she accordingly does. However, her first husband, who in the meantime has turned teetotaller, returns, and reveals to her the abominable plot in which her father and husband had been engaged in order to separate them. Having so done, he takes aim at his rival Sir Leopold, but shoots Ariane dead instead. Finally he rushes from the chamber, and a detonation in the garden indicates that he has committed suicide. Such is the sorry subject of this offensive drama, which is dragged through four long acts, and told in realistically crude language, only relieved here and there by the irrelevant gossip of minor and absolutely useless characters who have nothing whatever to do with the plot, and hinder the action of the piece, which is already sufficiently fettered. Mrs. Bernard Beere, as Ariane the heroine, played, as she always does, remarkably, but not so well as we have seen her in less unpleasant pieces. She seemed to be perpetually struggling with a dead weight, and hopelessly endeavouring to create an interest which she herself appeared unable to feel. It was only in the last two acts that she found any opportunity to display that intensity and power for which she is justly celebrated. In the scene in which her husband vainly pleads to her for forgiveness, and in the last, where she dies, Mrs. Bernard Beere acts finely. M. Marius, as the iniquitous Chevalier de Valence, by dint of subtle and quiet acting, and a display of well-bred cynicism, rendered endurable an otherwise intolerable part; for De Valence is nothing more nor less than a very commonplace Iago, a hypocrite and an unnatural villain, who conceals his iniquity under the guise of cleverly assumed bonhomie and good-nature. Mr. Leonard Boyne played the objectionable part of D'Acosta with a good deal of dignity. Never perhaps before has Mr. Henry Neville been seen to so much disadvantage. We somehow or other have come to consider Mr. Neville as an essentially "heroic" actor, and great was the disappointment when he appeared in so wantonly loathsome a part as the weak and unmanly Lomax, whose final outburst of mock, but murderous, heroism is highly offensive. Miss Laura Linden was cast as the adventuress Babette; but it is a part not at all suited to her appearance or her bright style, although she certainly showed considerable talent in her endeavours to portray the full meaning of this unpleasant impersonation. Of the rest of the cast there is little to say; for the actors and actresses had very little to do save walk about and pose themselves in so-called "society attitudes," and talk of things which had no connexion whatever with the plot, except perhaps to pad the dialogue, and thereby drag out the unpleasant length of this most thoroughly disagreeable piece.

REVIEWS.

SPORT IN BENGAL.*

CIVILIANS and planters may deplore the diminution of large game in some districts and the excessive population of other parts of India, and eloquent Baboos may seek to win English constituencies by promising to sweep away the Game Laws with other remnants of feudalism; but this book proves clearly that there is still a fair field for the sportsman in Lower, Central, and Western Bengal, if he only knows how to look for it. Mr. Baker has served the Government with credit and efficiency for thirty-five years. As Deputy-Magistrate at the subdivision of Sasseram, in the district of Shahabad popularly known as Arrah, he distinguished himself during the Mutiny, helped to keep open the Grand Trunk Road, and was present at divers operations which followed on the rebellion of Koer Sing. He subsequently rose to be Deputy-Inspector of Police under the Government of Bengal. He has traversed, either for duty or recreation, nearly the whole of the Bengal Province, and seems as much at home on the alluvial formations of big rivers, like the Megna and the Poddha or Ganges Proper, as he is in the Sál forests and the laterite formations of Chutia Nāgpūr and the plateau of Hazaribagh. He is a proficient with the spear, the rifle, and the smooth-bore, and he writes generally in a clear and animated style. It is, therefore, to be regretted that some of his descriptions are spoilt by flippancy and attempts at humour which never elicit a smile. One or two of his conclusions or recommendations are contradictory, and we could have wished that he had dwelt more on the good qualities of the natives than on their moral defects. But Lord Ripon, by persisting in wanton and sentimental legislation, is partly responsible for a marked change in the relations between the native community and the ruling race. If Mr. Baker is annoyed with the pretentiousness of the gushing, vapouring Baboo, and with the absolute refusal of villagers to disclose the haunt of a tiger or leopard that has been slaying men or beasts by scores for months together, the critic may in his turn complain of careless editing and want of revision of the press. Nadiya or Nuddia, the seat of Sanskrit learning and of the purest-spoken vernacular of Bengal, becomes Nadiga. It is somewhat difficult to discover the fine districts of Rajshahi and Dacca in their disguises of Kayshye and Dana, and there are other irritating misprints which the Deputy-Inspector of Police would have been the first to censure in one of his subordinate's monthly and annual reports. But there is a vast deal of experience, graphically told, and a reader must be hard to please if he cannot find amusement and instruction in a book which shows him how to stalk the buffalo, circumvent the deer and the tiger, indulge in snipe-shooting without endangering his health, carry his supplies and his comforts with him in tents and in boats, make the most of the cold season, and snatch a fearful joy or two out of a brief expedition undertaken in the hot weather and rains.

We share Mr. Baker's dislike to very big hunting parties and splendid lines of elephants. Doubtless to see the Commissioner of the Division organize a beat in the Terai in the grand style, and to assist at a drive in the Tributary Mahals of Cuttack, when some sporting Raja turns out two or three thousand of his Paiks, or men who hold lands for the performance of certain vague services, is a thing to be remembered. And we are tolerably familiar with the rules and regulations which must be observed by all sportsmen on some of these occasions on pain of expulsion for disobedience. Deer are to be allowed to slip away unharmed. Not a shot is to be fired at peacock and jungle fowl as they rise in small bouquets. Even buffaloes are spared. Nothing is to be done which could alarm what the purely sporting pen is apt to denominate "the gentleman with the striped waistcoat." And then, owing to mismanagement or misconstruction of orders, the line is broken at a critical moment, or a certain strategical operation fails, and the sportsmen, hot and irritated, return to camp at a late hour in the afternoon, having extorted a tardy permission from their sulky Commander-in-Chief to shoot at anything that gets up. Of course there are moments of triumph in these great operations, when a tigress, disturbed at her meal and jealous for the safety of her cubs, comes roaring through the grass jungle, leaps on a small pad elephant, and strikes terror into the breasts of those splendid animals the staunch Hyder Ali and the fearless Peari. Then ensues a free fight for five or ten minutes, till a shot from the unerring Express of "the Major," or some titled tourist from England, settles the business. But, on the whole, we prefer Mr. Baker and his two or three trusty companions, who, with a moderate number of elephants and a good stud of horses, are ready for any kind of sport, "on foot, in the howdah, or the saddle."

One episode amongst the many in which the author took an active part deserves special recognition. Most Indian sportsmen know something of the terror that pervades scores of villages owing to the man-eating tiger; the seeming ubiquity of the animal—here one day, and ten miles off the next; the helplessness of the native shikari, with his bowstring and poisoned arrow, set in a path which the animal cleverly manages to avoid; and the notification of a despairing Government extending the reward to ten times the usual amount for the destruction of this species. It fell to Mr. Baker, after some wearisome nights spent on platforms in the vain hope of catching a noted man-hunter, to kill it in broad daylight. A woodcutter was plying his trade at some little distance from the thick jungle which the author was skirting because it was market-day, and there was just a chance that the cunning tigress might be there and on the look-out for a stray buyer or seller on his return home. How the tigress selected a dry watercourse so as to stalk the woodcutter; how she crouched and crept noiselessly along; how Mr. Baker, with two faithful attendants, crouched in his turn and stalked the stalker; how he severely wounded the animal with one bullet, followed this up by a second, and finished it with two more as it came straight at him; how the carcase was seen by two thousand villagers; and how the two native henchmen came in for a reward of three hundred rupees given by a grateful Government, should all be read in Mr.

* Sport in Bengal; and How, When, and Where to Seek it. By Edward B. Baker, late Deputy Inspector-General of Police, Bengal. London: Ledger Smith & Co.

Baker's own words. It is not every sportsman who has such a chance or who avails himself so cleverly of it.

Mr. Baker's book is not one merely of adventures and lucky shots and more lucky escapes. Like all genuine sportsmen, he is something of a naturalist and a keen observer of the habits of wild animals. He confirms the statement that, though the tiger of the hills differs from the tiger of the plains in such particulars as colour, length of stripes, and rings on the tail, the species for practical purposes is one and the same. But this is subject to the explanation that the prey of the tiger differs according to the locality which it frequents. In heavy tree jungle it lives on deer and hogs. In large plains where bulrush and high grass alternate with open pasture and cultivation the animal becomes "a cattle-killer." Last and most dreaded is the man-eater, who may be found wherever a portly Brahman goes to the tank or river to bathe, and the sound of the hatchet betrays the whereabouts of the woodcutter. The accounts of tigers that measure twelve or thirteen feet from the nose to the tip of the tail are very properly scouted. They may be classed with wonderful elephants of twelve feet in height. The average length of the tiger is about nine feet and a half, and that of a leopard about seven. Mr. Baker throughout a whole chapter uses the term panther to designate the leopard, and seems to hold that there are three kinds of panthers in Bengal—the common panther, the clouded panther, and the black variety. Dr. Jerdon and Mr. E. Blyth, who may be trusted on this knotty point, have maintained that the Indian panther and leopard are simple varieties of the same species of cat. Captain Baldwin, in his excellent work on The Large and Small Game of India, held, on the other hand, that the two species could be distinguished, the skull of the panther being long and pointed, and that of the leopard rounded and short. In this opinion he is supported by the late Sir Walter Elliot. Whether there be two species or two varieties of the same species, there is no doubt that there is a marked difference in the size of some of these animals when full grown, just as with us there is a large kind and a smaller kind of woodcock. The black species of panther merely justifies Mr. Blyth's doctrine that melanism is common to all animals. A black panther presented to the Marchioness of Dalhousie was for many years to be seen at the country seat of the Governor-General, of which a poet wrote in an elegy on a clerk in a merchant's office—an Oriental Tim Linkinwater:—

> And every Durga Puja would good Mr. Simms explore
> The famous river Hooghly up as high as Barrackpore;
> And visit the menagerie, and in his pleasant way
> Declare that all the bears were bores! alack and well-a-day!

On some other points we join issue with Mr. Baker. In discussing the kind of horse best suited for the sport of hog-hunting, he seems to put English, Australian, and Cape horses first; next Cabulees, Kattywars, and countrybreds; and last of all the Arabian. A page or two further on he contradicts himself, apparently, by saying that a staunch Arab is preferable to any other breed for riders not above a certain weight. Now for any rider under twelve stone we should certainly put the Arab first. His pluck and endurance, the ease with which he wheels and turns and follows a "jinking" hog, his endurance of heat, his ability to pick his way at full speed over broken and hard ground, and his general docility of temper, make him invaluable for this kind of sport. Cape horses, it is notorious, are very soon fagged, while the Arab, with a little breathing time allowed him after each run, comes up to his work, like the typical prizefighter who always appeared "smiling" at every fresh round. A good English horse, thorough or three-parts bred, certainly outstrips the Arabian, but he is apt to be thrown out when the hog twists and turns. We admit, however, that occasionally, in a Deccani, a Cabulee, a countrybred, or one rejected from the Government Stud while it existed, there were specimens which for speed, pluck, and staying power, in a fair field, nothing could touch. Mr. Baker, as in the case of tigers, throws doubt on the accounts of boars that stand forty inches high at the shoulders. We agree with him that sportsmen are fortunate when they spear animals of thirty-five inches; and that there are few phases of excitement that can rival a day with the Tent Club at Tamlook or with the Magistrate on the grassy islands of the large streams of Eastern Bengal. Sportsmen will generally do well if they hunt the boar in parties of three or four or, at least, in couples. The best of riders may be unhorsed in a blind ditch, and a second spear may save a fallen comrade's life and limb when the enraged boar, with fiery eyes and foaming tusks, comes down on a prostrate rider. Some chapters in this work treat of sport of various kinds in unfamiliar places. The passages which describe duck-shooting in the Bengal districts of Fureedpore and Backergunge, where the natives construct their huts on little hummocks just above inundation level, live on fish, and go to market in canoes; the hints about snipe-shooting and the boot that will stand the mud of Bengal, and combines "strength, pliancy, and lightness"; the directions as to accoutrement, shape of pith hat, change of clothes and moderate refreshment, and the observance of precautionary rules; the descriptions of scenery, showing how the monotony of wide plains of rice bordered by villages invisible owing to the denseness of the foliage, is relieved by magnificent rivers or by hills of red sandstone—in all this there is no sameness and some originality. The value of the book is further enhanced by a vocabulary of useful terms and of native names for divers birds and beasts. We should not pronounce any sportsman wrong when he gives the names which, familiar in one district, are not recognized in another. But an omission or two may be noticed. The common teal is often known as narul, plover as chaega, the porcupine sometimes as sajjaru, the hare as lāpha, and the snipe as Kādakancha—i.e. the bird that bores in the mud. There is no distinct mention of the cotton-teal or gengrail, called by English soldiers the "fix bayonets" bird for a fancied resemblance in its cry to these words. Captain Baldwin catalogues this species as the white-bodied goose-teal, and particularly says that it must not be confounded with the clucking-teal, an exceedingly rare bird.

The conclusion to which Mr. Baker's remarks, as well as recent sound sporting literature point, has just been arrived at by the Government. We learn from the Indian journals that a close time, embracing wild birds as well as the partridge, the jungle-fowl, and the hill-pheasant, has now been established by legal enactment. Some of the waders and divers have hitherto set up a close season for themselves by the simple expedient of retiring in April to fastnesses and hills on the eastern frontier, and not returning to the plains till the autumn. But for the genus francolin, the sand-grouse, and the various kinds of pheasants and others, there has been no protection from the prowling pot-hunter and the native, who spares neither sex nor age when he can sell feathers and skins for a few annas. The wholesale destruction of game and fish in some districts has been positively appalling. No philanthropist need be afraid that recent legislation in India is intended to create any new or exclusive rights or interests in game. All tendency to over-preservation will be easily kept in check by numerous kites and jackals and vermin. In establishing a season when persecution by gun, snare, and net shall cease, the Anglo-Indian legislator has only helped to preserve some of the most beautiful of nature's creatures and to raise India to the level of all civilized communities, under whatever form of Government they may exist.

MISS MARIE CONNOR'S story, Husband and Wife, has few elements of originality. The oldest plot, it is true, the tritest combination of human feelings and actions, can be treated so as to present fresh interest. We are finite creatures; but the tricks we play before high Heaven are infinite in their variation. As with the physical features of the human race, our "sports," to borrow a word from the philosophy of evolution, are, within a narrow limit, limitless. So, when an author takes three people—a husband, a wife, and "another"—and begins to make material for three volumes out of their mutual relations, we need not necessarily count on repetition of an old story, though we may expect certain often-repeated incidents. What is wanting in the present case, however, is not only novelty of conception, but lifelikeness in execution. The author has tried in a praiseworthy manner to depict original people, and to cast them in striking moulds. Lady Elchester is meant to be a creature of complex character and conflicting passions. Edward Galbraith, her companion in wrongdoing, is a being of thwarted genius, or rather disappointed ambition, moody, high-souled, high-strung, soured and cramped by want of success and devoured by absorbing egotism. Yet assuredly the author did not mean him to impress us as a scurvy knave, and that is precisely the light in which his behaviour presents him. Edward Galbraith has married a gentle and loving woman, one of those rustic beauties who in novels always appear in grey gowns without any ornaments but a daisy or two, and outshine professional beauties clothed in little but diamonds. Margaret is truly a dowdy woman, but her spiritual qualities are supposed to radiate through her person, which is besides always described as most beautiful. These two are the "husband and wife," and Lady Elchester, a Frenchwoman, widow of an English baronet, is "the other." Lady Elchester is, as we have said, a carefully studied and elaborated being. We read of "a vista of the aisles of that soul, born to be free and full of light, now paved with ashes, walled with callousness, and roofed with chaos." We do not form a very distinct idea of this gloomy female philosopher; but we are frequently assured she had innate nobility, and was full of fine impulses. Nevertheless, when the bored Edward and the cynical widow meet, they fall in love, principally, as it would seem, because it gives them some excitement and something to do. Margaret goes out in a thunderstorm, and is stricken blind by the lightning—hopelessly blind for life. Her husband, whom we should have expected to be turned from erratic courses by this catastrophe, is instead much annoyed, behaves unkindly to the sufferer, and presently goes off with Lady Elchester, leaving his helpless wife and little child to shift for themselves. Sympathy is demanded for the selfish couple, who wander about the Continent, very happy, though painfully conscious of the world's disapproval; while Margaret and little Theodora subside into obscurity in South Wales. It is not possible to say that any of these personages, either during the pursuance of these adventures or in their dénouement, act like real people. They are creations of the author's imagination; "transient and embarrassed phantoms"; inconceivable mixtures of irreconcilable motive. Miss Connor's copiousness of language, energy of diction, and activity of imagination need to be tempered by experience of the world and study of living men and women. A stronger sense of the humorous side of life is not to be had for the wishing or the advising, so it is useless to say anything about that. It would help writers of novels out of many a mistake. What may be acquired, however, is a clearer knowledge of how men and women of the world talk. A man speaking our language so well as M. Hector Flamant is supposed to do needs not help it out with so much boarding-school French. And would a well-bred man hold this little conversation with his friend on hearing of the friend's marriage:—"And you don't regret the match?" "No. Why should I?" "Oh! no reason at all—only, an actress's daughter!" Sir Henry Elchester received the remark "coldly," as well he might.

A good dashing military novel is always popular, but few things are more depressing than a record of barrack-room chatter and common regimental incidents. Even these, however, may by the expert be made readable when intimate knowledge and a good share of sense and humour are brought to the task of describing them. We cannot say that Mr. Philip Gaskell has displayed any of these qualities in his story, A Lion among the Ladies. The manner of writing is incoherent and distracted. Dislocation is a feeble word to express the broken and tottering condition of many sentences in these rambling pages. Analysis of the characters introduced helps the interest very little. Captain Guy Leycester is represented as a "Lion among the Ladies" by virtue of his handsome face and figure, insinuating manners, and way of talking to married women "in a voice which long practice rendered indistinct to all save the person especially addressed." He is much more like a jackal among the men; for his theories of life, and his practice too, are gambling, universal debt, and indiscriminate fleecing of tradesmen. Captain Leycester's conception of an honourable way of meeting pecuniary obligations is to get valuable jewellery from shops where he has no intention of ever settling the bill, and presenting it to the wife of the friend from whom he has borrowed money. As he is at the same time making violent love to the lady, the scheme serves two ends, or would do, were the virtue of Mrs. Denham less immaculate. So far as the plan does go it is successful; for Mr. Denham accepts the bracelets as part payment of his loan, and takes the rest out in the rent of his house, which Captain Leycester induces a fellow-officer to hire for a term. The behaviour of another ornament to the "Chalkshire Rifles"—Major Brereton—who takes a married woman's diamonds as a bribe to return her silly love-letters, seems comparatively honest; yet Major Brereton is a very black sheep, while the "Lion" is the pet of the corps and of his social circle. We must not, however, do injustice to Mr. Gaskell's sense of retribution, for the gallant "Lion" is eventually slain in the Soudan, which, we observe, the author thinks is in South Africa. Major Brereton is punished by marriage with a scheming young lady, who had stolen her friend Lady Gregorie's diamond pendant. There is a tremendous amount of flirtation amongst these persons, some of whose agreeable qualities we have indicated; but it is not good, honest, amusing flirtation. The story is of vulgar people, told in a common and slipshod fashion, and presenting no qualities, so far as we have been able to ascertain, justifying its existence.

We have a distinct recollection of a very good book written some years ago about the Black Forest by L. G. Séguin, the author of The Algerian Slave. It was not only an agreeable work to read, but a valuable guide to the Black Forest, itself a most agreeable place to visit. A guide-book is not perhaps the most promising herald for romances; but in this case it is not an untrustworthy one. The Algerian Slave calls itself on the title-page a novel, and as such we are bound to receive it. But it is a great deal more like a descriptive guide to Algiers. Descriptive, and also historical; for it is the Algiers of the early years of the century we are told of, when France and Spain and England were at war, when pirates infested the Mediterranean, Christians were slaves among the Turks and Arabs, and Algiers was the "Nido Algeri di ladri infame ed empio" it happily is no longer. The adventures of Giuseppe Caroli, the son of a Genoese captain and a "peerless English maiden," are made the string on which to thread incidents of the times and minute descriptions of the state of social and political disorder prevailing. The story is circumstantial and not unreadable, inasmuch as it travels not out of realities and probabilities. Imaginative it is not, nor exciting; but the pictures it presents of Moorish life and domestic interiors are not uninteresting.

THE VYNE.*

IN undertaking this work, and in his satisfactory execution of it, Mr. Chaloner Chute has not only conferred on his countrymen a public benefit, he has performed, we venture to think, a public duty. And, in support of our assertion, we will quote the pregnant words written many years ago by Sir Francis Palgrave, one of the most graceful antiquarian chroniclers that this country has possessed:—"The genuine history of a country can never be well understood without a complete and searching analysis of the component parts of the community as well as the country. Genealogical inquiries and local topography, so far from being unworthy of the attention of the philosophical inquirer, are among the best materials he can use; and the fortunes and changes of one family, or the events of one upland township, may explain the darkest and most dubious portions of the annals of a realm." We do not know that Mr. Chute has ever read these words, but he has at any rate acted in the spirit of them in giving us a lucid account of a homestead which, from its antiquity and from the high position held by some of its owners, offers as many and varied points of interest as any dwelling-house, except a few of the more princely and historical palaces, in England.

The Vyne lies in the parish of Sherborne St. John, almost on the borders of Hampshire and Berkshire. It is on the high road betwixt Winchester and Reading. It is almost certain that it was the Vindomis (vini domus) of the Romans, and owed its name to its convenient situation as a baiting-house between those two important towns. Mr. Chute gives excellent reasons for believing that it was at one time the headquarters of a Roman Legion, and that it may have been visited by the Emperor Hadrian when he came over to inspect the newly acquired province of his rapidly overgrowing Empire. In illustration of its occupancy by the then masters of the world, Mr. Chute tells us that towards the end of the last century a gold Roman ring was dug up in the immediate neighbourhood of the Vyne, engraved with the head of Venus, and the words "Seneciane vivas IIude" (i.e. secunde), "O Senecianus, mayest thou live prosperously!" In this fact there is, of course, nothing extraordinary, but the sequel to the story entitles it to rank among the most curious of coincidences. At Lydney, in Gloucestershire, seventy miles from the Vyne, a small leaden tablet has been found among the ruins of a temple dedicated to Nodens, who seems to have been a sort of British Neptune. Rudely scratched upon it were these words, which seem to show that it was the mode of advertisement adopted by Silvianus to recover the ring found so many years afterwards in the grounds of the famous Hampshire house. "To the God Nodens. Silvianus has lost a ring. He has vowed the half to Nodens if he recovers it. Among those who bear the name of Senecianus, to none grant health until he bring the ring to the temple of Nodens." Mr. Chute remarks that, "after fifteen centuries the grounds upon which Silvianus claimed this ring can only be conjectured. Perhaps he had given it to Senecianus in token of friendship, and afterwards had occasion to recall it, or Senecianus may have lost it in a wager and unfairly kept it back. One thing only is clear, that Senecianus, thinking that possession was nine points of the law, declined to part with it; and it has been suggested that he had his name engraved upon it, accompanied by the wish for his own good health, as a kind of countercharm to the inscription on the tablet."

The de Ports of Basing, who afterwards took the name of St. John, and gave their acquired appellation to the parish of Sherborne, seem to have been the first lords of the manor of the Vyne. Their descendant, the Marquess of Winchester, still lives at Amport, one of the lordships conferred by the Conqueror on the grandfather of John of Basing. In the reign of Henry II. Henry de Port, who then lived at the Vyne, built and endowed the Chantry Chapel. In the fourteenth century the Vyne passed to the distinguished family of Cowdray, whose splendid mansion house in Sussex still bears their name, and is "famous no less for its stately beauty than for its tragic fate, having been ruined by fire at the same time that its owner, the eighth Lord Montague, perished by water in the falls of the Rhine, near Schaffhausen." From the Cowdrays the Vyne passed by marriage to Sir William Fyffhide, whose son leased it to William Gregory for certain consideration, including the payment of one rose at the Feast of St. John the Baptist. In 1386 the family of Sandys acquired the manor, and in the sixteenth century the present chapel attached to the manor-house was built by William, first Lord Sandys of the Vyne, who seems to have stinted nothing to make it beautiful architecturally or to decorate it magnificently. It still stands undesecrated, and still retains its pristine loveliness. It was the same princely gentleman who built the present dwelling-house. This is the Lord Sandys immortalized by Shakspeare as sturdily protesting against the expensive mummeries of the Field of the Cloth of Gold. He was made a Knight of the Garter, and as Treasurer of Calais was active in defending the marches against the French. On resigning the treasurership of Calais he was made Lord Chamberlain and named Captain of Guisnes. Henry VIII. visited his old servant more than once at the Vyne. On one occasion at least he was accompanied by Anne Boleyn. At one time, disgusted with the capricious tyranny of the King, especially in matters of religion, there is no doubt that the brave old lord not only made use of flimsy excuses to keep away from Court, but that, in his zeal for the ancient faith, he let it be believed by the Emperor's Ambassador in London that he would be willing to welcome any action on the part of Charles V. to "apply a remedy." The Envoy's letter to his master hints that Lord Sandys would not even resist his invasion of this country. Fortunately for his fame, his discontent found no vent in action. We have little doubt, moreover, that his old English spirit would have come back to him at the sight of a foreign foe on our shores, and that he would have done his doughtiest to send him back again with a flea in his ear. At any rate, so far as acts and deeds went, he lived and died the loyal servant of a tyrannical and exacting master. The third Lord Sandys entertained Queen Elizabeth at the Vyne. His second wife, a daughter of Lord Chandos, had a scar on her fair forehead. The poet Gascoigne thus, in a song of many stanzas, from which we only quote a few, contends that the blemish was no disfigurement:—

In Court who so demandes
What dame doth much excell,
For my conceit I must needes say,
Faire Bridges beares the bel:

Upon whose lively cheeke,
To prove my judgment true,
The rose and lillie seeme to strive
For equall change of hewe:

And therwithall so well
Her graces all agree,
No frowning cheere dare once presume
In hir sweet face to bee.

Although some lavish lippes
Which like some other best,
Will say the blemishe on her brow
Disgraceth all the rest.

* * *

The skar still there remains;
No force: let there it be;
There is no cloud that can eclipse
So bright a sun as she.

In 1649 the Sandys family sold the Vyne to the Chaloner Chutes, whose representative in the female line still possesses the historical old house and demesne. The Speaker, Chaloner Chute, who bought the estate, was "a man of great wit and stately carriage of himself," who was so conscious of his powers that, when he was a practising barrister, he ventured to take liberties such as Roger North says no Chancery practiser ever did or will do again. "If he had a fancy," says Mr. North, "not to have the fatigue of business, but to pass the time in pleasure after his own humour, he would say to his clerk, 'Tell the people I will not practise this term,' and was so good as his word, and then no one durst come nigh him with business. But when his clerks signified he would take business he was in the same advanced post at the Bar, fully redintegrated as before, and his practice nothing shrunk by the discontinuance. This shows a transcendent genius, superior to the slavery of a gainful profession." He was a zealous friend of Episcopacy; and when, on the impeachment of the Bishops before the House of Lords, none of the counsel retained by the prelates except himself ventured to come to the Bar for the defence, and the Lords asked whether he would plead, "Yes," said he, "so long as I have a tongue to plead with." His descendant, John Chute, who succeeded his brother Anthony at the Vyne in 1754, was the friend and correspondent of Horace Walpole and Gray. The former was a frequent guest, and found Mr. Chute a kindred spirit in his somewhat crude architectural and antiquarian tastes. He gave the owner of the Vyne two stone eagles for the outside of his house, and he took the liveliest interest in the erection of a new staircase and in the construction of a monument to the Speaker Chute. Many letters from Gray and Walpole are given in this volume. Some of them have not hitherto been published. On Gray's return from the Continent he writes to his friend in Hampshire:—

Nunc ad te totum me converto, suavissimo Chuti, whom I wrote to from Dover. If this be London, Lord send me to Constantinople: either I or it are extremely odd: the boys laugh at the depth of my ruffles, the immensity of my bag, and the length of my sword. I am as an alien in my native land, yea I am as an owl among the small birds. It rains: everybody is discontented, and so am I. You can't imagine how mortifying it is to fall into the hands of an English barber. Lord, how you or Polleri would storm in such a case! Don't think of coming hither without Lavour, or something equivalent to him. The natives are alive and flourishing: the fashion is a grey frock with round sleeves, bob wig, or a spencer, plain hat with enormous brims and shallow crown, cocked as bluff as possible, muslin neckcloth twisted round, rumpled and tucked into the breast; all this with a Sa Faring air, as if they were just come back from Cartagena.

In another letter he writes "The Town are horn mad after Mr. Garrick. There are a dozen Dukes of a night at Goodmansfields sometimes, and yet I am stiff in the opposition." A saying of Sir Isaac Newton is quoted, in which the great philosopher expresses his contempt for antiquarianism, and especially for antique statues, which he calls "stone dolls." How different this narrowness of judgment from the frank regret of Darwin, that he had not better cultivated the æsthetic tastes, instead of letting "his mind become a kind of machine for grinding general laws out of large collections of facts." "The loss of these tastes," the more genial-hearted author of the Origin of Species goes on to say, "is a loss of happiness, and may possibly be injurious to the intellect, and more probably to the moral character, by enfeebling the emotional part of our nature." Mr. William Chute, for some time M.P. for Hampshire, who was born in 1757 and died in 1824, was a keen sportsman, and somewhat of a humourist, even in his capacity of M.F.H. His meets were never advertised, and no one knew whether the hounds were to hunt twice or thrice in the week or five times in the fortnight. On one occasion the great Duke who hunted with "the Vine" from Strathfieldsaye, rode about a whole day without finding the Master or the hounds. His letter to Mr. Chute on the subject is a model of courteous and kindly remonstrance. This Mr. William Chute was a man who knew how to give as well as how to take. "Sir John Cope of Bramshill, who professed Radical opinions, once wrote to him that he had a litter of fire-dogs in that year's entry, whose names had all pretty much the same meaning, for they were Placeman, Parson, Pensioner, Pilferer, and Plunderer; but the Tory Squire, with a ready invention, retorted that he could show him a litter of which the five names were equally synonymous; being Radical, Rebel, Regicide, Ruffian, and Rascal."

The last chapter in this very interesting volume gives a catalogue of the treasures of art to be found in the Vyne Manor-house. Among these are family and other portraits and paintings, by Holbein, Poussin, Andrea del Sarto, Van der Heyden, Lucas de Heere, Titian, and others; Roman monumental marbles, some good statuary, and some stained glass windows, which are mentioned by Peter Heylin, the biographer of Laud, together with those of Fairford and Canterbury, as having survived the Reformation. When he sees in the catalogue of statuary the immediate juxtaposition of such names as Rameses, Nero, Hercules, Seneca, Milton, Mary Queen of Scots, Shakspeare, Pitt, and Fox, the reader will be inclined to hum the lines of Milliken's famous ballad, which tells of

Bold Neptune, Plutarch, and Nicodemus,
All standing naked in the open air.

MR. ROGERS announces in an "Apology to the Reader" that his work "pretends to no merit either of style or composition," and we are glad that it makes no false pretensions, and that it "courts neither enconium (sic) nor criticism," which causes us to marvel that we have received it. However, it shall have both praise and blame. In the first place most of the subjects are well chosen. No one, for example, who has walked from Seaton to Beer is likely to forget the path over the cliff, or to be unwilling to be remi[illegible] of it. The f[illegible]tu[illegible] of families, such as the Waldhams and t[illegible] Parbe[illegible]y [illegible]f S[illegible] and the Courtenays, the Carews, and the Poles of Devons[illegible]re of more than local interest. And if any one does not [illegible] for such houses as Barrington Court and the oddly na[illegible]king Ina's Palace" at South Petherton, he is only worthy t[illegible] his life in a newly-built suburb of London. Mr. Rogers [illegible] some right to speak of these matters; for it is evident that he appreciates the scenery of the West country, that he thoroughly kn[illegible] the places about which he discourses, and that he enjoys [illegible]king a[illegible] noble building. Unfortunately, however, he has pr[illegible] an intolerabl[illegible] irritating book. He adopts a style that is, we [illegible]ove, peculiar to the antiquarian correspondents of provincial newspapers, peppering his pages with "we ween," "quotha," and "we trow," and breaking out in addresses to the reader, to the person about whom he is writing, to himself, and to nobody in particular. His grammar is wild, and his sentences often unintelligible. What, we wonder, does this mean:—"Like its name, the Church of Bradford Abbas has an intensely ecclesiastical appearance the more easily reconciled when we find," and so on. No one surely ever rambled and maundered [illegible] such an extent on paper before. He is always getting in[illegible]me churchyard, and, instead of betaking himself at once to a[illegible]itaphs worth noting, sitting down on a "grassy mound," with the unpleasant result that he is moved to write pages of [illegible]editations such as:—"Alone, to the alone, and yet not alone [illegible]ough the busy living world of the present be shut out. A[illegible] the wondrous wo[illegible] the generations of a thousand years, passive and d[illegible] around us, waiting the warm spell of conjuration to [illegible] outward and visible signs of their presenc[illegible] e) us everywhere." He is fearfully addicted to [illegible] quotations, and besides numberless scraps of other people's poetry, gives us as many as sixty poems of his own composition. About these we should have been glad to say nothing, but as they have a special index, and take up no small part of the volume, they must be noticed; so we give a specimen, a verse from a piece entitled "The Butterfly and the Beetle"—perhaps some one with ample leisure may succeed in attaching some meaning to it:—

There is an earth and heaven ye say to me—
One tearful, dark! the other sunny, bright!
Creatures ye are of both, and this to thee
Unseals our pictured lessons to thy sight:
To-day (thy night) the beetle's path ye wend,
To-morrow with a seraph's wings ascend.

In spite of all drawbacks, however, a reader of inexhaustible patience will find a good deal of interesting matter in Mr. Rogers's book. His paper on Ottery-Mohun, for instance, contains the well-known story of the evil deeds of the last Lord Mohun, and an account of the Carews, chiefly made up from Sir John Maclean's scholarly edition of Hoker's Life of Sir Peter Carew. The volume is copiously illustrated, and the representations of brasses and other monuments, and of coats of arms, are specially welcome.

THE SIGNS OF OLD LOMBARD STREET.†

THIS book is published on the old subscription plan, the names of the subscribers following the title-page. It is a method of publication open to abuse, but in such works as this on the Lombard Street Signs, where the interest is both archæological and local—that is to say, limited in extent—it is a plan much to be recommended. Not the least of its advantages is that it enables the author to produce his work in such a handsome form, with printing and paper so admirable, as that in which the Signs of Old Lombard Street has been given to its subscribers.

Lombard Street is not like unto Cheapside, or even the Strand, for interest and historical associations. But many well-known names are collected by Mr. Hilton Price from those of former residents in the street. Here lived Robert Amades, Keeper of the Jewels to Henry VIII. At the sign of the "Ring and the Ruby" Queen Elizabeth's goldsmith, Thomas Muschamp, carried on his business. On the site of what was afterwards the "Grasshopper" Jane Shore's husband had his shop:—

> In Lombard Street I once did dwelle
> As London yet can witness well:
> Where many gallants did beholde
> My beauty in a shop of golde.

Sir Thomas Vyner and his son Sir Robert, the "Prince of Goldsmiths," lived here and were buried in the church of St. Mary Woolnoth. And another resident was John Colvill, the friend of Samuel Pepys. In the Little London Directory of 1677 a list is given of the goldsmiths who kept "running cashes." There were twenty-seven of these in Lombard Street, and the signs of the houses where they carried on trade are given. Mr. Hilton Price, however, has recovered over a hundred signs once belonging to the street between the years 1488 and 1799, most of which can be identified with the houses as they are now numbered.

The signs of old London, like the signs of modern London, now only seen outside taverns, showed a remarkable lack of invention. The "Sun," the "Bolt and Tun," the "Flower de Luce," the "Rose," the "Angel," the "Mermaid," the "Plough," the "Feathers," the "Crown," the "Three Anchors," would do for any roadside inn of modern days. A few, however, are unexpected. The "Morocco's Head" would now be the "Saracen's Head" or the "Moor's Head"; the "Hat and Harrow" is a queer conjunction; the "Unicorn and King"—here the animal is figured kneeling before a [illegible] damsel carrying a lily—probably indicates that the old "Unicorn" destroyed by the Great Fire has passed into the hands of a goldsmith, who makes rings; the "Cardinal's Cap" clearly belongs to pre-Reformation times, and was changed after the [illegible] to the "Cock"; the "Grasshopper" is not [illegible] but it is interesting, because it [illegible] the sign [illegible] Jane [illegible] first and of Sir Thomas Gresham afterwards.

The drawing of the signs was generally—we suppose that Mr. James West has faithfully copied them—very good, and less conventional than might have been expected. The Head of Charles I. the Royal Oak, with three Crowns round it—here Pepys and Alexander Broome drank Haut Brion in the year 1663—is very quaint and pleasing; the Three Angels are as lavish of their charms as if they were the [illegible] Choristers; the "King's Head" shows, apparently, the [illegible] countenance of the second James. The "Anchor," the "Rose," the "Crown," the "Bible," and the "Castle" cannot possibly be mis[illegible] [illegible] must not forget the careful notes made b[illegible] m[illegible] of this learned and useful work to every drawing [illegible] [illegible] may gather the best account of old L[illegible] Street [illegible] ever been put together. Would that [illegible] take the same pains with other streets! We [illegible] to submit to their consideration the claims of Thames Street, much neglected, but full of historical interest; of Cheapside; of Ludgate Hill and "Pawl's"; and of Leadenhall Street. There are other streets; but let us begin with these—a book on each of these will be no lack of subscribers, and the Leadenhall Press may be trusted to produce the books as beautifully as Mr. Hilton Price's Signs of Old Lombard Street.
